[Text] Norway has leveled direct criticism at all the Warsaw Pact nations in connection with the Poland situation. Until the last few days Norway looked as if it would be the only country in West Europe to react in this way. The Foreign Ministry confirmed for ARBEIDERBLADET that Norway has sent a so-called demarche, a communication delivered personally to the Warsaw Pact nations in three different versions -- one to the Soviet Union, one to Poland itself and a third to the other member nations. The communication was sent 8 January, meaning that Norway had already expressed its reaction when the NATO foreign ministers' meeting took place 3 days later, 11 January, to discuss joint steps with regard to Poland, and before Labor Party parliamentary leader Gro Harlem Brundtland requested a meeting of the full Storting Foreign Affairs Committee last Friday [15 January].

The contents of the Norwegian demarches apportion the responsibility for the state of martial law in Poland between the Soviet Union and the other Warsaw Pact nations. Out of consideration for the lack of reaction from the other West European NATO nations the Foreign Ministry was unwilling to say anything, apart from indicating that in the last few days a few other countries have confirmed that they have delivered or are in the process of delivering similar demarches.

According to ARBEIDERBLADET's information there is a certain amount of concern in the Foreign Ministry that Norway has thus become isolated from the rest of West Europe in the reactions to the Poland situation. This is being ascribed to the fact that the other West European NATO nations are also acting as members of the EEC. Despite the fact that the EEC also criticizes and condemns the state of martial law in Poland, these countries -- as members of the EEC -- are less keen on direct sanctions. Norway on the other hand, as a member of NATO "only," finds it easier to follow a line closer to the U.S. attitude to the Polish situation and to other East-West questions than the other West European nations.

It is expected that this difference will be the topic of the talks Foreign Minister Svenn Stray will hold in Brussels this week with the chairman of the EEC's Council of Ministers, Belgian Foreign Minister Tindemans.

UN SPOKESMAN SAYS WEAPONS UNDER UN CONTROL

NC271812 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Answering new questions in connection with the arms placed under the UN peace force's control in 1972, the UN peace force spokesman reiterated that all the arms and ammunition are in a safe place and are inspected regularly. The spokesman added: The only thing stored at Athalassa is a small quantity of ammunition that has deteriorated. In accordance with normal safety regulations, this ammunition was not removed. The spokesman expressed hope that this final statement will end further speculation.

ROLANDHIS MEETS IN NEW YORK WITH PEREZ DE CUELLAR

NC272152 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis, who went to New York last night, met today with UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar. A UN communique on the meeting says Perez de Cuellar and Rolandhis discussed extensively the various aspects of the Cyprus problem, with special reference to the intercommunal talks. The communique adds that it was agreed that every effort should be made to step up the pace of the talks in order to achieve concrete progress. The communique also says Perez de Cuellar and Rolandhis noted with regret that the exploratory committee on missing persons has not yet begun the work entrusted to it. They expressed the hope that the committee will soon overcome the procedural difficulties and will meet its responsibilities successfully in accordance with its terms of reference.

The communique also says Perez de Cuellar and Rolandhis, bearing in mind the vital role of the UN peace force in Cyprus, also discussed the difficult economic situation of the peace force. Rolandhis informed the secretary general that the Cyprus Government agrees to hold talks with the United Nations in order to discuss economic arrangements. The talks on this question, the communique concludes, will begin in Nicosia next month between Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, and Cyprus Finance Minister Axxendiou.

It has been learned that during his meeting with Perez de Cuellar, Rolandhis referred to the need for reconvening the UN General Assembly if no progress is made during the intercommunal talks within a reasonable time.

Present at Rolandhis' meeting with Perez de Cuellar were Cyprus' permanent representative at the UN, Ambassador Mavrommatis, and Mr Siambos, director of the foreign minister's office. From the UN side the meeting was attended by Mr Urquhart, UN under secretary general for special political affairs, senior officer of the UN Secretariat Sherry and Mr (Pigot) of the UN secretary general's office.

Rolandhis also had a private meeting with Perez de Cuellar and continued the exchange of views on Cyprus developments with him. Rolandhis also met with UN General Assembly President Kittani and discussed the Cyprus problem. They exchanged views on the reconvening of the General Assembly for examination of the Cyprus problem if there is no progress in the intercommunal talks within a reasonable time.

DENKTAS RECEIVES EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT OFFICIAL

TA271228 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] President Denktas held a meeting today with the chairman of the European Parliament committee for relations with Cyprus, Mr (Hermann). Mr (Hermann) is currently on a fact-finding mission in Cyprus and discussed Cyprus' relations with the European Economic Community with the president.

In a statement at the end of the meeting, President Denktas said that he had informed Mr (Hermann) on the [word indistinct] in Cyprus and of the inhuman Greek Cypriot propaganda campaigns against the Turkish Cypriots.

He recalled that the association agreement signed with Cyprus in 1972 provided for the Turkish Cypriots benefiting equally from this agreement, but the Greek Cypriots, under the guise of being the legal government, were obstructing any benefits to be received by the Turkish Cypriot community. The president said that he had informed Mr (Hermann) that the European Economic Community should not support the regime where one-fourth of the population is being disregarded and was suffering under an economic embargo. President Denktas expressed to hope that the report to be prepared by Mr (Hermann) on his return would be objective, accepting the fact that unless the two sides of the Cyprus problem were heard, a just decision could not be taken.

Answering questions, Mr (Hermann) said that he was interested in learning many things about this difficult situation. He added that it was not easy for someone living in Brussels or Strasbourg to understand the facts in Cyprus unless he came to the island and saw and listened to both sides. He described his visit as fruitful because it had helped him to understand the difficulties. On relations between the economic community and Cyprus, Mr (Hermann) said that they would not yet [word indistinct] and that this was due to the difficulties in Cyprus. He declined to make any further statements, saying that he was in the island on a kind of exploratory mission and that he would like to learn before making statements.

DENKTAS AWAITS PROGRESS ON MISSING PERSONS ISSUE

TA271103 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas today received the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, Hugo Gobbi. In a statement after the meeting, Denktas said he is awaiting information from Gobbi in connection with today's meeting and therefore he will not reveal their subject.

Pointing out that Gobbi brought the missing persons issue to the meeting, Denktas said the attitude of the Turkish Cypriot community toward the missing persons issue is very clear and humane. He said: We displayed the necessary flexibility to establish this committee. The committee was established, a (?majority) decision was made and a work method was decided upon. It was also agreed to abandon the negotiating table and resort to international conferences. However, from the moment we sat down at the negotiating table, the Greek Cypriots intensified their international propaganda, finally abandoning the talks and applying to the [UN] Third Committee.

Denktas recalled that in the Third Committee the Greek Cypriots adopted a very useless decision, which consisted of ruling that the missing persons committee must function, and that the committee was functioning anyway.

Noting that new moves have been initiated because the secrecy agreement was violated very seriously, Denktas added: Certain moves are being made with the aid of the third member, the International Red Cross delegate. The new government will discuss the stand at the committee and reach a decision. I explained all this to Gobbi. Now I am waiting.

PAPANDREOU, KIPRIANOU CONCLUDE CYPRUS DISCUSSIONS

NC272034 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Excerpts] President Kiprianou and Greek Prime Minister Papandreou concluded their Cyprus talks during a private meeting this afternoon. The meeting took place at the residence of Cyprus Ambassador Khatzimiltis and was followed by a working luncheon. Addressing Prime Minister Papandreou at the luncheon, President Kiprianou said:

[Begin recording] I welcome you and Mrs Papandreou to this Cyprus territory, and I am eager to welcome you in Cyprus soon, where, as I said yesterday, all the Cypriot people are waiting to demonstrate their feelings of friendship, love and gratitude for you. The talks we have had here in Athens during the last few days have been very useful in all respects. Since you have taken over, Mr Prime Minister, there has been no difficulty from the beginning in arriving at joint conclusions and joint actions. However, we have not considered this sufficient and we decided, I believe successfully so far, to enter into greater details in order to see how we will plan methodically and in the best possible way our activities and efforts for the promotion of the Cyprus cause toward a nationally acceptable solution, a solution in agreement with internationally accepted democratic principles, a solution that will secure for Cyprus absolute independence, freedom, territorial integrity, unity and sovereignty and the nonalignment of the Cyprus state.

Our goal is restoration of our people's inalienable rights, which have been violated because of the invasion that followed treachery -- an invasion that is continuing and an occupation that is continuing. Unfortunately, despite all the goodwill displayed by the Greek Cypriot side all these years since the invasion, there has been no progress. This is not because of a question of details; it is basically because the Turkish side -- when I say Turkish side I mean basically Turkey -- has not changed its attitude, has not abandoned its philosophy of a divisive solution, for the promotion and legalization of faits accomplis.

We have declared repeatedly -- and we do so again -- that we cannot possibly accept faits accomplis under any circumstances. We have accepted federation since 1974. Counterproposals based on federation, were also made in 1977. But this does not mean we can possibly accept a divisive solution, a confederation solution, a solution of separate states, a partitionist solution. We envisage a federation in which the internal structure of the state should be of such a nature as to secure the citizens' basic freedoms -- free settlement, free movement and the right to own property. We envisage a federation that will secure the unity of the state, of one single state which will be independent and sovereign. Any Cyprus solution without the withdrawal of foreign troops is inconceivable, in the same way that any solution that will make possible the continuation of foreign interference is equally inconceivable.

Our philosophy and ambition is to make Cyprus a place of peace, democracy, justice and freedom for all its inhabitants, irrespective of their national extraction. We believe that because of Cyprus' geographical position, at a critical point in the eastern Mediterranean, Cyprus can become a bridge of understanding among three continents instead of a source of conflict and conflagration that jeopardizes world peace and security and that most definitely jeopardizes Greek-Turkish relations as long as this situation is perpetuated.

While we are struggling for all Hellenism, we are simultaneously struggling for the cause of international detente, peace and security in the region.

Our people's virtue, our people's powers of endurance, are being tested in Cyprus. Our people, who have lived through a drama of unprecedented nature in world history -- we do not know what difficulties we will still have to face but we will most definitely have to face difficulties -- but our people, who have not bent in the course of this drama, will not bend in the future either. With high morale, with belief in their just rights, and with endurance, patience and determination, we will proceed together with our people until Cyprus is vindicated, until the Cyprus state is restored to what it is entitled to just like what every other independent state in the world is entitled to just like what all other free people in the world are entitled to.

We most definitely enjoy international support -- I do not want to underestimate it at all -- and the more we broaden it the better, because it is a valuable factor for the development of things. As is well known, with international support, with internationalization, it will be possible to create the prerequisites to compel Turkey to change its attitude. [end recording]

Further into his speech Mr Kiprianou said that no matter how valuable international support may be, the struggle we are waging cannot be waged successfully without Greece, our mainstay in our struggle. The personal decisive support from Prime Minister Papandreou, President Kiprianou stressed, has touched the Cypriot people and has contributed to the considerable improvement in the Cypriot people's morale.

In conclusion, Mr Kiprianou said: [Begin recording] I drink to the health of Greek Prime Minister and Mrs Papandreou, to the Greek people's happiness and progress and to the success of the cause of Cyprus, of this joint cause. [end recording]

In his reply, Greek Prime Minister Papandreou said: [Begin recording] Mr President, as you know, our meetings not only have a political and militant content but they are at the same time meetings of two men who got to know each other many years ago in the course of joint struggles that have taken us beyond the Atlantic. We have struggled for many years for a free, independent, united Cyprus and a nonaligned Cyprus. It is my own personal conviction -- allow me to repeat what I have already said, but I consider it so important that I must repeat it -- that we Hellenists are facing great dangers. During recent decades there has been a shrinking of Hellenism. The time has come to put an end to this course, which undermines the very survival of our nation and our people.

We admit and we stress that Cyprus, the Republic of Cyprus, is an independent and nonaligned UN member. And we know if Cyprus is lost, Greece's fate will be tragic. For this reason, our struggle is for an independent, nonaligned, united, democratic Cyprus, where all its citizens -- Greeks and Turks alike -- will enjoy the same rights, the same possibilities to develop, the same obligations, the same rights. This goal, this Cyprus is, I would say, a prerequisite for the long march of Hellenism toward the future. I would like to again give you and the Cypriot people my assurance that Greece will stay on their side during their struggle for a fair, definite Cyprus solution.

It is said in Europe that the Cyprus problem is a problem between two communities, of the majority and the minority, which must have a solution. There is an internal problem, particularly following the interference by the great power, in Cyprus. However, under UN auspices the two communities can solve the internal aspect of the Cyprus problem. The major issue for which Greece has a duty to help, as a guarantor power as well, is the external aspect of the Cyprus problem. As you have stressed, Cyprus is a country partly under occupation. There is an invasion -- a brutal one -- and an occupation. And it is necessary, on a worldwide scale, with our active presence at your side, to reposition the Cyprus problem. It is not a question of two communities; it is a question of the independence and sovereignty of an independent UN member. [end recording]

PAPANDREOU HAS GREECE ON 'EDGE OF PRECIPICE'

NC280757 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 25 Jan 82 p 4

["Here Is the World" column by Zafer Atay: "Papandreou -- Man on the Edge of the Precipice"]

[Excerpts] Papandreou is like a car without brakes — noisy, uncontrolled and dangerous. He has shut his ears to the world. He has inflated ideas about himself, believing he has superhuman powers. Now we see Papandreou in power. This has not been easy. To start with, he exploited the weaknesses of the conservative government, which was plagued with internal disputes. Then he made wide concessions to the communists, who possess undeniably important voting potential, and to other leftist organizations. During the election campaign he incited as much Turkish animosity as he possibly could and managed to attract the vote of the man in the street, whose mind was haunted by an imaginary fear of the Turks.

Papandreou is now repaying his supporters. He is inciting animosity for NATO and the EEC to satisfy the communists. His animosity for Turkey tops the list. He is filling the minds of his people with fear that "the Turks are coming." He is also keeping NATO busy with such absurdities as "the Turks are coming; give me guarantees against them." He winks at the Third World, which has not yet attained maturity, saying, "Let us drive the Turkish invaders from Cyprus."

Wise people in the main opposition party in Greece are aware of this crazy trend. This is why opposition leader Averof described Papandreou as "playing with fire by inciting animosity against the Turks and pushing Greece into isolation." Head of state Karamanlis, on the other hand, is already discontented. The general Papandreou pensioned off because he did not consider him "close to him" has been recalled to duty by Karamanlis at the presidential palace. We believe that this marks the beginning of a big row. To grab something from the West through blackmail, Papandreou opened Greece's dockyards to the Russians. By doing so, he has lost some of his respectability with his former overlords, the Americans.

The Greek people have paid heavily for the absurdities of their inconsistent leaders. The Greek hordes who invaded Anatolia in the 1920's to "restore Byzantium" were driven into the Mediterranean by Turkish troops. Another Papandreou in the 1960's hurled Greece into the lap of the antidemocratic colonels. Greece under Papandreou is heading swiftly for the precipice like a car without brakes -- a precipice with evil consequences....

SUPPLIERS OF ARMS TO TERRORISTS ARRESTED

TA271629 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1525 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Izmir, 27 Jan (AA) -- 52 militants who supplied arms to rightwing extremist groups, and trained and directed rightwingers in armed attacks and planting of bombs were caught in the Aegean region, martial law authorities for the region announced. The operations carried out in Izmir, Manisa and Mugla between December 1981 and January 1982 also revealed several pistols of various makes ranging from an Argentinian Bersa to an Italian Baretta. The detainees include 13 farmers, 7 workers, an engineer, a village headman and 3 women.

CSCE PROSPECTS WORRY NONALIGNED COUNTRIES

AU271335 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 27 Jan 82 p 3

[APA report]

[Text] The representatives of the neutral and nonaligned states participating in the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) regard the sharp controversy over Poland to be expected on 9 February in Madrid as a serious threat to the continuation of the CSCE process. At a meeting in Vienna of the nine neutral and nonaligned states (Austria, Switzerland, Liechtenstein, Sweden, Finland, San Marino, Malta, Cyprus, and Yugoslavia) the participants unanimously expressed the opinion that the events in Poland were certainly not in accordance with the Helsinki Final Act. After the conclusion of the talks late on Monday evening, several representatives of neutral and nonaligned countries declared in Vienna that it would be necessary, however, to make every effort to prevent the ruining of what has already been achieved at the second CSCE follow-up meeting in Madrid.

How a positive outcome of the follow-up meeting can be achieved after resumption of the talks following the Christmas and new year's break in Madrid on 9 February, they said, will almost entirely depend on the situation after the speeches of the NATO foreign ministers who have already stated their intention to emphatically take a stance on the situation in Poland at the Madrid meeting.

Meanwhile, the Polish Government has unequivocally declared in a letter to all countries participating in the CSCE meeting that it would consider a discussion in Madrid of the situation in Poland as an interference in the country's internal affairs. The neutral and nonaligned states fear that the final document draft submitted by them, which appeared to have met with the approval of both sides, may now no longer be considered acceptable by the Western side.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

SUSPENSION OF ECONOMIC AID TO POLAND URGED

NC271745 Paris AFP in English 1738 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Brussels, 27 Jan (AFP) -- Economic and financial aid to Poland should be suspended until martial law is lifted there and all detainees released, the Economic and Social Council (ESC) of the European Community urged here today. ESC President Thomas Roseingrave of Ireland also called on all governments to make sure that humanitarian aid sent to Poland was in fact distributed among those who needed it most. "It is now over a month since the tanks came onto the streets of Warsaw and other Polish cities to crush the limited efforts towards democratic reforms which had been achieved by the trade union Solidarity," he said.

UNIONS CALL STRIKE AGAINST AUSTERITY POLICY

[Text] Brussels, 28 Jan (AFP) -- A nationwide one-day strike against the government's austerity policy has been called in Belgium for February 8 by the FGTB union, which is close to the socialist party.

It hopes the CSC, the other big union which is close to the Social-Christian Party, will follow suit. Talks are planned between the two unions on establishing a "common front" against the policy of centre-right Premier Wilfried Martens' government.

Official strike calls have gone out to the steel, textile and other sectors in the past week, as part of a campaign against pay sacrifices demanded by the government. The Martens administration wants employees to take pay cuts before granting government aid to firms in difficulty. Today a four-hour official FGTB stoppage was planned in the Walloon steelmaking areas of Charleroi and Liege.

OFFICIAL VIEWS NORMALIZED RELATIONS WITH SFRY

OFFER TO SELL KUWAIT NUCLEAR REACTORS DENIED

LD280120 Montreal International Service in English 1900 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Canada's energy minister, Marc Lalonde, has said he did not offer to sell Kuwait four Canadian nuclear reactors. Mr Lalonde blamed reports to this effect early in the week on a poor translation. He says Canada has offered to help Kuwait develop nuclear energy but only if it signs non-proliferation treaties and agrees to Canadian safeguards, and, Mr Lalonde says he has made the same offer to Saudi Arabia.

IRISH REPUBLIC

GOVERNMENT FALLS; NEW ELECTIONS FORESEEN

LD272222 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2133 GMT 27 Jan 82

[By Chris Perkin]

[Excerpts] The six-month-old minority government of the Irish Republic fell tonight after losing a key vote on a tough budget statement outlined only hours earlier. The end came when four of the five independent members of the Dublin parliament on whom Premier Dr Garret Fitzgerald depended for the survival of his administration sided with the opposition. Immediately [thereafter] a white-faced Dr Fitzgerald told the house he would go to the official Dublin residence of Ireland's President Dr Patrick Hillery and request him to dissolve parliament and call a general election. But the president was not immediately available and their meeting was delayed until later tonight. Most observers predicted an early election with Dr Hillery accepting Dr Fitzgerald's plea for dissolution. In that event there would be further uncertainty in the run-up to a poll as recent opinion surveys have indicated a neck and neck position between Fianna Fail and the coalition grouping of the Fine Gael and Irish Labour parties.

FRENCH PREMIER ARRIVES, MEETS WITH SCHMIDT

LD291110 Hamburg DPA in German 1022 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 29 Jan (DPA) -- French Premier Pierre Mauroy arrived for political talks in Bonn today. He was received by Federal Chancellor Schmidt with military honors. In an extended exchange of views with the chancellor, Mauroy intends to emphasize the common ground between Paris and Bonn. Before leaving Paris he spoke about the French-Soviet gas deal as one of the subjects highlighting the similarity of interests. The premier also criticized in an interview the U.S. sanctions policy.

Mauroy's visit is part of the preparations for the next round of consultations between President Mitterrand and Schmidt in Bonn 24-25 February. Today Mauroy and Schmidt first had a private talk and later the delegation members were called in. Afterward, Schmidt will give a dinner for the French premier. According to Paris sources Mauroy will also seek Bonn's support for the project of a German-French main battle tank and other armament projects. His program also includes talks with Economics Minister Otto Graff Lambsdorff and Finance Minister Matthoefer.

TALKS WITH BULGARIA'S MLADENOV CONCLUDE

[Text] Bonn, 28 Jan (DPA) -- Closer contacts by regular meetings on a high official level were agreed on Thursday in Bonn between Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Bulgarian Foreign Minister Petur Mladenov. A Foreign Ministry spokesman said at the end of the 2-day German-Bulgarian talks that they dealt not only with general political problems but also disarmament problems.

The meeting centered on German-Bulgarian relations, which were described as "very good," and a discussion of the East-West relationship. Genscher was especially keen to present once again the German position on the Polish problem to a minister from the East bloc. Both ministers praised the Geneva talks between Secretary of State Haig and Foreign Minister Gromyko which they described as "substantial." The Madrid CSCE follow-up conference, which is to resume on 9 February, was also among the subjects of the talks.

Mladenov, who also saw Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt briefly on Thursday, is highly esteemed in Bonn as a businesslike interlocutor, diplomatic circles emphasized. Following Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek and Polish Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski, Mladenov is the third high-ranking guest from the East bloc to visit Bonn since the declaration of martial law in Poland on 13 December.

According to a government spokesman, in their talk, which lasted nearly 2 hours, the federal chancellor and the Bulgarian foreign minister stressed the importance of the negotiations on medium-range nuclear missiles for the development of East-West relations. There was clearly no agreement in their assessment of the crisis in and around Poland. The government press spokesman's statement says merely that Schmidt and Mladenov expressed their respective points of view. Apart from this, "the very satisfactory development of economic cooperation" since the chancellor's visit to Bulgaria in 1979, as well as the world economic situation, was also discussed.

FRG-GDR BORDER COMMISSION TALKS END 28 JAN

[Text] Magdeburg, 28 Jan (DPA) -- A 2-day joint FRG-GDR border commission meeting has prepared this year's program for the maintenance of border waterways.

Approximately 150 measures are planned, which corresponds roughly to last year's program. The head of the West German delegation, Irmgard von Rottenburg, said today after the 59th meeting of the commission, that talks about better flood protection on the Elbe had also been continued. However, complicated negotiations are clearly still to be expected on this question.

The management of the Mittelland canal on both sides of the border was also discussed. In connection with the agreed construction of a new freeway crossing point near Wartha/Herleshausen, a note in the protocol regarding border area markings was signed. The next meeting of the commission will be held 17-18 March in Karlshafen, where the year's program for the maintenance of waterways is to be signed.

Members of the Federal Government, officials of the Federal Laender bordering the GDR and officials of the Federal Border Protection Force formed the FRG border commission delegation.

'U.S. COORDINATOR' EXPLAINS NEW PROGRAM

[Text] Bonn, 28 Jan (DPA) -- In the opinion of Hildegard Hamm-Bruecher (FDP), Foreign Ministry minister of state, relations between the Federal Republic and the United States could be improved and extended, particularly to the younger generation, on a broad basis of durable common ground. The newly-appointed "coordinator of German-U.S. relations" explained her program to the Industrial Club in Duesseldorf today. Its main feature is the setting up of a high-level discussion forum on the lines of the German-British "Koenigswinter talks." In addition, there would be a greater degree of exchange between students and youth and also exchanges between young executives from the two countries. There would also be an attempt to stimulate U.S. interest in the German language and German studies in the United States.

The task of coordination, which was confirmed by the Federal Cabinet this month, cannot be financed from the present budget alone, however. Hamm-Bruecher thus asked for donations. She said that the U.S. administration, which nominated European specialist Lawrence Eagleburger as her counterpart, had already reversed planned budget cuts.

DIE ZEIT ADVOCATES BOYCOTT OF SOVIET UNION

DW281309 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 29 Jan 82 p 7

[Gerd Bucerius article: "What the West Would Have To Do"]

[Text] We have reason to be sad and concerned. To begin with: 1,700,000 unemployed people have been registered by now; we have to reckon with 2 million by spring. An (at least psychologically) effective job creation program would cost DM50 billion, and we don't have that kind of money because the state in good years incurred debts of many times this amount, despite warnings. The Federal Government and the Laender no longer can borrow DM10 billion without pushing interest rates up even more. The government cannot but prepare the nation for further hardships; sanctions against the Soviet Union now seem to be inevitable after all and they will hit our economy.

Next point: We would put up with the harsh lines drawn for us for aiding the Polish reform movement. The Western, democratic world by its nature is incapable of this aid and this discovery of impotence will produce new impotence.

Finally: It is at this very moment that our best friends in the world, the citizens of the United States and their government, realize that a constantly growing number of Germans no longer wants any part of them. This group, often respectable and moral people, is not in the majority today; it might be the majority tomorrow because it enjoys the encouragement of an important part of our press. Many of them look down with contempt (once at Carter, now on Reagan) if not on the United States.

Arthur F. Burns, Reagan's ambassador to Bonn, on 1 December said in a speech to the German Society for Foreign Policy: "If our soldiers are not wanted they will not stay." Ambassadors just do not indulge in idle talk; if they make important statements, these have been cleared with their governments beforehand. Burns uttered a second warning in VORWAERTS on 21 January. He was asked: "Has the point been reached where the pullout of the U.S. troops is being seriously pondered?" His answer: "I don't think so. But I do deem it appropriate to be prepared for the possibility of such a point being reached. It was my intention to honestly draw the attention of the Germans and Americans to the fact that such a danger exists and that, consequently, we ought to take steps to avert this danger."

But nobody listened. During a recent discussion an intelligent young girl calmly said: "The Americans want to leave; I will shed no tears over them." This is a generation speaking. It no longer knows that the United States, risking war, in 1948 saved Berlin from Soviet seizure. This generation did not witness how Khrushchev in 1961 wanted to turn the communications routes to Berlin over to the GDR and Kennedy in Vienna thereupon threatened him with hard, determined reaction ("We will have a cold winter"); when Khrushchev then built the wall and we pleaded with the United States for proof of their perseverance -- and received it time and again. Much less does this generation know of the generosity of the Marshall Plan.

Occupied by the United States

To some Germans "those" superpowers -- the United States and the Soviet Union alike -- represent the adversaries. "Both parts of Germany are occupied," this is what can be heard more often. Could it be that the Soviets will leave "if they are not wanted any longer?" When De Gaulle in 1966 asked the United States to leave France they left.

Perhaps there is no gratitude among peoples; much less so over 20 years. Compared to our sense of realpolitik the United States probably is too sentimental. Yet, the Americans believed that if they could not rely on our feelings they could at least rely on our interest. Oh well, many Germans are saying, the Americans are not here at all because of us; they are defending their own country: "They need us."

True enough, the United States also defends itself in Europe. In that respect the interests of the United States are congruent with ours. They had to fight in Europe twice against another's lust for world domination; the third time they left their soldiers here directly to prevent another war through deterrence.

But are they dependent on us? The Americans once believed that they would be in danger if the Pacific coast became communist. China did turn communist -- and nothing has changed. So a great deal is supposed to change in their view if the Atlantic coast -- 5,000 km away from the American continent -- were lost? A withdrawal behind the Rhine or even the pullout from a Europe that would not at all be fatal to the United States. The United States learned in Vietnam that it is impossible to defend a people against its will. Today the Germans -- including the young Germans -- would be receptive to defense, albeit sadly. Will they also be so 10 years from now?

"Dying for Reagan?" I was asked the other day. Most of the people having a say in German politics regard Reagan as an arrogant ignoramus, a mediocre western movie actor; setting out to plunge the world into its doom through nonsensical acts of muscle. The people who say Reagan and mean the United States forget one thing: The vast majority of the Americans approves of Reagan's foreign policy; to some important people -- for example, Kissinger -- the president is not tough enough. Occasionally something of the constrained irritation of the Americans -- be they Democratic or Republican -- also reaches us. Anyone reading U.S. newspapers knows of their bewildered disappointment. They had not expected to be deserted by the Germans for whom they had preserved freedom. Even as benevolent a man as the great liberal New York TIMES columnist James Reston implores us: "Don't take us for granted." Love can turn into hate.

"That Is Your War"

Surely the U.S. reaction is exaggerated -- as reactions are in most cases. But gradually we are being regarded over there as reluctant allies. When the Soviets attacked Afghanistan -- for the first time a country outside the East bloc -- Bonn issued the slogan: "Detente is divisible."

What this elicited in the United States first of all was amazement. It meant: We continue our good relations with the Soviet Union. You just see how you cope with the Soviets in Southwest Asia. That is your war. Helmut Schmidt, really a statesman, ultimately had an inkling of the effect: with due hesitation he joined Carter's Olympic boycott; Margaret Thatcher was unable to manage this in her country. For the moment the friendship seemed to have been saved, but distrust had been awakened.

What happened next was the vehement quarrel in the Federal Republic over the counter-armament issue. The 300,000 people in Bonn's Hofgarten -- most of them did not intend to demonstrate against the United States, though this is how they were understood there. For, the SPD, the governing party, displayed a lukewarm attitude -- Schmidt was concerned but could not again fight with Brandt, Eppler and their followers in his party. The Soviet crimes in Afghanistan did not succeed in provoking such reactions among the Germans; they preferred to get excited over Nicaragua and El Salvador.

There was some touch of passion in connection with Poland; many Germans had suffered together with the Poles. Similarly, the French and Italians took to the streets for Solidarity. What touched us was that the neutral Swedes were so excited. When things turned serious, people in Germany called for composure, and finally: Detente must not fail because of Poland.

There it was again, a detente policy which Bonn believes that it can pursue all by itself. This is a bit of self-righteousness and presumption; and that combined with the compulsive mania of tutoring the other stupid peoples and their presidents. Is this still "detente" or is it already "appeasement," as Kissinger maintains? Alas, it is not even that, it is self-hypnosis. Nobody has anything against the Soviet troops which are in Poland now. But shouldn't we at least try to protect the freedom of a neighbor country?

Unfortunately Schmidt was in the GDR when martial law was proclaimed in Poland. Surely Honecker knew everything when he received Schmidt on Lake Werbellin -- we cannot blame him for not divulging the secret, nor can we do so perhaps because he pretended "regret" about Poland on the last day. The chancellor whose timing was unfortunate, praised Honecker: "Honecker was just as shocked as I was."

Honecker shocked? Nobody else had demanded measures against Solidarity for as long as he had. But Schmidt -- definitely with due consideration and readiness for sacrifices -- had already put up with the humiliating treatment in Guestrow (total separation from the GDR citizens). Aloofness would have been more appropriate and effective. The chancellor, however, had put the accent on friendly neighborliness. Now he was the captive of his own voice and could not but claim that Honecker regretted the abolition of the democratic beginnings in Poland. Such collusion was bound to disturb our friends.

Much to the surprise of the whole world our government immediately knew this: The Polish military men are acting of their own volition and not under Soviet pressure. But by the same token, military government also emerged without any pressure by a foreign great power, for instance, in Chile or in Turkey. But Jaruzelski definitely took into account -- and has been doing so to this day -- that Moscow would intervene ("has to" intervene, some people in our country are saying) unless the Polish chaos came to an end. But for the very reason why Jaruzelski does not desire but fears the Soviet pressure the West must counteract Moscow's pressure. An independent Jaruzelski will wish Western toughness just as much as we would have wished the strength of our neighbors under Hitler.

Sanctions, hence? What in the world made the Federal Republic be the first to leap out of the Western community and loudly reject sanctions? Granted, sanctions seldom have any effect and in most cases are not upheld for long. But what is at stake is not just sanctions but rules of detente by which both sides reliably abide. In the case of Afghanistan we said: Detente must not fail because of Afghanistan; but detente will not survive the next Soviet attack.

Now we hear from Guenter Gaus: Detente must not fail because of Poland -- we are not even talking about the next attack anymore. This, after all, is bound to make the hawks in Moscow triumph. Their adversary is militarily strong but plagued by dissension and demoralized.

What happened over the sanctions was a Western and not just a German tragic comedy. Nothing had been planned for the present crisis -- the Polish military dictatorship. The United States had already lifted the grain embargo; the Germans loudly cried: "composure." The French and Italians gave vent to their feelings by rallies without deeds. The Swedes alone seemed to be serious and ready to do something. Thus, Reagan came along with a small boycott: No technology to the East anymore. This was supposed to prepare for the German renunciation of the pipeline -- but failed immediately in Bonn, and now also in France.

Boycotts Are Not Ineffective

A unified front should have been demonstrated to the Soviets at the NATO meeting, at the least: If the people in Poland are forcibly prevented from self-determination there will no longer be any exchange of highly technical commodities between East and West. Help to the Polish state, no; to the Polish citizens' yes, through the efficiently working ecclesiastical organizations, for instance. This should have been decided as calmly as possible and word passed to Moscow just as calmly. But a quarreling West is incapable of crisis management: U.S. haste and German reluctance have spoiled a great deal.

Boycotts allegedly are ineffective? Even the short U.S. grain boycott forced Moscow to buy its grain on the world market at prices that were 30 percent higher. Consequently it had to dump its gold; the gold price in 1981 dropped from $600 per ounce to less than $400. The Soviets had to scrape up their last bit of gold; they have to help out with hectic arms deliveries. The boycott of the pipeline to Europe -- a Soviet hope for the future -- would be even more effective. Granted, other countries might supply pipes and electrical equipment, yet, the Soviets need buyers of the gas from the completed pipeline, and this most of all means us.

Kennedy during the Cuban crisis even went further: He threatened Moscow with the blockade of Cuba. Khrushchev gave in. Kennedy had been prepared to run a great risk and he won.

Our -- above all German -- risk would not be any smaller. We must also think of the citizens in the GDR and in Berlin; the new tension would hit them hard. But indulgence often constitutes the greater risk. We, meaning those who still witnessed the West's weakness against Hitler's beginnings, have a tale to tell about it. Had the French mobilized when Hitler marched into the Rhineland, there would not have been any World War II.

But have the Poles deserved help? Should we, many people ask, take a great risk for people who "overdraw" their position? Do the Poles not simply belong to the East bloc and should stay there?

This is definite: The Poles have asked for more than their system (of planned economy with corruption from the top down) can give. Now everybody in Poland as well as in the Soviet Union knows that the Eastern system necessarily means misery for most and abundance for a few. The system does not serve the nation but the elite. What the Poles want at long last is: a better life now instead of promises for the next generation. They did not demand anything that a free system would not procure for them. Hence, they demanded a more liberal system. Can we blame them for doing so?

There are common values for whose sake we must demonstrate courage and solidarity, if worse comes to worst. Alas, both cannot be had for free.

MAUROY DEFENDS GAS DEAL BEFORE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

[Text] Paris, 28 Jan (AFP) -- France's entire energy programme would have been imperilled had it not signed a giant gas deal with the Soviet Union earlier this month, Premier Pierre Mauroy told the National Assembly here today. Joining the chorus of French justifications for the deal, Mr Mauroy said the United States, which had for so long wasted its own energy supplies, had no right "to teach any lessons" to countries deprived of their own energy sources.

The deal, for the purchase of 8,000 million cubic metres of Siberian natural gas a year for 25 years, has been heavily criticized for flying in the face of economic pressure applied on the Soviets for their part in the Polish crisis. The United States also fears that Western Europe will build up a dangerous energy dependency on the Soviet Union. Mr Mauroy said France was currently conducting negotiations with Algeria, African countries of the Gulf of Guinea, and Norway in order to broaden its energy sources. He said an economic blockage of the Soviet Union was akin to an act of war, and added that no Western government had condemned the military crackdown in Poland as forcefully as France, nor had taken a firmer stance towards the Soviet Union.

SENATE TO CONSIDER NATIONALIZATION LAW 6 FEB

LD282336 Paris Domestic Service in French 2300 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Text] The censure motion submitted by the opposition parties in the National Assembly was rejected a short time ago, securing 154 votes, instead of the 246 votes that would have been necessary for the motion to be approved. The rejection of the censure motion has an immediate effect on the draft legislation on nationalization, namely that the law is considered adopted at the first reading by the National Assembly. It must be recalled that the government had made the matter one of confidence. The nationalization law now goes before the Senate, where it will be considered next Wednesday.

EUROPEAN SPACE PROGRAM PLANS APRIL LAUNCH

NC282150 Paris AFP in English 2039 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Text] Paris, 28 Jan (AFP) -- The European rocket launcher Ariane is completely operational, a multi-national meeting of European Space agency officials declared after a two-day meeting here today. A communique from the agency's National Centre of Space Studies said that after four trial launches, three of them successful, the Ariane programme had reached a level comparing favourably with all other satellite launchers. It said Ariane had "demonstrated brilliantly the capacity of Europe to execute a multi-national programme of high technological value." The last successful Ariane trial launch was on December 20 last year from Kourou in French Guyana. The communique said the first launch of Ariane's promotional series would take place at the end of April.

'GOOD INTENTIONS BACK IN THE PROP ROOM'

[Editorial under the rubric "The French-Soviet Gas Agreement": "At a Bad Moment?"]

[Text] The signing of the French-Soviet contract for 8 billion cubic meters of gas, which we have undertaken to buy over a period of 25 years, raises at least two important questions: one concerns the content of the contract; the other the moment chosen to sign it.

Everything, or nearly everything, has been said about the consequences for the country's energy independence of the massive purchases France is to make from the USSR. The unfortunate thing is that the various explanations given here and there are contradictory. As far as Mr Attali is concerned, for example, there is no cause for concern because in the nineties the USSR will be supplying only 5 percent of France's energy requirements. That is one way of presenting things. There is another, more realistic way, since one source of energy cannot be substituted for another overnight. In this light, it can be pointed out that in about 10 years France will be buying 35 percent of its gas requirement from the USSR. Therefore, unless an enormous effort to diversify supplies is made immediately, it is clear that this contract is going to limit our energy independence significantly.

In the short term the affair will have other repercussions, and it is undoubtedly no coincidence that these latest negotiations were held in an atmosphere of the greatest discretion, even of the greatest secrecy. It amounts to an undeniable success for Moscow, which at one time feared that France would reduce the amount of gas it was going to purchase to show its disapproval of the events in Poland and the desire it has expressed several times to reexamine its global relations with Moscow.

Soviet commentators will no doubt soon welcome France's "realism" and contrast it with U.S. "hysteria," even if it means forgetting that other European countries have not followed France's "example" yet: Although Bonn has indeed signed a similar agreement with Moscow -- before the coup of 13 December, it is true -- Italy has suspended negotiations with the USSR and Belgium is still pondering whether or not to take up the option of these purchases.

The Polish people, on the other hand, will see the signing of the agreement as confirmation that they really can expect nothing more than a few charitable gestures from the Western countries, particularly since these same countries are putting off taking a clear stand on the problem, as if they were only waiting, to appear conciliatory, for public opinion in their respective countries to "digest" the normalization.

Will it always be said that "realism" takes precedence over international morals? After some hesitation the French reaction to the declaration of martial law came as a breath of fresh air. Have the French leaders already put their good intentions back in the prop room? The French-Soviet agreement was certainly signed at a bad moment, particularly if it is true, as people like to repeat, that this agreement means more to the Soviets as a source of foreign currency than it does to us as a source of gas.

TEXT OF L'UNITA RESPONSE TO PRAVDA ARTICLE

FM281527 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 26 Jan 82 pp 1, 16

[Article: "Response to PRAVDA: Our Positions Stem From the Facts"]

[Text] The Soviet leadership has responded to our stance on the serious and tragic events in Poland, and to the broader and more general critical observations -- mainly concerning the Soviet model and the policy of the USSR and the CPSU within the international revolutionary movement -- prompted in us by those events, with a PRAVDA article. We published that article immediately and in full in yesterday's issue. We were expecting a Soviet response, which we considered more than natural and legitimate. Now we have it. Its tone is suited not exactly to someone wanting to examine the facts, to set one argument against another, to reason and to demonstrate, but rather to someone who presumes to express a supreme political and ideological verdict stemming from a role as "center" and "leader" which was declared finished a long time ago (back at the Third International in 1943 and at the dissolution of the Comintern in 1956) and which in any case we have always opposed and rejected over the years.

However, the article, though lengthy, proceeds via peremptory assertions and inferences (for instance, of the following kind: Every criticism of a USSR initiative or policy is "sacrilege," a "turnabout" and tantamount to "anti-Sovietism," and "anti-Sovietism" implies an alliance with "imperialism" and "defection to the enemy camp"). As far as we are concerned -- and we wish to reply by proceeding from the facts and invoking principles or criteria of appraisal that are also based on facts, historical facts -- we must inevitably travel a longer path. This means that this first reply from us today will probably have to be followed by others.

In advancing this debate we publish and will continue to publish what the Soviet comrades have written and will write about our stance and documents. Unfortunately they have not done the same. It is a fact that the Soviet comrades and citizens are acquainted with [only] the CPSU leadership's criticism of our documents. Only if such an absurd method is abandoned will there be a real debate in which broad masses of comrades and citizens -- not only in Italy but also in the Soviet Union -- can participate.

1. The first thing that strikes one about the Soviet article is that the "events in Poland" are cited solely with a view to accusing the Italian Communist leaders of using them as a "pretext" for dealing with issues that extend much further, such as "the transition from capitalism to socialism and the attitude toward currently existing socialism." Having defined the national tragedy being experienced by Poland as "a pretext," the Soviet article deals with it no further, except to launch a few polemical attacks on us (attacks which miss their mark because they are based on falsification of our stance.) We, however, proceed from the serious and tragic events in Poland, from the future of that people, that nation. The Soviet article's assertion that we PCI leaders have shown "sympathy toward the Polish rightwing extremists in Solidarity" is an outright lie. On the contrary, everybody knows, thanks to the repeated and insistent authoritive position statements made in our newspapers and in all our conversations on the Polish situation, that we have always condemned the harm and the very serious dangers prompted both by the instances of conservative and dogmatic resistance and by the actions of the extremists of renewal and of the groups which, consciously or not, have worked to drive the situation toward collapse. As always happens in such situations, conservatives and dogmatists on one hand and extremists and adventurists on the other incited each other. But this aspect, though real and important, is marginal compared to the basic, powerful and macroscopic fact: Solidarity was supported by millions of workers, the vast majority of the working class, of the people. How can they be judged counterrevolutionaries? The working class and the majority of the people are the only forces that can legitimize Poland's government as socialist. To intervene militarily against them implies not defending socialism but damaging its most important force, the protagonist of revolution and of the building of a socialist society: it means, therefore, working against the cause of socialism.

The PCI is on the side of the working class and the workers masses and is for a socialist society, which can be based only on their initiative, on their participation and on their broad consensus. This is how we fulfill our internationalist and national duty to be always on the side of socialism, promoting its class essence, its ideals, its image and its prestige. It is not we who have worked against the interests of socialism, then, but those responsible for a socioeconomic and political line that prompted a people to reject an authoritative and mistaken system of organization and government practice imposed from above, within the framework of a harsh restriction and nullification of national sovereignty and feeling.

We are convinced -- for a number of historical, political and economic reasons and because of a number of recurrent tragic disappointments -- that the Polish crisis was and still is so profound that it demands an equally profound and bold renewal. Of course pluralism can and must take different forms from country to country, according to varying traditions and national conditions. But at all events only a democratic arrangement, in forms suited to the various situations, can permit the expression of the various social and economic, trade union, religious, cultural and political needs and ensure the masses' consensus and the workers' vigorous and committed contribution to production and cultural development, to the building of a new kind of society and to their own country's policy.

We do not deny, and have indeed always promptly stressed, the negative role played in Polish events -- at the opposite pole from the dogmatists and conservatives -- by extremist and adventurist groups; nor are we surprised that enemies of socialism and provocateurs have also been active. Why, indeed, did they establish such a strong foothold within the Polish working class? The real fundamental issue that has emerged is this: It was considered unacceptable for the renewal process to challenge the model (its essential structures and the ideological system on which it rests) on which that society was based and for that model to be actually changed by introducing elements of political and institutional democracy, of pluralism and of real participation in the management of power. One symptom of this was the absurd insistence that the new trade union's rules ratify the party's leading role within the trade union, whereas this was not only an entirely questionable principle but a mere assertion which was certainly not likely in fact to facilitate a gradual and difficult recovery of party influence and prestige among the workers masses.

The need for renewal, acknowledged within the Polish United Workers Party Central Committee itself, was asserted but in fact action was taken to nullify [riassorbire] all the substantial innovative elements introduced into the life of Polish society by a broad and profound movement of the workers and peoples masses. Action was taken to prevent a qualitative change of direction in the socialist building process in Poland. A major influence in this direction has been exerted both by domestic conservative resistance and outside pressure from the Soviet Union and, to various extents and in various forms, from other Warsaw Pact countries. The result has been a lamentable outcome, unacceptable from the viewpoint of socialism, which certainly has not created the most favorable conditions for resolving the economic and political crisis.

2. The charge leveled at us of disregard for or ignorance of the historical gains of the Russian socialist revolution, the building a new societies and the gains of socialism is entirely unfounded, that is, based on arbitrary amputation and falisification of our documents. Our acknowledgement of these things is embodied in all our documents, including the most recent ones. In this regard you only have to recall Comrade Berlinguer's remarks at his Strasbourg press conference and his report and conclusions at the latest session of our Central Committee.

With the October Revolution, with the subsequent liberation processes and with the building of new kinds of society no longer based on capitalist foundations, a large section of the world escaped from the capitalist logic, from the quest for the maximum private profit as the ultimate aim and governing factor of the economy, from class exploitation and from the imperialist domination and exploitation of the colonial peoples.

We are not unaware of the many positive aspects of the socialist-oriented societies. We consider the Soviet Union's contribution to the antifascist struggle and the antifascist war -- in which it lost 20 million lives -- and to the victory over nazism of fundamental importance for the future of mankind. The world's structure has changed. Imperialism is no longer the dominant force and can no longer do whatever it wants. In the era of nuclear weapons the safeguarding of peace is not only the supreme asset but an absolute necessity if we want to avoid mankind's suicide. In the struggle for peace, for all people's independence and against the underdevelopment and famine that still afflict such a large proportion of mankind, new conditions have been and are still being created and new and original paths are being opened up for the advance and building of socialism -- paths which, under our conditions, we believe can and must be peaceful and democratic -- always within the necessary context of the safeguarding of peace.

But -- to restate the case briefly -- for some time we have been faced with a number of fundamental questions. What is the origin of the crises that explode from time to time in this or that socialist-oriented society?

When we read the part of the PRAVDA article devoted to an exaltation of "the life of real socialism today, so rich, dynamic and forward-looking toward further progress"; of societies in which "impressive programs for the development of production forces are starting to be implemented" and in which "life is pulsing at full rate and brightly," we are reminded of the following excerpt from Togliatti's Yalta memorandum:

"It is incorrect to talk about the socialist countries (including the Soviet Union) as if things always go well in them.... Indeed, in all the socialist countries new difficulties, contradictions and problems are continually emerging, and they must be portrayed as they really are. The worst thing that can be done is to give the impression that everything always goes well, when we suddenly find ourselves confronted with the need to talk about difficult situations and to explain them.... In many cases one has the impression that differences of opinion exist within the leadership groups, but it is not clear whether this is really so or what the differences are. Perhaps it might be useful if in some cases there were open debates on topical issues, involving the leaders too, even in the socialist countries. It would certainly help increase the authority and prestige of the socialist system itself."

When Togliatti wrote this (in 1964) the Czechoslovak crisis (1969) and the Polish crises (1970, 1976 and 1980) had not yet occured. Khrushchev's secret report to the 20th CPSU Congress and the confirmation of a ruthless critique at the 22d Congress had taken place.

What is curious and paradoxical is that when we ask questions about or issue criticisms of the conditions and models of the Soviet Union or another socialist country or we condemn their lamentable actions (such as the invasions of Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan and the pressures on Poland) our criticisms are rejected without any serious analysis of the facts or convincing arguments, are considered "slanderous" and "offensive" and branded as help we allegedly give to the imperialist and reactionary forces. But at the same time, when a crisis occurs in a socialist country -- Poland, for instance -- it is suddenly revealed to the world public that the development (and investments) plan was entirely wrong during the seventies; that there were in that country scandalous social inequalities and even situations of privilege and phenomena of corruption within the party and the public administration, and the Poles themselves go as far as to change almost all their leaders and adopt measures -- which we consider disconcerting -- such as Gierek's expulsion from the party, the initiation of penal court proceedings against him and his incarceration. Do these facts and their lengthy concealment -- behind a false and affected portrayal of real conditions in a socialist society -- not harm the cause of socialism and peace? Is it not this very kind of behavior -- the substitution of propaganda that often embellishes real conditions and that has not always avoided a return to the "personality cult" condemned at the 20th CPSU Congress -- is it not this very kind of behavior that above all generates skepticism and discredit, alienates the workers from the party and from the bodies of socialist power, lowers political morale and commitment and exerts a negative influence even on productivity? The truth is inseparable from revolutionary intensity. We have confidence in the vast revolutionary and pregressive forces of the entire world; we are convinced that by means of serious investigation and by speaking the language of truth, the revolutionary and progressive forces will make mankind take a further leap forward along the path of socialism, freedom and peace.

[Remainder of the item printed in italics] Let us return to the ineluctable question: What is the source of the crises that periodically explode in this or that socialist-oriented country? Are they always prompted by imperialist "conspiracies?" Are they always "conspiracies by internal counterrevolutionary forces which exploit certain errors," and so forth? (These things do occur, and nobody knows this better than we, who live surrounded by adversaries and enemies, who have to deal with the tragedy of terrorism and an obscure armed party; but if we weaken, if our crises explode, we must seek the decisive reasons within ourselves.) Is there not, therefore, in the crises that have exploded in history the relationship between the workers and the production process; the real participation of the workers and of all citizens in defining, at all levels and in all forums, the production and economic guidelines; the real participation of the workers, of all citizens, in the political debate and in defining the policy line; the freedom of cultural research and expression and the spread of ideas?

When we talk about the indissoluble link that must bind democracy and socialism, whereby socialism must be the fullest and most effective form of democracy, we do not in the least intend to present and propose to other countries (whose objective and historical conditions are entirely different from those of our country or of other countries with a political tradition of parliamentary democracy that has been consolidated over the decades) anything like a model of our own. We are struggling to advance along our own path. But in the most varied forms -- based on the conditions that have historically come about in each country -- democracy and socialism must be combined; democracy within the production process and political democracy. The major innovations of the 20th CPSU Congress demanded reforms in this direction: In his Yalta memorandum (1964) Togliatti issued the following appeal:

"The problem to which most attention is being devoted with regard to both the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries is now, however, chiefly the problem of transcending the regime of limitation and suppression of democratic and personal freedoms established by Stalin.... The general impression is of slowness in and resistance to a return to the Leninist norms, which guaranteed, both within and outside the party, broad freedom of expression and debate in the fields of culture and art and also in the political field. We always proceed from the idea that socialism is the system in which the workers have the most freedom and really participate in an organized way in the leadership of all social life."

USSR and China: Why the "No" to Dialogue?

But no progress has been made along this path: Indeed, there has been a halt and, we believe, even a regression. We are convinced that if the communist party in these countries is able to head a well-led reform process, crises will be avoided; and with our criticisms and sincere deliberations we want to help encourage this task of regeneration.

The PRAVDA article cites many figures to demonstrate the existence of political democracy in the USSR: 2.3 million deputies and councillors; over 30 million activists; 5.9 million members of permanent production conferences and so forth.

But we ask: In which party meeting, in which trade union or production meeting and in which soviet can the communist, the citizen, who disagrees on general political matters, express his disagreement, and where is this publicly reported -- leaving aside discussions and criticisms of individual practical or organizational aspects?

For a long time we have not seen in the Soviet Union any investigation and real criticism of something that does not function properly, of what has prompted, and is still prompting, crises in relations even with other countries and other communist parties, with Third World countries. What is the reason for the most serious crisis of all, namely the conflict with China? We have had no hesitation in criticizing and rejecting Chinese stances that we considered mistaken, but we are also convinced that the blame was not entirely on one side. We believe there would be enormous value in initiatives on both sides aimed at restoring the dialogue and surmounting the conflicts on the basis of mutual security, noninterference and mutual respect and benefit and along the main guideline of detente, peace and the autonomous position and role of the nonaligned movement.

3. The fact is that although 25 years have elapsed since the 20th Congress and the needs which it interpreted have certainly not disappeared, the guidelines it laid down and the hopes it prompted have not been reflected in political practice either within the USSR or in relations among the countries most closely tied to it. Our assessments cannot fail to take this into account. Indeed, we have never made any mystery of these opinions either in our public documents or in our direct conversations.

Our autonomy of assessment must not falter with regard to individual specific acts of Soviet foreign policy either. If we abandoned that autonomy we would be failing in our responsibility to the Italian workers and people. We regard the defense of peace as a fundamental objective of our entire foreign policy. We know there can be no secure peace without observance of the peoples' independence. In accordance with these beliefs, we have always supported those of the Soviet Government's proposals that went in this direction. We did so with the negotiation and disarmament proposals presented a year ago at the 26th CPSU Congress.

We Are Not the Ones Who Fight With Words

Of course we cannot do the same with acts that conflict with these same aims, such as the armed intervention in Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan. These acts have encountered our determined opposition. Any other option would have been inconsistent with the objectives for which we are fighting and would certainly not be part of the broad peace movement that has been growing vigorously in Europe in recent months and of which we are an active part. It must be stressed unfortunately that this movement, which vigorously opposes the arms race but which also supports all people's right to choose their own path, was dealt a heavy blow precisely by the events in Poland. As far as we are concerned, we will continue to contribute all our energies to it; even our assessments of what has happened in Poland, of relations between the USSR and its allied countries and of the need to transcend the rigid counterposition of military and ideological blocs in Europe are an essential and necessary part of our contribution to a broad movement for disarmament and peace. We must repeat again: If we had submitted to the CPSU leaders' pressures for us to attend the Paris conference of European communist parties (April 1980) which was to have begun a broad unitary European peace movement, on the one hand we would have given our endorsement to a meeting which could not, by virtue of its unilateral approach, have produced any mass movement (as experience subsequently proved) and on the other hand we would have isolated ourselves from the broad movement that has aroused and that still motivates all the West European and NATO countries.

The portrayal of our foreign policy in the PRAVDA article is the result of falsification -- and slanderous falsification, too. The division of Europe into two opposed blocs is a fact. Our objective is to surmount it, to achieve elimination of the blocs. But this is an objective that can be achieved on the following conditions: a) if detente, arms reduction and disarmament go ahead; b) if within each bloc every country develops its own initiative aimed at restoring the East-West dialogue and promoting negotiations that will lead to arms reduction -- in a balanced manner and on the basis of mutual security -- at the lowest possible level, until nuclear-free zones are created and all nuclear weapons are banned.

We have pursued this line rigorously and combatively, even in steadfast opposition to our own government, and with major political initiatives, such as, for instance, our proposal for a "moratorium" (a halt on the deployment of the Soviet SS-20's and a postponement of any decision on the Euromissiles together with the immediate start of negotiations.) We made this moratorium proposal before the NATO decision on the Euromissiles on 12 December 1979 and before Reagan's victory in the United States. We are not among those who are combative only in word: we have never said "yes" to proposals from Moscow that we considered mistaken, but we are a major political force, in both Italy and Europe, that can and must make an effective contribution to detente, disarmament and the elimination of the blocs. So much for trying to "appease" NATO.

The fact is that the initiatives taken by West European democratic forces and governments, and especially by the FRG's Social Democratic-Liberal government, have been important. This is why we are trying to forge links with all forces and all initiatives that make it possible really to influence the situation in the direction of detente and socialism.

We resolutely support a strategy of peace that will safeguard human civilization as a necessary basis of the struggle for socialism. We have always agreed with the Soviet Union when it has followed this main guideline: We have been and still are, in favor of dialogue and negotiations between the USSR and the United States; but when it has committed acts of interference, military interventions in other countries and pressure on the Nonaligned Movement, we have expressed our dissent openly. Who provides excuses for imperialism? Who criticizes actions inconsistent with the principle of safeguarding the independence and sovereignty of all people and states, and who commits acts that conflict with and harm the strategy of peace? As far as the facts are concerned, our stances coincide with those adopted throughout the world by many other peace-loving and progressive forces, which represent broad masses of people: numerous communist parties, whether in government or in opposition, numerous major trade union organizations, socialist and social democratic parties and movements of clear democratic and pacifist orientation.

The PCI has always made the anti-imperialist struggle one of the main lynchpins of its policy. It has done so by means of major mass demonstrations, solidarity initiatives and political and parliamentary action when the USSR, China, Algeria, Vietnam, Cuba, Angola, Mozambique and all other peoples subjected to the colonial yoke have been the victims of imperialist action. It does so now in connection with El Salvador, Nicaragua, Guatemala, Chile, Argentina and Paraguay and in the struggle against racism in South Africa, for independence in Namibia and against the military dictatorship in Turkey, in solidarity with the PLO, for the Palestinian people's national rights. We make no boast of it, because it is natural. We have always been, and we remain, on the side of the peoples fighting to choose their own future and rules for coexistence in full autonomy. We are against the policy of imperialism and of outside military interventions, because we want the peoples' free self-determination and full sovereignty and therefore oppose the repression of their legitimate aspirations. These principles are for us inseparable from our view of socialism.

It is precisely because we have always fought, and still fight, for these principles that we have adopted, and had to adopt, the stances that we announced in connection with the events in Poland. Indeed, it would be a very poor anti-imperialist struggle and a very poor defense of socialism that left the assertion of such principles, in countries such as Poland or Afghanistan, to the conservative forces of imperialism or to the reactionary forces that are quite content to take the opportunity to trample those same values elsewhere. The principles of the peoples' independence and sovereignty are and must remain -- not only in word but also in deed -- the inalienable legacy of the workers and socialist movement.

4. There is a falsified and almost grotesque portrayal also of the more general stances of the PCI, which is accused of having an "anti-Soviet" attitude and of having espoused the positions and expressions of the imperialists and "enemies of socialism." We have always rejected and still reject every attempt to dismiss the experience of the USSR and of the countries algined with it. We do not attach denigratory labels to anybody. But neither must we permit the use of such methods against us.

Our critique and our analysis of socialist society and of similar societies, though sometimes acknowledged as hypothetically legitimate, are in practice portrayed as a "defection to the camp of the forces combating socialism." This is based on a conception whereby the entire world is regarded as a rigid counterposition of two camps, between which it is necessary to choose, accepting or rejecting them en bloc. Such a conception has very little to do with the reality of the modern world, in which different forces and emergent movements, peoples, social classes and states sincerely aspire to socialism but refuse to be caged within such an oversimplified counterposition. Then there is the Nonaligned Movement, which is a major reality in the modern world, composed of states that declare their unwillingness to align with either of the opposing camps. On the basis of a simplistic and manichean outlook, any criticism or even any autonomous analysis is regarded as a hostile act. Basically what is being said is this: Whoever is not with us is against us. In the past this attitude has done much harm to the cause of socialism and of mankind.

The very idea of a single "real socialism" compared to which every other socialist idea or program is entirely unrealistic, must be rejected outright. If one holds such a position it is impossible to assert that one does not intend to propose or impose "models." What is being invoked is still a political and ideological "orthodoxy" proclaimed from a pontifical position, which has eventually transformed the teachings of scientific socialism (particularly of Marx and Lenin) from living tools of analysis and awareness of a changing reality into a dogmatic ideological system, thus returning to the idea of a leading state with a mentality of and desire for supremacy. We are witnessing the desire to rebuild around the CPSU a single center of world leadership of the communist parties and of the entire people's liberation movement. In any case, this is demonstrated by the tone and language of the PRAVDA article, characterized by intolerance and by peremptory assertions that evade an analysis of the facts and any reasoned debate.

But in conclusion we would like to add that we consider it strange and worrying that the CPSU appears not to have learned from several serious events and ruptures in the past (from Yugoslavia to China), which seriously harmed -- and still affect -- not only the cause of socialism, peace and freedom, but also the Soviet Union itself.

PCI DIRECTORATE ASSESSES DEBATE WITH MOSCOW

LD282140 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Report from the Chamber of Deputies]

[Excerpt] A meeting of the PCI Directorate devoted to a first assessment of the debate inside and outside the party following the harsh attack by Moscow and the firm reply by L'UNITA ended this afternoon. A document approved by the Directorate cites the extremely wide approval and support expressed by the rank and file not only in favor of the line condemning the events in Poland and standing for autonomy from Moscow, but also in favor of the method adopted by the party in the dispute. The discussion is to be extended and made more exhaustive, the document states, and goes on to express appreciation of the views and comments made outside the PCI and, in particular, by the Italian political forces which, apart from differing assessments and misrepresentations, now consider unwarranted prejudices and prejudgments to be unsustainable.

COMMUNIST PARTY ISSUES RESOLUTION ON POLAND

PM251427 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 13 Jan 82 pp 6-7

[Apparent text of 9 January PCE Central Committee resolution on situation in Poland]

[Text] 1. The PCE Central Committee reaffirms the initial statements by the Secretariat and the Executive Committee on the events in Poland. The establishment of a military regime in that country poses communists two problems: One, as a democratic force committed to a struggle for individual, social and national freedoms and for peace and disarmament, which cannot remain indifferent toward any event which assails these aims, wherever it may occur -- in Poland or in Turkey -- and which must express its opinion unequivocally if it wishes to assert its consistency and credibility.

The other problem confronting us is connected with our ideological conceptions and our overall Marxist, revolutionary view of the process of world transformation. The events in Poland and their antecedents, both in that country and in some others which have followed the Soviet model, require a thorough reflection which cannot be confined to criticism of specific mistakes, unconnected with the system estabished on the basis of that model.

We are not unaware of the anticommunist manipulation which imperialism is effecting, using the events in Poland, in which socialdemocratic sectors are also taking part. We are aware of the exaggeration with which a certain section of the press is presenting the repressive aspects and the number of victims, while concealing the atrocities commited in El Salvador, Turkey and other countries under imperialist inspiration.

We realize that that manipulation scandalizes and upsets not a few communists and workers, who, out of class instinct may find themselves tempted to adopt justificatory and defensive stances.

The cause of socialism cannot in fact be defended by these stances. The atrocities committed by imperialism objectively constitute an argument in favor of socialism. But when reprehensible actions are carried out in the name of socialism, we must denounce them also unreservedly, because they objectively become the most harmful propaganda in favor of imperialism; that is, in favor of the avowed enemy of the social and national liberation movements and of the cause championed by our party.

The gravest danger is that millions of human beings, disillusioned by the succession of negative phenomena occurring in the countries of "real socialism," will cease to believe in the liberating nature of communism and seek solutions in support for the policy of social democracy and of the bourgeoisie.

The future of our cause -- of the cause of the liberation of mankind and of the disappearance of the exploiting classes and of the oppression of some peoples by others -- depends on our ability to resist imperialism's policy, but also to see and explain the degenerative processes in the countries of "realsocialism" and their causes and consequences, and to distinguish ourselves from a model and practices which are moving away from our overall Marxist, revolutionary conception.

What is now generally known as Eurocommunism, although communist parties on other continents share these conceptions, intends to be a dual revolutionary class response: In the first place, to imperialism and its militarist policy of exploitation, it is also a response to the processes which endanger the ideals of communism as our founders understood them and as we understood them at the time of our joining the party. Eurocommunism is a movement of recovery and creative regeneration of Marxism, and it is on the basis of that radically assertive stance that we must judge the events in Poland and their deeper background.

2. From the outset, the PCE adopted an unequivocally favorable stance toward the movement of renewal and democratization in Poland, condemning any foreign intervention and interference.

We took as our basis the fact that it was the working class, and with it the peasants and the university people, which was leading the movement, and that its demands — principally, independent trade unions, freedom of expression and self-management -- were regarded by us as elementary in a socialist system established 30-odd years ago.

Moreover, there were very significant antecedents in Poland's recent history which proved the malfunctioning of the system. In 1956 a veritable national uprising headed by a communist leader -- Gomulka -- had occurred; in 1970 the action of the Gdansk workers, which was bloodily suppressed but it gave rise to a further change in the party and state leadership with Gierek's promotion. But none of these events gave rise to radical reforms which would democratize the system. And the unrest among the working class and the people's masses continued to incubate until it exploded in the events of September 1980, from which the Solidarity trade unions emerged. The official trade union crumbled and reforms began with the negotiations among the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR], the trade unions and the church which have not succeeded in being concluded satisfactorily.

Nevertheless, the Central Committee believes that the only possibility of a real peaceful and democratic solution continues to lie in the lifting of martial law and the resumption of the responsible dialogue among the PZPR, Solidarity and the church.

It is true that the Polish church has played a role in the government of "renewal," and that it maintains great influence among the working class and the people's masses. This fact and the presence of a Polish pope in the Vatican poses the need to examine the ultimate nature of that "renewal."

But in analyzing that process we cannot disregard a factor which runs like a thread throughout Poland's history. In that country national sentiment has been merged with the Catholic Church. The latter was the pivot of the whole struggle for national liberation against czarist imperialism and the central empires, in the former of which the Orthodox religion, and in the latter of which the Protestant religion, predominated. Thus, through a historical process which cannot be altered, the national characteristics have had a component -- Catholicism -- which explains the fact that in the new state the church has maintained a clear preeminence and has made itself a poweful social, ideological and political center of reference vis-a-vis the party and the state.

This shows why there is a clear Catholic influence in the movement of "renewal," which is continuing to have a national, as well as social, nature. And the national nature of the current crisis is caused by the fact that the revolution which proclaimed first "people's democracy" and then socialism was more an "exported" revolution than a creation of Poland's masses and internal forces. And moreover, it did not succeed in taking root deeply among the latter, because the system which was imposed was the Soviet model and not a specific model taking Polish realities into account.

From a traditional Marxist outlook, one would tend to believe that the Catholic influence must in principle impart a regressive and reactionary significance to the movement of "renewal." However, in our time, both the debate on the not necessarily alienating nature of religion and the recognition of the positive role which Christian sectors are playing in the liberation struggle oblige us to adopt an approach of greater complexity. In this connection it is to be regretted that they did not succeed in organizing in Poland an experience more open toward Christianity in the process of building socialism led by the PZPR. And it is important to point out the inability of the model applied in Poland to win over the masses, which is responsible for their alienation and for the fact that the process of "renewal" has had to take place in conflict with the PZPR.

Moreover, irrespective of the debate on the significance of the religious influence, it is a democratizing and progressive movement because of the nature of its demands and because of the class heading it.

Even accepting that counterrevolutionary elements have become involved in that movement, it is only in its development, in the functioning of an independent class trade unionism, in the implementation of self-management and in the practicing of freedom of expression and socialist democracy that a real differentiation and a reduction and isolation of the counterrevolutionary elements could be achieved.

It seems certain that counterrevolutionary elements were able to infiltrate Solidarity. But to believe that the activity of counterrevolutionary elements and imperialist agents, exploiting only some specific mistake by the party, could stir up the working class and the entire people against a socialist system, at a time of such a deep crisis of capitalism as the present, leads to the aberration which we do not accept and which in fact agrees with the bourgeois conclusions, of believing that socialism is a failed social system.

3. On the contrary, the establishment of a military regime serves to strengthen the role of the elements which wished to transform the "renewal" into a counterrevolution. A military regime which practices reprehensible repression, which shoots at workers and which tries communists and trade unionists; we know how it begins but not how it ends. In history all military regimes present themselves as temporary and are prolonged. In Poland the party has disappeared as an actual power, Solidarity has been broken up and two actual powers -- the army and the church -- survive. The military regime has objectively increased the church's political role: either it comes to terms with it and reaches agreements or it persecutes it. If it persecutes it, the church will renew and consolidate its role as leader of the national movement, strengthened, moreover, by the flag of democracy, which it did not possess so clearly until now.

In view of this situation, the PCE Central Committee declares itself in favor of the immediate restoration of the freedoms suspended by the military junta, an end to the repression and the development of the process of renewal and democratization.

The PCE Central Committee expresses its full solidarity with the workers and people of Poland.

In any event, a military regime, an army dictatorship, is a form of government totally alien to Marxism and Leninism. To say that the army is maintaining by force the power of the workers and peasants, precisely against the workers and peasants, is a nonsense which nobody can rationally maintain.

The Central Committee also declares itself in favor of the cessation of all external political and military interference.

At the same time, the Central Committee condemns the measures of retaliation adopted by President Reagan's U.S. administration. Those measures are no help to the Polish people but a scandalous manipulation of Poland's sufferings by that administration in order to assert its militarist policy and its desire to cover Europe with nuclear missiles and turn our continent into the scene of a "limited" nuclear war which would annihilate Europe; to support Begin's expansionist policy in the Near East; to cover its shameless support for the genocide practiced by the El Salvador junta; to justify its pressures against Nicaragua and Cuba, and, as a last resort, military aggression against both revolutions; to justify its support for the acts of aggression against Angola and South Africa's racist and expansionist policy; and to conceal its blessing to the military junta in Turkey.

The Central Committee calls for an attitude of vigilance in view of the danger of possible aggressive initiatives which U.S. imperialism may feel tempted to undertake, particularly on the American continent, exploiting the current situation.

In fact the initiatives from outside which may be effective for helping to resolve the Polish crisis are those which help to reduce international tension and to extricate ourselves from the dangerous path of cold war.

Economic retaliation and the interruption of the international negotiations aimed at detente can only exacerbate the situation even further. In this connection the European governments, except for that of Mrs Thatcher, are displaying a constructive attitude which contrasts with the U.S. administration's stances.

The workers, the people's masses and, above all, the communists, should be aware of the fact that what has failed in Poland is not the idea of socialism and communism but the exporting and imposition of a model and of a political and economic system at variance with Poland's real situation.

But that same experience was undergone in Czechoslovakia in 1968. There too the imposed model conflicted with the development of the production forces and with the political culture of the Czechoslovak people. Within the Czechoslovak Communist Party and in its Central Committee a movement of democratic renewal of socialism emerged which aroused great hopes among that people and also in the communist movement in the Western countries. A change in the model was begun from within the communist party which could demonstrate that the communist parties were capable of tackling the task of transforming the system of bureaucratized socialism and of imparting vitality and a new power of attraction to the socialist-type countries.

The Soviet leaders did not tolerate it, and intervened militarily to maintain the model at all costs, and since the church could not be blamed in Czechoslovakia, other scapegoats were sought.

In Poland the Soviet leadership's pressures to maintain the model at all costs, expressed in official statements and in newspaper articles, have played an indisputable role in the establishment of the military junta.

We realize that as long as the military blocs persist, the Soviet Union will regard keeping Poland in the Warsaw Pact as vital for the strategic balance. But we believe that the "renewal" and democratization were not incompatible with Poland's remaining in that pact, just as the democratization of socialism in Czechoslovkia would not have been, either.

However, there is a dynamic of the military blocs which leads to imposing the Soviet model on the Warsaw Pact countries, thus limiting their sovereignty, in the same way that in the NATO countries an attempt is made to exclude and veto the communist parties, even at the cost of violating the democratic game. All this confirms the need to surmount the system of military blocs in order to guarantee every people's independence and democracy.

4. By drawing up this extensive declaration, the PCE Central Committee is not interfering in Poland's internal affairs. The point is that the creation of a military junta in that country and other antecedents of this event in the countries of "real socialism" could jeoparidze the credibility of the communist blueprint in the eyes of the masses. Imperialism, the conservative forces and some social democratic sectors are, of course, working in this direction. But we would be deceiving ourselves if we failed to see the damage being caused to communism's prestige, even without this manipulation, purely by the events that have occurred.

We are witnessing phenomena that add further validity to our Eurocommunist option; that oblige us to carry out an even more thorough reappraisal of what we could call the traditional culture of the communist movement -- not so as to abandon Marxist revolutionary stances, but to restore them more fully, to develop them and enrich them with new experience. It is not a matter of swinging to the right, but of maintaining our leftwing stances and of reasserting them in the face of the threat of a dogmatism concerning not so much principles as obedience to the historical centers of the communist movement, which would eventually displace us from the left and transform us into mere instruments of one bloc within the other.

We still regard the Great October Revolution as the most decisive event in the human history of this era. This revolution smashed the foundation of imperialism, put an end to the capitalist system in one-sixth of the world, and imparted a thrust to the revolutionary movements both in the capitalist world and in the colonies. The system that emerged from it played a fundamental role in the defeat of Hitlerism; it imparted a thrust to the process of decolonization and the people's liberation.

The October Revolution was the response of the people and of what was then the most advanced workers party -- Lenin's party -- to the Social Democratic submission in World War I and to the reformism of the Second International. This revolution imparted a thrust to the birth of the communist parties which personified the active solidarity of the most active and aware sectors of every country's proletariat with a Soviet Russia encircled by imperialism and a response to social democracy.

The October Revolution, its example, forced the bourgeoisie of the developed countries to make major political and social concessions to the workers.

The October Revolution started the historical period of the socialist transformation of the world -- with its trials and errors, advances and sometimes regressions -- and imparts its imprint to the entire contemporary liberation movement. It imparted an enormous impetus to human progress of all kinds; it created a kind of state and ownership relations that played a profoundly revolutionary role in the world.

But under Stalin's leadership this kind of state, having ceased to be a bourgeois state responsible for defending capitalist ownership, did not succeed in becoming what in Marxist terminology is known as the organized proletariat as the ruling class, in other words, a true workers' democracy. It is a state that places itself above society, that has institutionalized a bureaucracy that decides everything. The history of the Soviet political model shows that in practice the party, while believing that it dominates the state apparatus, has become devoured by it: This is a danger that sooner or later faces all systems that have suppressed political pluralism. The model to which we are referring has produced the phenomenon that all democratic debate has been excluded from the party and that congresses and conferences are reduced to a purely formal and propagandist ritual. The party thus becomes a vast bureaucratic setup which the masses see more as an instrument of power than as a revolutionary vanguard.

Lenin and the revolutionary leaders saw and denounced this danger in the early years, aware of the difficulties of building a complete socialist system in such a backward country. But under Stalin's leadership the existing achievement was treated theoretically as complete socialism and the transition to communist society was announced. Since this did not reflect the truth, the theory became an ideology -- in the pejorative meaning that Marxism attaches to the term -- so that in fact a gulf appeared between theory and practice, in contrast with the principles that must govern a communist party's action.

And this model was exported, imposed on other countries, forgetting Lenin's opinion concerning the diversity of forms of transition to socialism.

The 20th CPSU Congress created great hopes of democratization of the system, flexibility of relations between the USSR and the other socialist-type countries in the direction of autonomy, the elimination of the concept of the leading party and the acceptance of the parties' independence and of manifold democratic roads to socialism, as well as the different forms that socialism can take. But these hopes were short lived and remained restricted to the mere criticism of Stalin's personality cult, which did not extend to the root of the problem, namely, the model, the system.

And what has happened? The manual or intellectual worker who has not yet succeeded in receiving from society pay "according to his work" -- in accordance with the classic socialist formula -- who lives under difficult conditions; who is suffering the consequences of bureaucratic structures; who is excluded from all important social decisions, which are imposed by the partystate, which seems omnipotent to him: This worker, who has still not emerged from his alienation, cannot feel in control of power, even under socialism, though he is not exploited by private capitalists.

In fact the exacerbation of the economic crisis in Poland has highlighted the contradiction between a political system, a model of a bureaucratized state that controls and decides everything over society's heads, and the interests and desire of society, of the workers, for participation, for decisionmaking power and socialist self-management.

This contradiction could also manifest itself in the countries that have implemented the same model and that have achieved a certain level of social, economic and cultural development, with a danger of imparting the appearance of a failure of the idea of communism to what is simply the exhaustion of a model political system which stemmed in practice from the exercise of power by a single party under conditions of inadequately developed production forces economically and was militarily harassed by the capitalist forces -- a system which continued to reproduce itself even when conditions were different and when it was objectively becoming an obstacle to the development of socialism and communism.

The fact that this system was in fact created in practice and was perhaps difficult to avoid under specific historical conditions but was nevertheless defined as the real and loftiest realization of the socialism envisaged by Marx and Engels means that at the base of the traditional culture of the communist movement there is an ideological distortion that the PCE began to transcend years ago, advancing toward a restoration of the profoundly creative values of the revolutionary Marxism, which now takes specific form in the concept now known as "Eurocommunism."

5. The present situation leads us to the clear conclusion that the form of organizing the revolutionary movement -- which emerged in response to the historical filaure of the Second, social democratic, International -- centered on the October 1917 revolution in Russia, which took shape in Comintern, then Cominform and later the communist parties' international conferences, is definitively obsolete.

Our party has reached this conclusion in practice starting with the Czechoslovak events of 1968. Even at the 1969 international communist parties' conference it was clear that the PCE was abandoning any kind of special relations with the CPSU, and it has not veered from this line. There has been no break in relations with the CPSU. In the international field we have maintained full independence and have intensified relations with the parties closer to us in thought. We have criticized all initiatives which in our opinion conflicted with the ideals of communism, and as a result we, as a party, have been the object of repeated attacks on the part of communist parties that consider the Soviet model the most advanced form of socialism possible.

The events in Poland confirm a number of our fundamental Eurocommunist ideas, which transcend the distortions introduced into the communist movement's culture and which recover the revolutionary Marxist theoretical heritage -- ideas which we wish to sum up in this resolution in the following very specific points:

A) The assertion of the values of democracy and therefore of pluralism in the organization of state power, which presupposes the transcending of the idea of the "workers and peasant state," the "dictatorship of the proletariat," and the "state apparatus merged with the party apparatus" and its replacement with the idea of the democratic hegemony of the forces of labor and culture, of a new historic bloc that will rally all the revolutionary forces and forces of social progress.

This idea presupposes the establishment of universal suffrage and various other forms of participation by the social and mass movements in political decisionmaking; the maintenance of the state's secular character, with regard to both religion and philosophy; acceptance of the interplay of majorities and minorities by means of a plurality of parties and alternation in power; the stubborn defense of individual and collective rights and freedoms including the freedoms of association, speech and the press, religious freedom and the freedom to strike; and the recognition of national and regional characteristics.

In Spain this means the unrestricted implementation of the rights and duties of all kinds enshrined in the 1978 constitution.

B) Coexistence for a lengthy historical period of forms of state and private ownership, which will place the principal mainstays of the economy in public hands, so that complete state ownership will be the result not of voluntarist government measures which would destroy production forces and services useful to society, but of the real development of the production forces and of the extension of socialist awareness.

C) The establishment of workers' self-management in the enterprises so that they will feel the masters of, and responsible for, their development, which is in no way incompatible with democratic planning.

D) Part of this conception is the communist party's role as a vanguard party, not because this characteristic is granted to it by any kind of affiliation of formal self-appointment, but by virtue of its real ability to implement Marxism in a revolutionary and creative way; a communist party that does not consider itself to be the workers masses' sole representative, which recognizes in theory and practice the representativeness of other socialist and progressive parties and the role of the social movements, a PCE which, by accepting this, recognizes the plurality of social trends and does not aspire to a power monopoly, much less to a merging of state and party.

The PCE is no longer regarded as an "army" or a "general staff," but as a vanguard political force composed of aware and responsible men and women who express, discuss and compare their ideas freely, but who also unite freely and fraternally around the party program, who regard the party itself as the most valuable tool in the struggle to emancipate the workers, who recognize organization and relations with the masses as a fundamental element of their political action and unity of action and discipline with respect to the congress' decisions -- and between congresses with respect to the decisions of the higher bodies -- as essential for the efficiency of the political struggle.

The communist party recognizes that, apart from the collective political tasks shared by all its members, each member is entirely free with regard to his personal preferences, his membership of progressive social movements, his intellectual or artistic inclinations and his private life. It also recognizes that in the field of theory, culture and art or of scientific research different schools of thought can coexist within it and that they must all have the opportunity to express themselves freely in its organs and cultural publications. The communist party defines itself as a nonconfessional party which can embrace atheists, agnostics and believers.

The communist party as such decides only on matters of revolutionary strategy and political tactics.

The communist party does not aim to become the dominant force of the state or to impose its ideology as the official state ideology. The communist party's mission is to ensure that the forces of labor and culture, in all their diversity, democratically gain sociopolitical hegemony. Hence the importance that the communist party attaches to the policy of alliance among the leftwing and progressive forces and in the future to what we have called "the new political grouping."

We communists are internationalists. Our active solidarity is exercised and will continue to be exercised with all social and national liberation movements, with all those struggling for peace, disarmament and cooperation among the peoples.

The crisis in the various forms of international organization [articulacion] centered on the CPSU and the failure of the social democratic international experience creates the need for a quest for new forms of solidarity and internationalist cooperation. The creativity demonstrated by Marxists at the time of the Zimmerwald and Kiental conferences must be repeated today, adapted, of course, to the new historical tasks facing progressive manking.

The continuation of the revolutionary process begun in October 1917 within the late 20th century, learning from all the experiences of the past, creates the need to transcend not only traditional social democratic culture but also the distortions of the traditional culture of the communist movement. This is an exciting and creative task in which, in today's world, there should be a rallying of communists, socialists and revolutionary liberation movements -- that is, of all those anxious really to transform this society, in which it is capitalism that is actually failing and in which the need for socialist transformations is an objective fact.

The objective need to advance toward socialist solutions is more evident in Europe during the present crisis, which is affecting the economic structures, model of development and culture that have hitherto dominated. This objective need must lead to the crystalization of the European left.

By saying this we are not envisaging any kind of "Eurocentrism." On the contrary, we believe that this path cannot be pursued except by means of equal-based and democratic cooperation with the Third World revolutionary and progressive forces and subsequently with all international forces of that kind.

In this way Europe and the other developed countries, together with the Third World countries experiencing revolutionary changes, could impart a new thrust that would advance the socialist changes begun in 1917 both in the capitalist world and in socialist-type countries along different and multifaceted paths.

The pressing need to struggle for peace, the peoples' independence, democracy and a new world economic order, the struggle for a world without exploiter classes or oppressed peoples, a world of solidarity in which the sums now squandered on weapons would be spent on prosperity and culture, demands combined efforts from all workers, communist, socialist and progressive parties and from all liberation movements, in new forms of internationalist organization.

This means more flexible and borader forms of organization, independent of the military blocs and not aligned with state policies to achieve this kind of organization, which will not happen overnight and will require prolonged efforts. It will be necessary to create centers of influence on an international level, which in no way implies the formation of any centers of international leadership or of a new international.

We Spanish communists procede along this path from the principle that the victory of socialism worldwide cannot be the victory of one bloc over another, it cannot come from the military defeat of any state, it must be the result of a process of displacement of the exploiter classes from each country through the efforts and deliberate struggle of each people and internationalist political solidarity.

The Central Committee is determined to develop and support all initiatives likely to lead to this new kind of organization and to create the center or centers of internationalist action that will facilitate this objective.

At the same time the PCE aims to develop and extend its bilateral relations with all communist, socialist and progressive parties and with the liberation movements with a view to maintaining ties of solidarity and working in the direction mentioned.

A communist party, a workers' party, faced with the revolutionary movement's new problems, cannot retreat within its own borders, limit its policy to the confines of a kind of nationalist autarky. There is now no political or social movement, even among the bourgeoisie, that has no internationalist ties.

The Central Committee raises still higher the flag of internationalist solidarity, of Marxist internationalism, which is inseparable from the cause of the workers, from the ideal of communism and socialism.

We are in a period of transition, in which mankind is faced with two paths: war and a return to barbarism or the advance to a freer, more just and more egalitarian world, in accordance with the principles of creative and revolutionary Marxism, which we are determined to fully recover.

'Renewalists' Comment

PM251211 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 13 Jan 82 p 15

[Joaquina Prades report]

[Text] The "renewalist" Eurocommunist sector of the PCE regards as "merely acceptable" the Central Committee's official statement on the events in Poland, published on Monday. The "renewalist" objections -- according to what some of their most prominent spokesmen told EL PAIS yesterday -- come down essentially to the failure to announce the severance of relations with the Polish United Workers' Party [PZPR] and the incomplete explanation, in their opinion, concerning the PCE's future relationship with the European parties.

The "renewalists" stated that they find the above-mentioned Central Committee resolution -- in whose approval they did not take part because, apart from very few exceptions, they were recently expelled from that Communist leadership body -- "merely acceptable," since they believe that at the same time as publishing that statement, the PCE should have announced the official severance of relations with the PZPR, "just as it happened," they add, "when Soviet troops invaded Czechoslovakia in 1968."

The other objection of this sector of the PCE concerns the fact that, when the PCI published its official resolution on the Polish events a few days ago, it was clearly specified that "from this moment the PCI will give no preferential treatment to other East European communist countries," which means in practice that the same treatment will be given in the future to a labor or social democratic party, for instance, as to one of the communist parties of the Warsaw Pact countries.

In the specific instance of the PCE, the "renewalists" assert that this point was not clearly specified -- something which they attribute to "Santiago Carrillo's good relations with Romania's Ceausescu and the satrap or North Korea, Kim Il-song," to use Alberto Infante's exact words. In the PCE Central Committee statement, this specific reference is confined to the CPSU and not extended to the other communist parties: "At the 1969 international conference of communist parties," the Spanish Communists' official statement says verbatim, "It was already clear that our party was abandoning any privileged relationship with the CPSU, and it has not departed from that course."

"There has been no severance of relations with the CPSU; in the international field we have maintained full independence," it continues, "and we have intensified relations with those parties closer to us in thinking."

For his part, the PCE's new press secretary, Enrique Curiel, told this newspaper that "our party made that statement about no preferential treatment for any other party following the invasion of Prague. All that the PCI has done now is to emulate the PCE, only with a few years' delay."

Agreement Between Carrillo and Enrico Berlinguer

Both communiques -- the PCI's and the PCE's -- concerning the events in Poland are the result of an agreement between the two parties reached in December at a meeting in Rome between PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo and PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer.

The only "renewalist" who has not been expelled from the Central Committee -- Valencia Deputy Emerito Bono -- told EL PAIS that "these omissions do in fact exist, but I believe that, if practice is consistent with what is stated in the document, both actions will be carried out in the near future."

Another of the factors of recent unease among the "renewalists" was the fact that the party's profound internal crisis was not discussed at the last Central Committee plenum, "especially," one of them said, "when something as important as the resignation of 41 municipal councillors in Madrid Province has occurred." "Although it is true that it did not figure on the agenda," the same source added, "it could perfectly well have been debated in the question and answer session, if Carrillo had not prevented it."

The "renewalists'" political activity entails for the present remaining in the PCE at all costs. In the meantime they are beginning to see that between an "externally Eurocommunist and internally Stalinist" PCE and a Spanish Socialist Workers Party which is "necessarily very moderate because of its pacts with the government," a political area is opening up which might be termed the "pivot of the left."

CALVO-SOTELO SAYS NO TO EARLY CORTES ELECTIONS

LD282230 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Text] The prime minister still intends to hold elections in 1983, according to a statement by the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] parliamentary group spokesman, Lamo de Espinosa. The decision was made during a cabinet session held to analyze the situation of the UCD following the defection of three of its members. According to Lamo de Espinosa, at no point in the meeting was the possibility of dissolving parliament considered. Now, the UCD spokesman said, the UCD will have to review each of the pending bills one by one to determine the possibility of getting them through parliament in view of the balance of forces in congress.

DEFENSE MINISTRY WILL NOT PROSECUTE FORSVAR

PM271601 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 26 Jan 82 p 4

[Text] Copenhagen — The Defense Ministry has decided that charges of spying will not be made against the magazine FORSVAR, which is critical of Danish defense policy and revealed the existence of secret military listening stations and published pictures of one of the stations. Legal experts persuaded the ministry not to prosecute when it came to light that military personnel at the station in question had sent Christmas cards with pictures of the same antennae.

PRESIDENT CLOSES 1981 PARLIAMENTARY SESSION

LD281738 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1400 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Text] President Mauno Koivisto hopes for a speedy solution to the problem of the government. Speaking at the closing session of the 1981 parliamentary session, President Koivisto said he hoped that a new administration, capable of foreign and domestic political action, could be appointed without undue delay for the rest of the election period.

The solemn closing of last year's session took place in the parliamentary building this afternoon. During his speech, Speaker Johannes Virolainen stressed the parliament's activity in legislative work. In Virolainen's view, the work in the just ended session was made easier by the broad-based majority government.

[Begin Virolainen recording] During the last parliamentary session, the work has been made easier by the fact that there was a broad-based majority government in the country. The government submitted to the parliament several important bills, on the basis of which many important legislative measures were concluded. Among them, I want to mention regional law reform which, it is hoped, will make it possible to level differences in regional development more effectively than before. The resources which, within the framework of our limited [word indistinct], can be directed to regional development, will yield good results in future. I am convinced of this. [end recording]

After Virolainen's speech, President Koivisto officially closed the 1981 parliamentary session. In his speech President Koivisto stressed the stability of Finland's foreign political line.

[Begin Koivisto recording] Finland's foreign political position has remained stable during the past parliamentary session, despite the worrying growth of international tension. The confidence of foreign powers in the continuity of Finland's foreign policy on the well-known and established Paasikivi-Kekkonen line is strong, as we have been able to see from the many statements made in connection with the change of president. We feel great gratitude to President Urho Kekkonen and his life's work. It is our most important task to nurture the foreign political heritage he has left us and to follow the path he laid out. [end recording]

The 1982 parliamentary session will be opened Wednesday, 3 February. The speakers will be elected the day before that. After the start of the new session, discussions on forming the new government will also be started officially.

SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC LEADER TO VISIT USSR 1 FEB

PM281301 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 23 Jan 82 p 13

[Text] Social Democratic Party Chairman Kalevi Sorsa will travel to Moscow 1 February. During his visit he will probably meet Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev, Social Democratic Party headquarters announced on Friday [22 January]. Sorsa will lead a delegation representing the Socialist International's disarmament group. The delegation will include representatives of social democrats in Finland, West Germany, Austria, Britain, France, the Netherlands, Spain, Japan and Venezuela.

Talks with the Soviet hosts will be held 2-4 February. They will deal with international questions and with disarmament endeavors, the CSCE follow-up meeting in Madrid and Poland in particular. Sorsa visited the United States with a similar delegation in November last year. There were talks with representatives of the U.S. leadership, and Sorsa also met UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim. Sorsa will return from Moscow 5 February.

According to reports, two CPSU representatives will arrive in Helsinki next week to make preparations for Sorsa's visit to Moscow. However, political circles incline to the view that the most important reason for Vitaliy Shaposhnikov and Stefan Smirnov's visit is to negotiate with the Finnish Communist Party about the situation within the party. Shaposhnikov is deputy chief of the CPSU's international section, and Smirnov works in the party Central Committee.

FRANCE'S CHEYSSON TO VISIT EARLY FEBRUARY

PM271147 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 21 Jan 82 p 6

[Text] Paris, 20 Jan -- French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson has accepted an invitation to visit Sweden 4 and 5 February. This was announced in Paris Wednesday [20 January] in connection with Swedish Riksdag Speaker Ingemund Bengtsson's official visit to his French counterpart. If the dispute between SAS and Air France is not settled in the next 2 weeks it is likely that Swedish Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten will raise the matter with Cheysson.

Cheysson has had an open invitation for a long time. The fact that he has now decided to accept the invitation does not mean that the dispute between the two airlines is thougnt to be so urgent that a visit is necessary. But last week Ola Ullsten wrote to Cheysson asking him for assistance in getting the deadlocked negotiations moving again. On Wednesday Ingemund Bengtsson ended a 2-day visit to Paris with a meeting with French Premier Pierre Mauroy. He also met with his French counterpart, Louis Mermaz, and French Senate Speaker Alain Poher.

DENKTAS REJECTS PAPANDREOU'S CALL FOR UNITY

TA281553 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1520 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Text] Lefkosa, 28 Jan (AA) -- President Rauf Denktas of the Turkish Federated State said either a partnership is formed on Cyprus, or the former partners go on living side by side. He made the comment in reaction to a statement by Greek Premier Papandreou, who called for a nonaligned unitary Cyprus where Turkish and Greek Cypriots would coexist, with equal rights. Denktas noted so-called equal rights existed in history for the Turkish communities in Greece and in Rhodes, and that kind of equality was unacceptable for the Turkish Cypriot community.

DENKTAS CRITICIZES UN HANDLING OF WEAPONS ISSUE

TA281332 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Excerpt] President Rauf Denktas made a statement in connection with the [weapons] issue this morning in which he harshly criticized the United Nations. He said that at the meeting he had yesterday with the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, Hugo Gobbi, it was determined that the announcement and explanation offered on the subject by the UN representative -- in an inappropriate manner -- were not true. Because the arms and ammunition in Athalassa, which should be under UN control, were no longer there, another UN statement was needed to clarify the situation. Denktas continued: The announcement proves that an earlier statement by the UN spokesman was not accurate and that undiplomatic language was used in the statement. I hope the UN authorities will take the necessary steps on this subject.

The last UN declaration affirms that the arms and ammunition that should be under UN control are no longer there. Despite this, no explanations have been offered as to how, over so many years, the United Nations lost control of the arms and ammunition. This proves the UN tendency to coverup some truths if it so desires. This is a regrettable example. We cannot agree that only a very small quantity of ammunition is missing. We have lost our trust. This is a very regrettable development.

In reply to a question on the amount of arms in question, Denktas said the figures reported by a Turkish daily has to be accepted as true until proven otherwise. Denktas said that the UN authorities must deal with the issue much more carefully and added: One of the tasks of the UN authorities is to prevent such developments. However, the UN statements have tried to cover up the incident. We are sorry about that.

KIPRIANOU RETURNS; REPORTS ON ATHENS TALKS

NC282220 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 28 Jan 82

In a statement, President Kiprianou expressed full satisfaction with his talks with the Greek Government, which he added, were fruitful and very useful. [Begin recording] I return from my visit to Athens fully satisfied with everything. The talks with the Greek Government were fruitful and extremely useful. Not only did we have the opportunity to reconfirm the joint line we laid down during the first meeting with Papandreou when he assumed power, but we had the opportunity to enter into more details and to program in detail the next steps in view of possible developments. I wish to emphasize once more the unstinting support of Greece, particularly that of the government and of Prime Minister Papandreou, for the struggle by Cyprus for liberty and justice.

During my stay in Athens I had the opportunity to meet with the president of Greece and briefed him on the latest developments in the Cyprus problem. I also had the opportunity to meet with the new leader of the official opposition, Amerof, as well as the leader and the secretary general of the KKE, Florakis, and other political personalities and party leaders. There is absolutely no doubt that interest in Cyprus, which has always existed in Greece, is increasing and more alive. This is due to the more determined support of the Greek Government. The talks were conducted in an atmosphere of cordiality, and there was a concord of views both in our evaluations and reports and in the further handling of the issue. When I say concord of views — since this is often the object of criticism or even, often, of ironic comments — this is a fact and not a figure of speech. Greece's support is a fact. It is decisive and, as we have declared repeatedly, it is the main support in the struggle we are waging.

During our talks we reviewed the latest developments in the dialogue being conducted, and we also dealt with the efforts being made on the part of both the Greek Government and the Cyprus Government in the international arena to promote our national issue. There is full agreement that the time limits for the dialogue must be exhausted, because the dialogue is now entering a critical phase, in order to establish beyond any possible doubt to what extent it will be possible to make any progress; in other words, a change in the Turkish position and abandonment of its well-known philosophy. If this does not become possible within a reasonable time — in a few months — then most certainly the next step, as determined during earlier contacts in Athens and also as decided on by the Cyprus National Council and the Ministerial Council, the next step will be a Cyprus appeal at the UN General Assembly.

Among other things, we also discussed the question of what our specific goal must be in any new appeal. This was the subject of consultations, and it will continue to be the subject of consultations. We will conclude our consultations on this subject and we will draw conclusions, after I first brief the National and Ministerial councils, with Prime Minister Papandreou during his visit to Nicosia, which, despite all the rumors, will take place on 27 and 28 February and 1 March. As stated earlier, this is the first such visit by a Greek prime minister to Cyprus, and apart from the symbolic significance, which proves the great interest of Greece in Cyprus, this visit will also be of a basic significance. Within the framework of the evaluations and estimates made, I must emphasize that we agree totally both on the fact that the recent artificial tension created both in Greece and in Cyprus around possible Turkish activities is artificial and that there must be absolutely no concern. No panic is justifiable in any way. I believe Turkey will in no way be allowed to proceed with any plans which could create irregularities.

For our part, it is a fact that we aspire to a solution of the Cyprus problem through peaceful procedures. We want a peaceful solution to the Cyprus problem. We agree fully with the Greek Government that our irrevocable goal is to guarantee an absolutely independent Cyprus Republic, with its territorial integrity, sovereignty, unity and nonaligned character ensured. We agree that the internal structure must be a federation, and we also agree that the inalienable rights of the citizens must be guaranteed, both human rights and basic liberties, including the inalienable right of the refugees to return to their ancestral hearths as well as the rights of free settlement, free movement and property.

We also discussed many other current issues related to the promotion of our national cause and other matters related to the Cyprus problem and with what has taken place. During the last day, at a private meeting with the Greek prime minister, we exchanged views on the opening of the Cyprus dossier. There is agreement on this matter — that this dossier of treason must be opened not only for historical reasons and, naturally, not for the purpose of persecuting those who possibly were influenced by national slogans, but for prosecuting the leading perpetrators of the Cyprus tragedy. There is no reneging on this matter, just as there is no reneging on any other matter.

The assistance of Greece is, and it will continue to be, multifaceted in all sectors without exception. We have established that despite the fact that there are many problems in the world today facing mankind, interest in the Cyprus problem is growing. This is a good omen, because it offers us the opportunity to promote it even further internationally. In parallel with the dialogue being conducted, whose future we cannot predetermine -- since on the basis of the facts of the moment it is questionable whether it will produce results and, as a result, the next step will be an appeal to the United Nations -- in parallel, the effort for internationalization will be continued on the part of both the Greek and Cyprus governments. What I would like to stress particularly is the fact that there is full coordination between the Greek and Cyprus governments; coordination of actions and programming. This is extremely important for the future of our national cause.

The message I bring back after the talks in Athens is that Greece is the main support, as I stated earlier, of our struggle for liberty and justice, and to the degree that this depends on the Greek Government within the framework of possibilities, within the framework of the broader foreign policy of the Greek Government, the Greek Government will do everything possible, because it considers the Cyprus problem a basic and fundamental problem, a problem on which depends not only the future of Cyprus but also the future of relations between Greece and Turkey. Consequently, an unsatisfactory solution of the Cyprus problem, the perpetuation of the current situation, will without a doubt -- and this is fully understood -- will have an effect on the progress of Hellenism. At the same time, an unsatisfactory solution will result in continued conflagration and friction in this delicate area of the Mediterranean.

I repeat, I am fully satisfied with every aspect of the talks because there was not only a reaffirmation of the agreed-upon line, the jointly-laid-down line since Prime Minister Papandreou assumed power, but simultaneously we entered into a detailed, brotherly dialogue, as Papandreou himself stated, between the governments of Greece and Cyprus on what must be done as the next steps toward promoting the cause of Cyprus, always with the goal of guaranteeing the prerequisites for survival and justification.

I firmly believe this visit was extremely useful from every aspect and that it is a useful preamble to the Greek prime minister's visit to Cyprus, when it is expected there will be a conclusion to our talks in regard to planning for the forthcoming steps. [end recording]

Answering questions, the president stated the Greek Government believes that in a solution the form of guarantees must be broader and must include the independence and territorial integrity of Cyprus. President Kiprianou stated that Papandreou explained that by a "redefinement" he meant the new Greek Government's activities within the various organizations to which it belongs in respect to its role as basically a country interested in putting an end to the occupation of Cyprus. This does not mean he is taking a position against the dialogue now being conducted. For the Cyprus side, he continued, there is no question of a redefinement. The basis for the intercommunal dialogue consists of the UN resolutions and the summit agreements. Within the framework of the dialogue it is natural that there should be discussion of the UN evaluation. We maintain our positions, and absolutely no harm can come from discussion of the evaluations, he added. We have an obligation to provide some understandable time limit so it may be established beyond any doubt who will be responsible for a possible impasse in the talks. Our own side will be free to undertake its own intiatives. The missing persons is a special issue for discussion with the UN secretary general and the Greek prime minister. Papandreou is particularly interested in the missing persons, as we are. Kiprianou also said he discussed the question of the enclaved [persons] and measures to be adopted.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE UPHOLDS TURKEY'S MEMBERSHIP

TA282019 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Text] The Council of Europe Consultative Assembly today approved a draft resolution drawn up by its Political Committee and envisaging Turkey's continued membership in the council. The resolution was approved by 68 votes to 41 votes during a vote held at the Consultative Assembly this evening. Five members abstained.

The resolution notes that the continuation of Turkey's membership to the Council of Europe would be useful from the viewpoint of observing the restoration of democratic institutions in Turkey. The resolution also recalls that member countries have the right to apply to the council organs in connection with the developments in Turkey.

KREISKY MAY RESIGN BEFORE NEXT ELECTIONS

AU291101 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 29 Jan 82 p 1

[Excerpt] Vienna (APA) -- Chancellor Kreisky intends either to keep on working as government chief for years to come, or to resign from the function of chancellor even before the expiration of the current legislative period. This was stated by him in an interview published in today's edition of TIROLER TAGESZEITUNG.

In this interview, the chancellor stresses that he wants to be the leading candidate of the Austrian Socialist Party only if he can commit himself for years to come: "Yes, that would have to be so in this event; at any rate for the major part of the [next] legislative period."

But, if he could not run in the next elections, he did not intend to remain chancellor until these elections, Kreisky indicted, stating: "In this event I would consider that hardly expedient." Kreisky did not give any name of a potential successor. Kreisky excluded the possibility of holding the next elections ahead of schedule in connection with a change in the chancellor's office.

SCHMIDT, MAUROY AFFIRM 'COMPLETE AGREEMENT'

LD291714 Hamburg DPA in German 1555 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 29 Jan (DPA) -- During a talk which lasted several hours in Bonn on Friday, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and French Premier Pierre Mauroy have noted almost complete agreement on all important international questions, above all with reference to the situation in Poland. Schmidt and Mauroy both agreed to reject the U.S. sanctions policy. Furthermore, they jointly underlined the "urgent wish" for the United States to move away from the high interest rate policy which has "fatal consequences" for industry and jobs in the European countries.

Following a 2-hour private exchange of views, which was followed by a luncheon attended by only a few people, Mauroy told journalists that Poland needs solidarity and that the violation of human rights must be denounced. However, in the opinion of the French Government, economic measures against Warsaw and Moscow are outside the necessary solidarity with Poland. Halting trade with the Soviet Union, including the renunciation of the natural gas deal, would amount to an economic blockade against Moscow and would be a "weighty act" which -- as history has shown -- could eventually even lead to war. Schmidt added that the two men had not noted any differences of assessment concerning the "Polish tragedy" and the Soviet Union.

At the center of the talk, which was held to prepare for the next round of consultations between Schmidt and President Francois Mitterrand on 24 and 25 February in Bonn, were the difficult economic situation and the growing unemployment in the international arena, especially in the two countries. Schmidt, like Mauroy, underlined the "extremely negative importance" of the United States' high interest rate policy for industry and jobs in Europe. The chancellor said that one reason in favor of publically tackling this problem is the conviction that President Ronald Reagan needs support in his fight to bring down interest rates in the United States of America.

Schmidt and Mauroy, who is on his second visit to Bonn as Socialist head of government, both paid tribute to the close and friendly relations between the Federal Republic and France, relations which are independent of any changes of government. Schmidt said that he and Mauroy understood each other well. Mauroy called the German-French friendship Europe's central nucleus which must be developed further. Cooperation between Bonn and Paris should be deepened further.

It seems that the two heads of government discussed defense cooperation concerning the German-French battle tank project only on the sidelines -- a project Paris desires and Bonn advocates in principle, but the financing of which seems as good as impossible to the German side. This subject is to be tackled by Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel and his French counterpart Charles Hernu at their February meeting in Paris.

Before flying home on Friday evening, Mauroy will hold talks with Economics Minister Count Otto Lambsdorff and Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, both of whom attended the joint luncheon.

Press Conference

LD291524 Hamburg DPA in German 1506 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 29 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Schmidt and Premier Pierre Mauroy of France in Bonn today declared their opposition to sanctions against Warsaw and Moscow because of the situation in Poland. After a talk lasting several hours at the federal chancellor's office Mauroy told a press conference that such measures clash with the solidarity which must be shown toward Poland. Schmidt emphasized that there were no differences of view whatsoever on the USSR's role in the "Polish tragedy."

Further Details

LD291725 Paris AFP in English 1721 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 29 Jan (AFP) -- Mr Mauroy said that France would go to a February 9 meeting in Madrid of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) with "a tough position," adding that "we will refuse to give the label of democracy to those who don't deserve it."

Responding to West German worries about French economic policy, Mr Mauroy said that for France "it was not a question of building a protectionist wall but of boosting an industrial policy." Mr Mauroy said Mr Schmidt found his explanations on the French policy of reconquering the French market "satisfactory".

'LET POLAND BE POLAND' FEATURES SCHMIDT STATEMENT

LD301158 Hamburg DPA in German 1118 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 30 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has emphasized the demand addressed to the Polish leadership to lift martial law, release those detained and return to a national dialogue with the church and the leaders of the Solidarity trade union. In a declaration which was made public in Bonn on Saturday and which will be broadcast on the television show in support of the Polish people produced on the initiative of U.S. President Ronald Reagan, Schmidt directs his appeal above all "at the Soviet Union, which carries a heavy responsibility for the tragedy." The Polish people themselves have to find their way into the future.

The supression of freedom in Poland is "a serious moral challenge to all those in the world who are for humanity and freedom," Schmidt said. This suppression is a danger to peaceful coexistence. Schmidt reiterates his assurance that the Germans stand "with all their heart at the side of the Polish workers in their struggle for human dignity, rights and democracy." After a long and painful history, Germans and Poles have come together again, the chancellor stressed. This development after World War II, together with the conciliation between Germany and France, was "one of the great moral developments in Europe." Schmidt added: "Never again will we forget what human solidarity between Poles and Germans means for our people and for Europe. That is the reason for our solidarity today with the Polish people."

CHANCELLOR ADDRESSES LOWER SAXONY SPD CONGRESS

LD301422 Hamburg DPA in German 1307 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] Hanover, 30 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is willing to fulfill the government mandate which the electors entrusted to the social-liberal coalition in the Bundestag elections of 1980 for the entire legislative period. At the regional party congress of the Lower Saxony SPD, in Hanover on Saturday, Schmidt said: "I do not want to abandon ship." At the same time the chancellor warned -- without naming names -- of any attempt to block government business. "It is in my own interest to emphasize," he recalled, "that a ship with 27 or 30 would-be helmsmen cannot be steered in the long run."

Schmidt intends to meet Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher at the party congress to talk about employment policy measures. Genscher is in the Lower Saxony regional capital for a rally of solidarity with Poland.

In his 1-hour speech, which dealt primarily with peace issues, as well as economic and social policies, the chancellor explained in detail the government's stance on the situation in Poland. The government has spoken out for moral and human rights in the face of Polish tragedy. But it does not consider it correct to join in the "choir of those who in their anger want to take measures which ill-befit us Germans."

Schmidt recalled that 10 days after the imposition of martial law in Poland he had asked in a letter to Soviet General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev that the state of martial law in Poland be ended and that the dialogue with the workers be resumed. "It is one thing," the chancellor said, "if someone risks everything for the freedom of his people, even his life. But it is a completely different matter if one lives in security and demands that someone else should risk his life."

DGB CHAIRMAN SPEAKS AT RALLY FOR SOLIDARITY

[Text] Hamburg, 30 Jan (DPA) -- In over 100 cities in the FRG, several thousand people today demonstrated their solidarity with Poland and the Polish trade union Solidarity. Chancellor Helmut Schmidt wrote in a telegram to the main DGB [West German union organization] - organized demonstration in Muehlheim, on the Ruhr, that the Solidarity trade union had created a "symbol of hope." DGB Chairman Heinz-Oskar Vetter, in front of approximately 2,000 demonstrators, condemned "in the sharpest terms" the Polish military's measures against the trade union, where were also aimed against the entire Polish people.

In his telegram to the DGB demonstration, Schmidt pointed out that this symbol of hope could not be extinguished as being "a glorious chapter in the history of Poland and in the history of the free trade unions." The chancellor called on FRG citizens to help people in Poland. In an interview with the French newspaper LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR (Saturday edition), Schmidt vigorously denied Western press allegations that the Federal Government had not criticized events in Poland persistently enough. "Formerly we used to be regarded with suspicion because of militarism, now we are suspected of pacifism and neutralism. Both are equally distant from the actual reality in Germany."

"In the presence of SPD Chairman Willy Brandt and numerous North Rhine-Westphalian regional politicians, Vetter, in the name of the DGB demanded the immediate end of the state of emergency, the immediate release of all arrested trade unionists and the resumption of negotiations between Solidarity and the Polish Government. Vetter called upon "all workers in Germany" to show solidarity with the arrested trade unionists in Poland.

GENSCHER SUPPORTS DETENTE, EUROPEAN UNITY

LD291548 Hamburg DPA in German 1300 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 29 Jan (DPA) -- Speaking at the "European Management Forum" in Davos today, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher said that setbacks in the policy of detente are no reason for reviving the Cold War. Genscher defined the policy of detente, which he called the "paramount peace task for Europe and the world," as a "joint Western policy toward the USSR, which combines determination to maintain parity and demands for Soviet moderation with readiness for dialogue and cooperation, for arms control and disarmament."

Genscher said: "What has been achieved in this respect during the past 12 years must not be endangered, at any rate by us." As regards Poland, the West should see not only the obvious pressure exerted by Moscow, but also the fundamental problem of Moscow's inability to allow for demands for national identity. "Short-winded action for action's sake" should not therefore be allowed to "take the place of political strategy." The USSR could achieve stability in its sphere only if she "responds constructively to the East European people's demand for reform and implementation of their European identity."

In his speech, which was prereleased in Bonn, the federal foreign minister called for fresh efforts to establish political unity in Europe, which can master its economic problems only with unity. Genscher unequivocally underlined the indispensable security factor which the U.S. represents for Europe.

Opposes Economic Sanctions

LD301322 Hamburg DPA in German 1152 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] Hanover, 30 Jan (DPA) -- The FDP chairman, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, told a party Solidarity rally in Hanover today that the German population should give material aid to the Polish people "even if that involves personal sacrifices." Speaking to approximately 500 people, Genscher opposed economic sanctions against Poland. Genscher demanded that "all peoples should be able to establish the order which they want." After the experiences of the German people, the FRG should be an "advocate of freedom and civil rights, also in Latin America, Asia and Africa." The former federal president and honorary chairman of the FDP, Walter Scheel, directed heavy criticism against the Soviet Union and the Polish military government. After Afghanistan the imposition of martial law in Poland was a "further serious burden on international relations."

CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT DENIES 'FAINTNESS ATTACK'

LD311052 Hamburg DPA in German 0955 GMT 31 Jan 82

[Text] Hamburg, 31 Jan (DPA) -- Using the words, "they're crazy," Chancellor Helmut Schmidt commented on weekend reports about an attack of faintness which he is said to have suffered on Saturday at the Lower Saxony regional party conference in Hannover. "That is very far from what really happened," Schmidt said Saturday night at the Hamburg press ball. Observers said that it had been a long time since the chancellor had shown so much stamina at a press ball in Hamburg. The media reported on an attack of faintness which Schmidt, who has had a heart pacemaker for several months, is supposed to have had. A representative of the Federal Press Office spoke of only a cramp which the chancellor had during his speech to delegates at the party conference. There had been no need for medical treatment, since the cramp had eased by itself.

UNEMPLOYMENT PROGRAM VIEWED AS PRIORITY TASK

LD291732 Hamburg DPA in German 1609 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 29 Jan (DPA) -- A pioneering program for the creation of jobs for the coming years is believed to be so essential by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt that he might make his remaining in office dependent on it. A few days before the preliminary decision by the SPD and FDP coalition partners, which is expected next Monday, on the financing of measures to combat unemployment, Schmidt told a few people that if the differing views are not resolved one can "no longer count on him." This remark by Schmidt was reported by the SPD group chief, Herbert Wehner, in an NDR interview recorded today and is to be broadcast on Saturday. Wehner has already informed the delegates of his electoral district, Hamburg, about this. Bonn government circles pointed out on Friday that neither the Federal Government nor the chancellor have ever talked about coalition talks or commented on reports about them. This will continue to be the rule.

REUNIFICATION RULED OUT BEFORE YEAR 2000

LD301604 Hamburg DPA in German 1524 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 30 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt does not foresee the possibility of a reunification of the two German states before the year 2000. In an interview with the French paper LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR, published in Bonn on Saturday, the chancellor said that he has always been of the opinion that the clause contained in the Basic Law on the reestablishment of German unity by free self-determination is "a long-term aim." Schmidt added: "I cannot see how this can be achieved before the end of this century. I do not think that this is a possibility without first generally overcoming the partition of Europe." But if he abandons this aim as federal chancellor, he will be placing himself in opposition to the constitution, on which he has sworn an oath.

REPORT CITES PROBLEMS IN REARMING MILITARY

[Text] Hamburg, 30 Jan (DPA) -- According to WELT AM SONNTAG the Federal Army is, as a result of the higher costs of the Tornado multipurpose fighter, no longer capable of meeting its obligations to the extent previously foreseen. This emerged from the draft of a report in which a Bundestag committee, set up in February 1981, indicated its view on the effects of the purchase of the Tornado on the armed forces' combat readiness which appeared in the latest edition of the newspaper. Within the committee the 500-page report was "largely undisputed." There was no agreement on whether and to what extent Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD) was responsible for the financial mess surrounding the purchase of the multipurpose fighter.

Because of cutbacks or delays in procurements as a result of the rapidly rising costs of the Tornado, the report says that as regards ground troops "at some points... the minimum of coverage in the area between the Baltic and the Alps was not being reached." The risk of a threat was being "at times increased" by this. It was alleged that in the air force there was "overall, a limited meeting of commitments." The navy could, it was said "still fulfill its commitments in spite of reduced capabilities," but it is weakened due to its "diversity of roles" and could not take on any additional obligations.

The chairman of the defense committee, Werner Marx, (CDU), in his initial reaction was annoyed about the publication of the report. The story was apparently based on an outdated partial draft of the, as yet unfinished report, Marx told DPA on Saturday in Bonn. There would only be an authorized text after the approval of the investigation report by the committee, which is scheduled to meet for the last time on 3 March.

The report cited in WELT AM SONTAG says of the problems, specifically, that in the army alone "60 necessary rearming plans could not be carried out to the extent originally planned." Thus it is emerging that fewer vehicles would be ready for use because the means for their repair were lacking. Because of cutbacks "in the infrastructural sphere" the accomodations of soldiers are also suffering. Moreover the additional need for command staff would be met in 6 years, instead of in 3.

There are also delays in the procurement of weapons and equipment such as radio equipment for the new battle tank Leopard II and the night-sight devices for the Milan antitank system. The new antiaircraft tanks (?Gepard) and Roland had had their combat usefulness cut in half by the decision not to install a special guidance system.

The navy has been particularly hit by the delay in purchasing the 7th and 8th 122 frigate and the new, fast minesweeper 343, in place of which old and less powerful units would continue to be used. There is to be a postponement also to the modernization of the Hamburg class destroyers and the rearming of the Sea King helicopter for combat use. The Kormoran guided missile, suitable for use against seaborne targets and used by the navy's Tornados, will only be available later.

Both the air force and the navy think the safety of the airfields planned for the Tornado will be endangered by the abandonment of the antiaircraft missile system Roland. Also cutbacks in the planned guidance system for a comprehensive air defense system and fuel cuts for pilot training are complained of as being a considerable burden. The Federal Army is to receive in all 322 airplanes of the Tornado type, which is built jointly with Great Britain and Italy. In May of last year the Bundestag had granted a further DM265 million for the purchase of the airplane, which had gotten into difficulties due to price rises and financial deficits.

MITTERRAND APPROVES OF U.S. POLISH TV PROGRAM

LD310016 Paris Domestic Service in French 2300 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Excerpt] This evening, Francois Mitterrand was the guest on the "Soir-3" television news program, and he gave his full approval for the U.S. initiative of a television program in support of the Poles.

[Begin Mitterrand recording] It is a good initiative. The Polish people need to be made aware that their fight for more freedom enjoys the support and solidarity of many millions of men throughout the world. They need to know that the political and moral pressure of world public opinion will not cease until they see restored the free exercise of their trade union rights which have been gained by Poland's peasants and workers in the last few years, until they regain their human rights, and until those who have been unjustly incarcerated are released from the prisons and camps.

The Polish people also suffer from misery and hunger and that is why France sends food aid, the bulk of food aid from the Western countries. The Polish people also know that their country is still suffering from the consequences of World War II and that it will only escape these consequences the day that sees the disappearance of the cutting of Europe into two blocs and of the system which oppresses the Polish people. Their astonishing courage in adversity shows that this evolution, even if it needs time, has already begun. [end recording]

OFFICIALS DEFEND GAS CONTRACT WITH USSR

Mauroy: Diversification

PM011051 Paris LE MONDE in French 27 Jan 82 p 36

[Excerpt] The appropriateness of the contract for France's purchase of Soviet gas continues to arouse strong controversy in political circles. [Premier] Mauroy mentioned that agreement twice in Nord Pas-de-Calais Monday [25 January] At Cambrai town hall, in an off-the-cuff reply to a speech by Mr Legendre (RPR), the mayor and a former secretary of state, who had said that he was "shocked" that the agreement had been concluded "while martial law has still not been lifted in Poland," the premier said: "It is important not to confuse issues.... Should we have added to the Poles' tragedy the additional tragedy of the French deprived of gas supplies? The agreement reached in no way calls into question our options at the international level, and particularly our solidarity with the Polish people. We defend freedom wherever it is under attack...."

Mr Mauroy returned to the subject at Roubaix town hall: "The debate on energy in the National Assembly in fall 1981 highlighted the importance for our security and energy independence of a twofold diversifications of our supplies -- diversification of energy sources and diversification of their geographical origins.... In the framework of that policy it was decided to increase the share of natural gas in our energy balance. Gas will increase from 12 percent of our consumption in 1981 to almost 15 percent in 1990....

"It was with that in mind that negotiations were started and are continuing with Algeria, the USSR, the African countries of the Gulf of Guinea, and the countries bordering the North Sea. In 1980 the French gas company was given permission to negotiate a new contract with Soyuzgazeksport in addition to the one signed in 1975. On 22 January 1982 the discussions resulted in the conclusion of a commercial agreement subject to the government's examination for approval....

"At present energy imports from the USSR (natural gas, oil and coal) represent 5 percent of our energy consumption."

"Thus, taking account of the reduction in our oil purchases and the increase in our total energy consumption, the USSR's share in our energy supplies would remain unchanged. Moreover the government has asked the French gas company to guarantee the security of gas supplies to the consumers by two complementary measures likely to mitigate a possible break in supplies from our main suppliers: on the one hand the extension of underground gas storage will be developed and on the other hand there will be suspendable contracts making provision for clients to have major equipment enabling them to use another form of energy if need be."

For his part PS First Secretary Jospin said he thought that "the argument that it is Poland which is paying the bill is hypocritical. The logic of human rights must be separated from economic logic."

However, the majority is not unanimous in giving unreserved approval to this contract. Left Radical Movement Chairman Schwartzenberg indicated that he would have "preferred there to have been less haste and greater information on such an important contract."

Cheysson: Reasonable Position

PM011001 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Jan 82 p 4

[Maurice Delarue report]

[Text] "The French are activists in the Near East because we believe that a move toward peace is urgently needed because people are suffering," [External Relations Minister] Cheysson said when addressing the Foreign Press Association 27 January. "We are activists and will continue to be," the external relations minister continued, "we know that we will only invite attacks, but we will continue to do it."

Justifying President Mitterrand's forthcoming visit to Israel, the minister stated: "I do not understand those who claim they want peace but disregard the fact that there is a Palestinian people which has the same rights. Yes, it is necessary to talk with the Israelis, and preferably in their country; it is necessary to talk with the Arab states, and preferably in those states; and it is necessary to talk with the Palestinians, who do not yet have a state but who have an organization which represents their fighters -- the PLO. Therefore it is necessary to talk with the PLO. That is obvious. I wonder how anybody can deny it."

Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights was "shocking, unacceptable and provocative," and that led the French Government to suspend "for a few weeks" preparations for the president's visit; but that visit is nonetheless still "necessary," the minister continued. "Is it particularly pleasant to visit somebody you have just condemned? No! But the search for peace involves dialogue with Israel," especially since the Europeans only have "words" as a possible means of action in that region, where it is, moreover, particularly important.

Mr Cheysson explained that Mr Mitterrand would not go to the "occupied territories" but only to Jerusalem. The reason why France did not vote for sanctions against Israel at the Security Council is that, according to the UN Charter, sanctions can only be pronounced if there is a "threat to world peace," and that the annexation of the Golan Heights could not be regarded as such.

Mr Cheysson also expressed surprise that the Beirut government had not asked the United Nations to monitor "the whole of southern Lebanon" as it was entitled to do under the terms of Security Council Resolution 425. France, the minister said, is prepared to take part in a move to do that, should Lebanon ask it to. "We are extending our consumption of gas in order to be less dependent on crude oil and to avoid replacing it solely by nuclear energy," although in that connection France has "a remarkably reasonable position," the minister said by way of explaining the conclusion of the gas contract with the Soviet Union.

"Gas must be obtained where it is to be found," he continued, stressing "the continuity of French policy." Our dependence on the USSR will remain at the level of 5 percent, he added, "less oil, more gas.... We would be sanctioning ourselves if we were to shut ourselves off from that source."

A Co-Development Agreement With Algeria

Mr Cheysson denied that in signing the Soviet contract France has given preference to "one form of dependency over another." "Every country," he said, must reckon with "objective elements of dependence." "I do not like dependence," the minister said, "but in areas where we have to be dependent we must diversify our dependence."

Questioned on the negotiations being conducted with Algeria, Mr Cheysson said: "I believe that a fundamental co-development agreement can emerge with Algeria" which will include "a general cooperation agreement" and "a large number of contracts," especially on gas. Algeria regards the agreement on gas as a "starting point" because it will last a long time and protect Algeria's main resource from world speculation. The French Government "accepts that argument," Mr Cheysson continued. "We regard it as an essential subject," he said, "on which you will hear us speak throughout Mr Mitterrand's 7-year term." "The finishing touches have not been put to the formulas" with Algeria, he added, but "there is complete agreement" in principle. "People may say that the Algerians will become dependent on France, but we are negotiating all the reverse aspects with them," the minister also said: "There will be reciprocal security." Mr Cheysson thinks that the gas agreement will be concluded at the end of January.

Finally, questioned on the deadlock on EEC reform, Mr Cheysson said that Britain has a demand, that of "just" budgetary "returns," which does not form part of the treaties. "That is a major problem which goes beyond the functioning of the community. It must continue to function. All those who have signed the treaties are bound by them. It is a new problem which we will have to try to tackle but, quite frankly, I do not see how at present."

Delors: Necessary

PM291281 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Jan 82 p 43

[Excerpts] The French [national] gas company's board of directors was to approve the contract for purchasing gas from the Soviet Union on 27 January. France will, therefore receive 8 billion cubic meters per year for 25 years beginning 1984. It will cost -- if petroleum and petroleum product prices to which this contract is index-linked do not change, which is rather unlikely -- at least FR 8.5 billion per year, in other words around FR 212.5 billion over the duration of the contract (in accordance with the minimum guaranteed price for the 25 years.

Mr Delors: A Diversification of our Energy Resources

Questioned on Europe 1's press club about the French-Soviet agreement, Economy and Finance Minister Delors replied: "The government's whole policy is aimed at trying to diversify our energy sources and their origins without prejudicing the future, in other words, leaving room for new discoveries, which some people think we can make, and without counting new energy sources....

"As regards Russian gas which represents one of the most important sources which can be secured at present, the discussion had been going on for a long time. Such a discussion had already been concluded in Germany. We had to take our share of it on pain of not obtaining such a satisfactory price rate and above all on pain of not securing the reciprocal orders which enable our industry to have a presence in the East bloc, which is certainly necessary for us at the moment when you look at the international economic situation."

Accused of "giving a boost to the Soviet economy" in the middle of the Polish crisis, Mr Delors added in particular: "No. We are pursuing an operation which places us directly in line with a policy which is neither that of those who thought that by trading more with the East bloc countries an evolution would be brought about in their political regime, nor, at the other extreme, that of those who like some Americans today, think that it is necessary to stop all trade with the Russians in order to force them to change. We take neither of those extreme attitudes, we are pursuing our line and we are trading with everybody...."

GAS AGREEMENT WITH ALGERIA 'IMMINENT'

LD292026 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] A Sonatrach-Gaz de France agreement may be imminent, the contract may be signed during the weekend. The calendar in any case makes this mandatory and it is, no doubt, in order to accelerate the process that the minister of external relations, Claude Cheysson, is on a lightning visit to Algiers. Here is Ralph Pinto:

Claude Cheysson's visit will not be confirmed by his ministry. He left very quietly late this morning with only a few people and accompanied by one of the chief executives of Gaz de France, its general manager. Claude Cheysson is certainly going to spend the night in Algiers. A commitment had been made to reach agreement before the end of January on this gas. Furthermore, it was the minister himself who took over the dossier on the contract which, during President Mitterrand's official visit to Algeria, received the green light politically. The matter had been dragging on for 2 years.

In all this gas business, which concerns more than 5 billion cubic meters of gas supplied annually to France for a period of 20 years by the Algerians, the political will or in any case the political criterion takes priority. Consideration has also been given to a price to be divided into two parts: one price to be paid by Gaz de France at the current market rate, which would not be higher than that paid to other suppliers, especially African suppliers who are also destined to become large suppliers of France, and the political price which would be an overall one, and which would be higher than the first one. It is a bit complicated -- the difference would be paid by the French Government into a development fund in favor of Algeria; that is the point. In return, Algeria would ensure FR10 billion of contracts for France.

But the catch is this: The reference price must not be the total price charged to Gaz de France as this could put ideas in the heads of other suppliers; but, on the other hand, the first price must not be so low as to turn Algerian gas into a low-cost commodity, because there are other customers who would also naturally demand parity. Consequently, the system must be worked out properly, but there is a race against the clock, and logically that is why we can expect a signature this weekend, following the other important contract last weekend with the Soviets.

HASSAN CALLS FOR NEW ARAB SUMMIT, INCLUDES EGYPT

NC292042 Paris AFP in English 2037 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Paris, 29 Jan (AFP) -- King Hassan, who was speaking at a press conference at the end of a visit to France, also praised the reported despatch of a Jordanian contingent to fight alongside Iraq in the Gulf War as "filling a gap" in Arab solidarity. He also indicated that Morocco was ready to send troops to Lebanon if the Syrian-dominated Arab deterrent force there were enlarged.

But the king lashed out at Libya, saying that recent restoration of diplomatic links between Rabat and Tripoli had not normalised their relations. Accusing Tripoli of being the "principal accomplice" of the Polisario guerrillas fighting Morocco for the Western Sahara the king added, "thanks to Libya (which supplies money, weapons, missiles to the Polisario) my men have been falling for the past six years."

The king expressed reservations on the next Organisation of African Unity summit, which is due to take place in Tripoli, and when asked what he would do if the United States attacked Libya replied, "I would close my eyes and go mentally elsewhere." He hoped that the proposed referendum on the future of the Western Sahara would take place before the Tripoli summit, but said he did not know if he would go to next month's Organisation of African Unity (OAU) meeting to discuss the poll. He praised French support for the referendum but did not see much value at present in any attempt by Paris to approach Libya and Algeria, which also backs the Polisario, to reach a solution to the problem.

The king indicated that his visit to France and three rounds of talks with President Francois Mitterrand had enabled Paris and Rabat to cool their differences and find agreement "on many points."

He played down the effect of criticism of Morocco's internal and foreign policies by officials of Mr Mitterrand's Socialist Party but warned that clemency for Moroccan opposition leader Abderrahmin Bouabid, whose house arrest was attacked in France, would be delayed the more his case was publicly discussed. The king indicated that he had no objections to Mr Mitterrand's planned visit to Israel, and said he was sure the French president would defend Palestinian rights while he was there as firmly as he had defended Israeli rights.

But he expressed disappointment at the attitude of European countries to Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights, saying it was "not firm enough." The European position on the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) was also "not warm enough," he added. On his forthcoming visit to the United States the king said he would be making contact with President Ronald Reagan, gauging the feelings of his administration and discussing "geostrategical" matters as well as bilateral relations. Mr Mitterrand had been invited to Morocco and would be going there this year, King Hassan also said. Opponents of his regime held a demonstration as the king arrived for the press conference but police kept them well back and there were no incidents.

Further Details

LD291540 Rabat Domestic Service in Arabic 1300 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Excerpts] His majesty the king expressed the hope that Egypt would return to the Arab fold and take its place at the Arab summit conference when the conference reconvenes in Fes, because an Arab world without Egypt is incomplete. His majesty also announced that the Fes summit conference would be reconvened before this summer, and that it would adopt Prince Fahd's plan as a working document.

Interview

LD010208 Rabat Domestic Service in Arabic 2000 GMT 31 Jan 82

[Excerpts] His Majesty King Hasan II granted an interview to Radio France International in which his majesty discussed the issues of the tension in northwest Africa, and the democratic process in Morocco. Our Paris correspondent has sent us the following report:

[Begin recording] Regarding Moroccan-French cooperation, his majesty said that cooperation between the two countries continues in the same direction it has been following. The Radio France International correspondent asked his majesty if he was happy with the French stand on the Sahara issue. His majesty replied: It is certain that since Morocco proposed the holding of a referendum France's attitude not only has been clear and precise but also well-known.

His majesty was asked: What will your majesty's stand be if the Polisario opens an office in Paris? He answered: The important thing to me is that the French Government should know that there is only one country with which it must deal politically and diplomatically. The country in question is Morocco.

If the Polisario wanted to open an office in Paris, I believe that this would enable the French Government, if it so wished to pursue and encircle them as necessary and discover that not one of them speaks Spanish. [sentence as heard] This is very important. It would also be able to observe their contacts with the information media and with all those who provide them with thoughts and inspire them with views.

The radio correspondent asked his majesty: Is it possible to hold talks with the Polisario? His majesty answered: If I wanted to meet with them this would be purely on my own discretion but the OAU cannot in any way force me to meet with them.

The radio correspondent then asked: Would you accept a type of contact, not to say negotiations, but discreet contacts through the followup committee? His majesty answered: No. If I ever accepted contacts through a third party, this would be by my own methods, whenever I wish and through the mediators I would choose. In any case, I repeat the sentence: if I wished.

The radio correspondent said: It seems that the Royal Armed Forces are deployed inside the triangle known as An-Nafia, that is, inside the belt which you have established. Recently, you have evacuated two places which were heavily attacked. One understands that you are not interested in the rest of the Sahara. His majesty asked the radio correspondent about the two places to which he was referring and the correspondent answered: Guelta Zemmur and Bir Enzaran. His majesty the king replied: We have not abandoned them. We have decided to mount patrols around them and we continue to follow what goes on inside them. We have decided that Guelta Zemmur resembles Dien Bien Phu and this requires the deployment of huge forces in the area because it is a basin easily mined. But as for Bir Enzaran from the population standpoint or movement and grazing and security angle it has no importance whatsoever, thus we have preferred to set up danger signal points. We have reduced the capabilities deployed there so that we do not scatter these capabilities. The Sahara is vast, as you know.

His majesty was asked: Does the existence of the belt and life inside the belt constitute a hindrance to the holding of a referendum? His majesty answered: First, the referendum will not take place only inside the belt but also beyond it, provided that there are other populated areas. Second, one must not overlook one more important point in the Nairobi decisions, namely, that every person who wishes to take part in the referendum should cast his vote at the place (?in which he usually resides.) Then, there will be no voting in Tinduf, Nouakchott or Al-Bouyarat. When a person comes to vote he will be known by (?observation) and there will be legal evidence to establish if he really is a native of the area.

The radio correspondent then asked: What is happening in Al-Bouyarat? His majesty answered: The matter concerns a case of kindness to Mauritania. This is because Nouadibou is the only important sea outlet for Mauritania. Foom the other side it is impossible to see without the aid of binoculars, people walking in Al-Bouyarat. The Mauritanians have always said to us: Your presence there exposes us to the thunderbolt. Missiles might miss your camp and fall on the port. Then, we did what you have observed as kindness, bearing in mind that the Nairobi decisions are very important. They define the surface area of the referendum, and Al-Bouyarat is an integral part of this area.

The radio correspondent then asked: Our observers, at the Nairobi summit felt that you concluded a sort of secret alliance with Libya. At your recent press conference in Paris you showed a great deal of caution toward it. Does this mean that Libya has frustrated your hope since the Nairobi summit, Your Majesty?

His majesty answered: When the Sahara problem was raised Libya did not open its mouth. I went along with Libya in the game. I sent my (?ambassador) and I intervened with King Khalid twice because Al-Qadhdhafi asked me to do so in order to settle the dispute between them. But soon I noticed the attitude of the other side was unfortunately merely fog which concealed the true intentions. Thus I do not see why I should continue to be courteous to a regime which does not show courtesy to Morocco.

The radio correspondent asked: To what point has the project of the democratization and liberalization of Morocco after the arrests which took place last summer reached? His majesty replied: There is no project but there is a constitution. The constitution is realized through practice. You should try and imagine the number of the customs which I created since the emergence of the constitution and Parliament to ensure the democracy. As you know whatever the written law is there is also the custom which is a source of the law. I have ensured the creation of customs from which there is no retreat. This is because I strongly desire to remove from the minds of Moroccans the idea that opposition is not opposition if it does not oppose the institutions. Constitutional monarchy is a choice made by Moroccans. They have been practicing their unwritten constitution for 14 centuries and now they have written it. In any case, it is not possible to leave it to a few individuals to destroy 14 centuries of (?independence and victory).

The radio correspondent asked: I believe it is no secret to anyone that France expects you to pardon the interned opposition. His majesty answered: I do not see any reason for France's concern over this because I do not believe it has a mandate which it has to fulfill. I assure you that the matter is very harmful to the prisoners. By your continuing to demand their release you are not doing them a great service. This is because they can serve 6 months. But what after this? Will not the problem of what will be said about your intervention remain? It is a Moroccan issue and it should be left to the Moroccans to solve it. The king of Morocco is the father figure of all and he should know more than others the appropriate time when he should issue his pardon.

MITTERRAND'S VISIT TO ISRAEL CRITICIZED

NC291320 Paris AFP in English 1148 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Paris, 29 Jan (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand's March visit to Israel was sharply criticised here today by an Israeli army reserve general and a Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) representative. They both claimed it would give tacit support to Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin's "annexation policies."

In an interview with the newspaper LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS, General Matityahu Peled -- a senior army engineering officer in the June 1967 war -- said Mr Mitterrand's trip was "inconsiderate... (and) risks encouraging Begin to annex the (occupied Jordan) West Bank---after the Israeli withdrawal from Sinai." Speaking to the same newspaper, PLO Paris Representative Ibrahim as-Sus took a similar view of President Mitterrand's Israeli visit, saying it might have been viewed more favourably by the Arabs if Israel had at its head "someone who had at least made one gesture of peace."

EGYPT'S MUBARAK HOLDS TALKS WITH NATIONAL LEADERS

AU010823 Rome ANSA in English 0810 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 1 Feb (ANSA) -- Egyptian chief-of-state Husni Mubarak moves on to Paris today after spending the first three days of his first trip abroad as president in Rome discussing foreign affairs and bilateral relations with Italian leaders. The late Anwar as-Sadat's successor displayed his views about Egyptian-Israeli relations and the prospects for peace in the Middle East in general to Italian President Sandro Pertini and Premier Giovanni Spadolini and had a private audience with Pope John Paul II at the Vatican while in Rome.

Pertini assured Mubarak that "Italy will stand at Egypt's side in its moves for peace and justice" in the Middle East, fully aware of the "enormous problems concentrated in the region, from the Arab-Israeli conflict to the persisting tragedy in Lebanon."

The Egyptian leader said he valued the "leading role" Italy played in the European Economic Community (EEC) and the West in general with respect to Middle East policy making and invited Pertini to visit Egypt so that he may see first hand the "friendship and consideration" the Egyptian people have for Italy. Briefing Pertini on the talks underway with Israel on Palestinian autonomy on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Mubarak stressed that Egypt was seeking a "declaration of principle" on full self-government in the two areas as "a first step towards admitting the Palestinian people into the peace process, which is the premise for its exercising its natural right to self-determination."

The Palestinian autonomy issue also came up in the talks Egyptian Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali, who is accompanying Mubarak on the trip, had with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo over the weekend. Hasan 'Ali, who holds the office of deputy premier for foreign affairs, confirmed that the Israeli-Egyptian normalization process was coming along well although the two sides were still a long way from agreement on the issue of granting self-rule to the Palestinians on the Arab territories occupied by the Jewish state. The Egyptians, he said, were negotiating with an open mind, but that did not mean they will be willing to sign "the first thing that comes along." "The agreement we'll sign with Israel", he stressed, "will have to be acceptable to the Palestinians and susceptible to development."

The meeting between Mubarak and Spadolini was mainly devoted to the situation in the Mediterranean, East-West relations and the "North-South" dialogue between industrialized countries and the Third World. The Italian Government leader gave the non-aligned nations movement, of which Egypt is a member, credit for its constructive moves on behalf of world stability. The two men also went over bilateral relations between Egypt and Italy and both said they were determined to strengthen the bonds in all areas, including economic and technical ties. Mubarak thanked the Italian Government for its decision to join the multinational peace-keeping force that will be patrolling the Sinai after the Israeli pullout is completed, calling the move evidence of "great sensitivity and friendship." Returning the complement, Spadolini said his own government was pleased about "the determination with which Mubarak was pursuing the blueprint for peace drafted by President as-Sadat."

(It was learnt here over the weekend that Italy will supply a naval unit, the composition and size of which will be decided in the next few weeks, to the Sinai peace-keeping force. Half of the 2,500 troops expected to make up the MPF will be supplied by the United States. The other European states joining it, besides Italy, are France, Britain and the Netherlands.)

Mubarak had a private audience at the Vatican Saturday with Pope John Paul II, whom he had met on two previous occasions, March 21, and September 6, 1980 when he was vice president of Egypt. Although Vatican sources do not disclose what goes on in private audiences with the pope, the two men presumably discussed John Paul's moves for world peace and the situation in the Middle East, particularly Lebanon, the Palestinian question and the problem of Jerusalem.

Ever since Pope Paul VI's reign, the Holy See has been trying to secure a special status for Jerusalem, the capital of the world's three major monotheistic religions (Judaism, Christianity and Islam), that would make it "a fraternal meeting-ground for believers of the three faiths."

Mubarak paid a visit Sunday morning to the National Monument in downtown Rome where the tomb of the unknown soldiers is located. He was accompanied there by Italian Justice Minister Clelio Darida. Shortly thereafter he met with Rome's Communist Mayor Ugo Vetere. Mubarak, his wife Susan, Kamal Hasan 'Ali and Egyptian Foreign Affairs Under Secretary Usamah al-Baz will be off to the French capital today and the party will continue its travels from there to Bonn, London and Washington.

ALGERIA'S BEN YAHIA ENDS DISCUSSIONS IN ROME

AU291555 Rome ANSA in English 1532 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 29 Jan (ANSA) -- In mid-April the Italian and Algerian Governments will assess the course of negotiations between their state energy agencies, ENI of Italy and Algeria's Sonatrach, for Algerian natural gas supplies for Italy and the work of the ad hoc committee set up for mapping out a program for Italian industry cooperation in the Algerian development plan. The understanding along these lines was arrived at late last night in consultations between Algerian Foreign Minister Mohamed Seddik Ben Yahia, in Rome on an official visit since Wednesday, and the Italian diplomatic chief, Emilio Colombo.

On Wednesday, the two state companies were requested by the foreign ministers to resume dealings on the natural gas supplies which had broken down because of differences on price. The diplomatic chiefs subsequently decided that these talks should go forward under the "special control" of the two governments and should not continue indefinitely.

The two foreign ministers admitted that the negotiations will not be easy because of the gap between the asking price for the fuel and the price ENI is willing to pay on the basis of calculations based on natural gas from other sources and the Algerian's competitive stance for the Italian market. Those responsible for Algerian energy price policy tend to aim at the upper end of the price scale, it has been noted. The creation of the ad hoc committee was suggested by Colombo to broaden the dialogue on economic relations between the two countries beyond the problem of the natural gas supplies. The progress made by the committee, which will also be examined by the governments in mid-April, will include consideration of legislation on the financing instruments, such as loan packages aimed at fostering the development of bilateral relations.

The two foreign ministers also expressed interest in maintaining and strengthening political ties between their two countries. Referring to the role played by Italy on the international scene and in the Mediterranean, the Algerian diplomat underscored the pertinence and the spirit of Italian foreign policy initiatives. Colombo, for his part, referred to the "genuine" non-alignment of the North African state.

Just before his departure from Rome today, Ben Yahia voiced his complete satisfaction for the course of consultations he held in the capital with head of state Sandro Pertini, Premier Giovanni, Spadolini, Colombo, and other Rome government ministers and officials.

PCE'S CARRILLO DELIVERS REPORT ON POLAND

PM271023 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 8-14 Jan 82 pp 10-15

[Apparent text of PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo's 9 January report to PCE Central Committee meeting]

[Text] Among your documents there are two proposals which the Secretariat is submitting to the Central Committee; one of them against the repression practiced by the military dictatorship in Turkey, and the other concerning the problems created by the establishment of a military junta in Poland.

The proposal devoted to Turkey is, as you will see, much briefer and more specific. This is because the events in that country do not require extensive ideological reflections on our part. Those events form part of the political logic of imperialism, which normally resorts to dictatorial methods, regimes of military oppression and terror wherever it sees its dominant positions threatened and where the democratic forces are not sufficiently strong to prevent it.

Situation in Turkey

In Turkey 52 trade union activists, who have been tortured and for whom the death penalty is being demanded, are being tried. Another trial of a further 117 trade union activists is announced. To our knowledge, 11 political and trade union leaders have already been executed, and according to the figures which we have received, there are about 70,000 political prisoners. A whole series of obstacles are being placed in the way of the journalists who have gone to cover that trial. A specific case is that of the MUNDO OBRERO correspondent, who was threatened with a possible attack if he did not catch a plane and leave Turkey immediately.

Legal defense in those trials is a fiction. The lawyers have had to be chosen from a list supplied by the government, and moreover they have been unable to address the court and in many instances have been expelled from it.

At the same time, the leader of one of the democratic Turkish parties -- Mr Ecevit -- a former head of that country's government, is serving a prison sentence.

The political parties are banned and parliament has been adjourned and replaced by a chamber appointed by the military government.

NATO's Support for Dictatorship

The most scandalous aspect is that Turkey belongs to NATO and is a preferential U.S. ally, and neither NATO nor the United States has condemned the Turkish military. Moreover, NATO is denying the guarantees sought by a democratic country belonging to it -- Greece -- with respect to possible acts of aggression by Turkey, which attacked Cyprus previously.

All this confirms the hypocrisy, the pharisaism and the immorality of the Reagan administration, which is raising an outcry against what is happening in Poland while backing terrorist dictatorships, vetoing the condemnation of Israeli expansionism on the Golan Heights, protecting the murderers of the El Salvador junta and supporting all those antipeoples regimes which consent to act as U.S. puppets.

What has happened in Turkey also serves to confirm our criticisms of NATO and its alleged defense of democracy. The fact is that NATO -- and this is demonstrated more each day -- is an instrument for U.S. domination in an area of the world and not for the defense of democracy.

What imperialism and the military government are doing in Turkey fully justifies the struggle which the revolutionary and progressive forces of the world are waging against it. It fully confirms the Marxist analyses concerning the nature of imperialism.

At this moment and with this resolution, which we hope the Central Committee will endorse, we Spanish communists reaffirm our full solidarity with the Turkish trade unions and with the democratic forces in that country, which we will support in their struggle for freedom and democracy. This is the significance of one of the proposals which we submit to this Central Committee meeting.

Polish Events

The other proposal concerns the events in Poland. I believe that nobody will be surprised by the much greater length of this second proposal and by the fact that it tackles problems (and even goes further in answering some of them) confronting the communist parties. In fact, perhaps it would not be necessary for me to refer to this second proposal, because I believe that it is sufficiently well argued in its text. I will say no new things in its defense. But in order to emphasize its interest and importance, which I believe are essential for the party in this situation, I believe that it is worth even repeating some of the arguments already expressed in it in one way or another.

The length of that proposal is understandable because it is not merely a matter of defining our stance as a workers' and democratic force, committed to the struggle for individual and collective, social and national freedoms, which cannot remain indifferent toward an event which assails these aims to which we are committed; and even less when in our country we are involved in that struggle up to our very necks -- in a struggle to promote and consolidate democracy and to avert a military coup.

It is not a matter of that alone. It is a matter, above all -- and this is what makes this proposal lengthier -- of the fact that the events in Poland directly affect our ideological conceptions, our overall Marxist view of human development and our revolutionary attitude toward the process of change and transformation which mankind is experiencing in this era.

As I have said, these events oblige us to continue and to deepen a reflection which we began years ago, in which we have been making progress collectively and individually, and which has led us to that strategy, that conception, now known by the term Eurocommunism.

We know -- and I wish to say this at the outset -- that there is an imperialist and reactionary manipulation of the events in Poland -- a manipulation against the ideas of socialism and communism -- and that in that manipulation the number of victims and the scale of the repression in Poland in specific aspects have been exaggerated.

Essence of Issue

But what would we gain by approaching the issue in terms of whether there is greater or lesser repression, more or fewer victims? It seems to me that as Marxists we should recognize that the essence of the issue does not lie there; that the essence of the issue lies elsewhere.

How it is possible in a country which proclaims itself socialist and which says that it has achieved the dictatorship of the proletariat and ended capitalist exploitation, that the workers, the peasants and the university people -- that is, the forces which are theoretically in power and are exercising that dictatorship -- are rebelling against the government, creating a dual power, destroying the party which proclaims itself their vanguard, and that from all this emerges, as might happen in any underdeveloped capitalist country, a military junta which takes power, occupies the streets with tanks and begins repression by canceling organizations and freedoms.

Can we be satisfied with the reply that that is the consequence of subversion by imperialism? If we did so, would we not be repeating what imperialist propaganda says against any revolutionary liberation movement, attributing it to the hand of Moscow and Soviet penetration?

From all historical experience, including our own, we know that no revolutionary movement triumphs or wins if there are no objective conditions and subjective factors in a given country, even if there is external assistance.

We know that movements of change and transformation occur essentially as a consquence of the existence of those objective conditions and of a subjective precipitating factor in the country itself. And what doubt can there be that external counterrevolutionary elements could have infiltrated the process of renewal and the Solidarity trade union? But to hold this responsible for the rising of the working class and the people on three consecutive occasions, in 1956, 1970, and now, is tatamount to mythicizing imperialism and presenting it as an all-embracing and invincible power; a presentation which contrasts even with the analyses which come to us from the East European countries and parties and which speak of socialism's superiority over imperialism in this historical period. It is obvious, comrades, that there are, that there must be, deeper causes than the possible subversion by the agents of imperialism. Even if these causes contradict important aspects of the communist movement's traditional culture and it is difficult to analyze them, it is necessary to strive to seek their source.

Catholicism and Nationalism

Certainly, there is a factor which disconcerts and provokes even, for instance, in our country, the reaction of the class instinct of not a few workers, and not only comrades of ours but also noncomrades. The church's role is easily understood when it is borne in mind that in Poland Catholicism has always been an essential component of national sentiment and of the national struggle against the old Russian empire and the central empires.

This is so to such an extent that in the Polish Army, as in the Spanish Army, there are military chaplains -- something which does not exist in other armies in the East bloc countries.

It is clear that the church has been an extremely important political factor all these years in Poland, and that when Gomulka rebelled in 1956 there was in fact a national front in which the church took part. The church was involved in the struggles of 1970, and the church has maintained a constant policy of resistance to and at the same time cooperation with the established system in Poland.

I believe that that is what explains the church's role, and that, moreover, it must be acknowledged that during this period it has striven to counter the extremist positions in Solidarity and to promote dialogue among the government, the party, the trade unions and the church. If the church had adopted a more belligerent attitude, perhaps, perhaps not even the military coup would have been possible in Poland. However, it must be said -- and we will have to obtain more information about this and make it known -- that it would be a mistake to believe that all the Solidarity leaders are Catholics.

Among the Solidarity leaders there are not a few members of the Polish Communist Party who left its ranks on the occasion of the occupation of Czechoslovakia, because they disagreed with that occupation and with Poland's participation in it.

In any event, what should be clear is that there will be no solution -- that solution which we advocate of dialogue, understanding, restoration of the freedoms and rights gained before the coup and progress in the renewal -- that will not occur except with the cooperation of the other power left in Poland today together with the army, which is the church.

For the present I believe that we should take a note of a specific fact. This is that throughout the last few years the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] has ceased to be the vanguard of the working class and of the people, which it might have been at another time, and that it has ended up by crumbling and collapsing under the pressure of the working class itself and of the Polish people.

Why has this party collapsed? Why did the trade unions collapse? The draft resolution which we are submitting to the Central Committee following a debate in the Executive Committee, and which was drafted by the Secretariat on the Executive Committee's instructions, propounds as the fundamental cause the failure and the exhaustion of the Soviet model of a political and social system in the form in which it was organized under Stalin's leadership under certain historical conditions. The failure of the conception of the party -- as the personification of the interests of the whole of society -- merged with the state aparatus, the failure of the conception of a dominant party, which has created a very strong state, a bureaucratized state, has finally ended up by devouring the party itself and, of course, the trade unions. In that state the party and the trade unions have become just another part of the state apparatus. The party has ceased to be the vanguard to become an instrument of power. It must be said that the party, that kind of party, is not joined today by the most revolutionary, advanced and vanguard elements; it is joined mainly by those who view party membership as the opportunity for a political career.

That kind of state is not the state of the proletariat organized as a leading class. It is not a genuine workers' democracy. That kind of state has eliminated internal political life, debate within the party and the party's sensitivity for taking up and adopting the opinions and aspirations of the working and people's masses. In fact the leadership of state power, which perpetuates itself bureaucratically, is also the party's leadership. And comrades, I know that because of our traditional culture it is sometimes very painful for us to say and listen to those things. But one fact which many of us -- at least, some of us here - have been able to ascertain is that in those parties there is no debate or political discussion.

Occupation of Czechoslovakia.

I would like to recall an instance of which I have sometimes reminded comrades, and it is significant. In 1968, following the occupation of Czechoslovakia, we told the group of Spanish communists in the Soviet Union not to express an opinion on that issue, because if they expressed support for the PCE's stance, as the majority wished or would have liked, that would have meant their becoming "subversive" elements in the Soviet Union, and that would have created difficulties for them. And yet the CPSU comrades were pressing our group in the Soviet Union to adopt a stance, believing that if it adopted a stance, it would necessarily be a stance favorable to the occupation, and that would be another element for combating the stance adopted by the party leadership.

And I recall a day in 1969 when, meeting with a Soviet leader in Paris, I asked him: "When will you cease pressing our comrades in the Soviet Union to adopt a stance on Czechoslovakia?" The reply that leader gave me was his way of denying that pressure was being exerted, but it was also an extremely important confession.

That comrade told me: "Ah! But do you believe that the occupation of Czechoslovakia has been discussed in the CPSU's organizations? No. The Politburo took a decision and implemented it, and it informed the party organizations afterward. There has been no further discussion or debate on the issue of Czechoslovakia in the CPSU."

But the comrades who have experienced or known that reality know that it was not a practice relating to Czechoslovakia: It is a regular practice.

Seek Scapegoat

And those of us who have attended those parties' congresses have seen that most of them are merely propagandist rituals and that at many of those congresses the fraternal delegates who go there to express their solidarity speak for many more hours than the country's delegates.

And we have also seen a method recur which is that, when there is a failure in economic policy or in other aspects of policy, the solution is to seek a scapegoat. For that reason, despite all that was positive and hopeful in Khrushchev's criticism at the 20th CPSU Congress and in that congress' decisions, yet it was centered on Stalin's so-called personality cult. It did not tackle squarely and thoroughly the problem of the political system, as Togliatti pointed out in the wake of that 20th congress.

In Poland, first there was Gomulka, then Beirut, next Gomulka again, then there was Gierek; we do not know what might happen to Kania. But the fact is that that model -- the Soviet model of the state -- as it was organized mainly under Stalin's leadership, has caused those consequences. Those consequences are even graver in those countries to which this model has been exported.

Granting Participation to the Masses

I believe that in an underdeveloped country without democratic traditions or culture it is perhaps inevitable for a revolution to be followed immediately by a nonpluralist political system. But what is certain is that when this country reaches a certain level of economic and cultural development, if it is unable to transform its system and create a pluralist system with freedoms, promote democratic channels, grant the masses broader participation in the exercise of power and make them feel truly the masters of power and of the means of production and not alienated, unless it can do this, there will emerge between this government and the masses a contradiction that could be resolved with radical and bold reforms of the system, sacrificing the interests created by a bureaucratic sector. At best, it can be resolved by means of a political revolution; at worst, with a counterrevolution. But of course these kinds of systems are not eternal and cannot be eternal.

In Poland's case it seems that this reform would have been possible through a dialogue between the party -- or perhaps rather the state authorities -- and the trade unions and the church, in other words, the country's real forces.

PZPR Did Not Reform

The party was unable to carry out this reform. It did not do so in 1956 under Gomulka, in 1970 under Gierek or in 1979-80 under Kania. But if it had carried out this reform would it not have avoided the disasters that Poland has experienced?

It must be said, to be honest, that the Soviet leadership's pressure was decisive in ensuring that the Polish party would not carry out this reform. This was the case in 1956, 1970 and again now, when the threat of military intervention loomed over the Poles day after day. There was a campaign of articles and documents which effectively inhibited any autonomous and independent initiative that the PZPR leaders might have intended to carry out.

Only One Model for CPSU

The fact is, comrades, that in practice the Soviet leadership proceeds from the idea that the Soviet model is the supreme form of socialist society, not to say the only one. Moreover, the Soviet model is obligatory in Warsaw Pact countries. In this respect there is a parallel in bloc policy with the one pursued by NATO, which regards the model of the veto and prejudice against communists as fundamental.

This model is demonstrated by what happened in Czechoslovakia. There the regeneration campaign stemmed from the communist party itself, from its Central Committee, not from the church. However, despite the fact that it was the party that was undertaking it while taking into account Czechoslovakia's real economic development, culture and traditions -- despite all this, the regeneration was crushed by the force of arms of the Warsaw Pact.

Other scapegoats were sought there, since the church could not be blamed, and they too were dubbed "agents of imperialism."

Previously something similar almost happened in Yugoslavia. But that country had carried out its own revolution with its own forces. And although at one point at the end of the struggle it was helped by the Red Army to complete the expulsion of the nazis from its territory, the Yugoslavas gained their liberation with their own spilt blood and their own efforts, and with a party of their own, which had a personality of its own, and support and strength in the country resulting from its skill in leading the patriotic and revolutionary struggle, and which knew how to and was able to maintain the special characteristics of the Yugoslav model, without accepting the models that it attempted to impose on it.

Imposition of Soviet Model

It is obvious, comrades, that the USSR has in some cases exported revolution. The USSR has exported revolution and has exported its model. In the light of a whole series of events it is clear, comrades, that 1947 saw the end of the new experiences that constituted something original in what were then called the people's democracies, with multiparty systems and composite forms of public and private ownership. These experiences were eliminated, the Soviet model was implemented and later the notorious trials were held in the people's democracies, as a way of ensuring the Soviet model and elminating any false hope of adapting socialist models to those peoples' own characteristics.

Extending Eurocommunism

This combination of experiences that we have witnessed obliges us to go deeper and further forward in the formulation of our Eurocommunist path. And it must be admitted that this is not easy. And it is not easy, comrades, because there is a traditional culture of the communist movement, a traditional culture that is not only maintained by the older generations but has also gained a hold on the new generations. This traditional culture turns the Soviet model into the most lofty, indeed the only, form of socialism and in the theoretical field, Stalin's debasement of Leninism as a dogma, as the guide, which for many years led the communist parties and which still underlies many aspects today. [sentence as published]

To talk about other possible paths -- not to mention a third path, the third way between social democracy and the Soviet model -- seemed like an evil crime against Marxism-Leninism. What has happened, then, comrades? Something that we believe that has been fundamental and is still fundamental for communists, adherence to the ideas of the October Revolution, to the ideas that generated the October Revolution, adherence to this revolution which, irrespective of all the vicissitudes and negative aspects that may have occurred after it, is in this era and for the whole of mankind the initiation, the starting point for a world revolutionary process leading to the spread of socialism, as the great French revolution was in another historical era for the advent of the bourgeois socioeconomic order.

This adherence, I repeat, to which we are still loyal and which we still regard as one of our distinguishing and original traits became -- through the influence of Stalinist concepts and the Stalinist interpretation of Leninism within our party -- adherence to the Soviet model, to the Soviet political and economic model, and lost its original character. Thus it became possible to manipulate adherence to the October Revolution for things not always in the world revolutionary movement's interests.

Loyalty to October Revolution

I therefore believe that when considering the issues that we are presenting in this draft resolution it should be stressed that our idea that the Soviet model is now obsolete, especially in the developed countries, that it has completed a cycle and that it is no longer a pole of attraction for broad masses of the world does not mean a break -- or anything like it -- on our part with the great historical event of the October Revolution.

As the resolution states, though I do not want to repeat the arguments presented there, this October Revolution was the beginning of the world socialist revolutionary progress, the revolution that broke the imperialist chain, that smashed the capitalist order in one-sixth of the world for the first time, that imparted a thrust to the revolutionary movement throughout the world and that achieved progress even in social policy, in the concessions that the capitalist countries' bourgeoisie made to their countries' workers. It also gave impetus to the birth of the communist parties, which at a particular moment in history rallied the working class' most advanced sectors alongside the October Revolution and which were a response to social democracy's failure and capitulation. Let us not forget the decisive contribution that the state that emerged from that revolution made to the defeat of Hitlerism and the real assistance -- despite certain contradictory phenomena, since history and life are full of such contradictions -- the real assistance that it gave in many cases to the liberation movements.

In other words, we invoke the October Revolution's gains and historical significance as our marks of origin.

We still believe that the emergence of the communist parties was a historical necessity in the face of social democratic reformism. We believe that it is still a necessity in the face of the danger of the aspirations to freedom and the new possibilities emerging in the developed countries being lost due to the weight of social democratic influences within the workers movement.

Exhaustion of Soviet Model

But what we also say is that the Soviet model can no longer constitute the impetus or pole of attraction for the workers masses, especially in the developed countries.

What we assert is the need for a third way between social democracy and the Soviet model, and we must strive to ensure that our comrades, including even the least educated of them, understand this. We must strive to overcome the identification or adherence to the October Revolution with adherence to the Soviet model as "the loftiest and the only form of socialism." We must do this by dealing -- as we have been for some time -- with important elements, I repeat, of the traditional culture of the communist movement and therefore of our party, the influential elements that are the most difficult to surmount. And I say that we are making an effort, because our party has been second to no other communist party in this process of reappraisal of our movement's traditional culture, which has taken shape in the steps taken in the formulation of a Eurocommunist outlook.

I believe that the draft resolution clearly lays down the aspects that define our Eurocommunist outlook, and I want to spare you, and myself, a repetition of what the draft resolution says on this subject.

Eurocommunism Is Not Social Democracy

I would simply say with regard to this aspect, what we might call the definition of Eurocommunism, that this outlook is in no way a rightwing line. It in no way implies a swing to the right by the party, nor a social democratization of the party. And of course we must guard against any trend in that direction, because it would not be a Eurocommunist outlook.

In fact the Eurocommunist outlook, under the conditions of our country and other European countries, is the outlook of the communist left, the outlook of the most advanced and revolutionary sector of the communist movement, an outlook which still attaches great importance to the party's role, to the party as a vanguard, to the party as a class party, but which recognizes -- and not only in words -- that there are other parties that represent other currents among the workers and the working classes and that a revolutionary party alone can in no way represent, as we have taught by the experience of the single-party system according to the Soviet model, a truly revolutionary party cannot represent the entire people, cannot represent all workers forces and sectors.

And in this way, by recognizing the role of other parties and, as the proposal says, attaching importance to a policy of alliances, abandoning any idea of a role as a ruling party, abandoning any idea of merging state and party and maintaining its secular character in all areas of the state, we still regard the party as the most valuable tool in the struggle for the revolutionary transformation of society. The vanguard party, the party of the most aware sectors -- and not by virtue of any label that gives us that character, but insofar as we are able to pursue a creative revolutionary Marxist policy and to recognize that on a number of other occasions and in a number of other situations other parties of socialist tendencies and other social movements could perceive some aspect of the real conditions, no matter which, more clearly than us and that if so, we must be able to assimilate these advances, this progress in the discovery and solution of new problems achieved outside the party.

And in this regard I believe that our party has advanced a great deal. Now it cannot be said of our party, of the Italian party or of several other parties that they have any similarity with the Stalinist type of party.

New Forms of Organizations of the Workers Movement

So, what conclusion do we reach? We reach the conclusion that the forms of organization of the world revolutionary movement around the CPSU and the Soviet Union, which first took the form of the COMINTERN and later the communist movement and the international conferences -- these forms of organization have definitively reached a state of crisis; and that is not enough to say that there is no leading party and no center while in practice continuing to act around a leading party and continuing to revolve around a center; that it is necessary to advance toward new forms of organization of the world revolutionary movement. In the draft resolution we mention the Zimmerwald and Kiental Conferences, at which the foundations were laid and the seeds sown for what was to become the prelude to the disintegration of the Second Social Democratic International and the creation of the Communist International.

We cite Zimmerwald and Kiental not because we believe that a new international should be formed. What we mean is first, that we in no way intend to return to the Second International. This is the first thing that we wish to say in this assertion -- that we stand by the historical break with social democracy and that we do not repent it. But we wish to say that we are also witnessing a moment of change, radical change in the organization of the world revolutionary movement, of radical change of a historic importance -- as can be seen from current events -- at least as great as or greater than that of the process begun by Zimmerwald and Kiental.

In other words, we believe that we must proceed to something new. With whom? Obviously with the communist parties. But also with the socialist parties that are emerging from the well-trodden paths of social democracy. And we believe that we are at present in a process in which some very important stances and tendencies toward true socialist postures are emerging in the socialist parties, and this can be seen in France, Greece and Britain. The same applies to the national liberation movements, the revolutionary national liberation movements. We believe that this new organization must be broad and flexible enough to integrate, in a process which we know will be neither brief nor easy, the forces of the world revolutionary movement as a whole, proceeding from the principle of their diversity and independence and uniting them in everything that they share, which is ultimately summed up by the need to carry out successfully the world revolutionary process.

We know that this process will not be easy now, when on the one hand there is the NATO pact, a large group of countries centered on U.S. imperialism, and on the other hand the Warsaw Pact, a rallying of a major forces around the Soviet Union. However, even if it means "rising before daybreak" [i.e. working day and night] we are opting for something without which the policy of blocs, of suppression of independence, freedom and the peoples will culminate in a disaster for mankind.

Capitalist Crisis, Crisis of Civilization

Obviously we will experience difficulties in this struggle, because this Eurocommunism, this kind of socialism that we advocate for these countries does not exist anywhere, admittedly. the reproach addressed to us is that the other kind does exist and that it is in power. It seems to me that the fact that it does not exist anywhere is not a scientific argument against this Eurocommunist concept.

Before 1917 a revolutionary anticapitalist power did not exist anywhere, but nevertheless millions of workers were struggling for it and believed in it. Before 1917 the October Revolution would have seemed like a vast Utopia to most people. Before World War II no decolonization processes had taken place and the fact is that we did not clearly imagine possible such a thorough and radical decolonization process as has taken place in this historical period.

Comrades, it is enough to remember the nature of British or French imperialism in the world, the power that it wielded among the colonial peoples, to realize that the changes that have occurred in a relatively brief period of history have been extraordinary. We proceed from the principle that in this era of crisis in capitalist civilization, which is also an era of crisis in the model to which I referred earlier, socialism is an objective historical necessity, and we are therefore confident that this third way -- which has not yet triumphed anywhere and which has no models -- will eventually find models, will eventually triumph and will eventually become a reality. And this is how the countries of Europe, the developed world and the Third World can in this period impart a new impetus to the revolutionary movement that will not only complete the process begun in the capitalist world by October but also help the countries that have advanced under socialist-type regimes to transform their political system and advance within a developed form of socialism, a complete form of socialism such as we do not now possess.

KING, FOREIGN MINISTER RETURN FROM VISIT TO INDIA

LD010140 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 31 Jan 82

[Excerpts] After their 8-day state visit to India the king and queen returned to Madrid this evening aboard the official DC-8, a journey of 13 and a half hours plus a stopover of 4 hours in Riyadh, where they met King Khalid of Saudi Arabia. The senior member of the delegation which went with the king and queen to India, Foreign Affairs Minister Perez Llorca, said at Barajas Airport that during their stay in New Delhi they had agreed on the signing of a cultural agreement and that progress had been made on economic matters, with the possibility of selling Spanish Aviocar aircraft. This would give a boost to the present meager trade relations which amount to about $150 million. Perez Llorca also said that Spain and India had learned more about each other's foreign policy and had drawn closer in this area.

SPOKESMAN DENIES REPORTS OF BORDER 'CONCESSIONS'

NC011153 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Referring to today's press reports about new concessions and acceptance of state boundaries, the government spokesman said: Neither President Kiprianou nor the Greek Cypriot side have ever agreed to, or are about to agree on, the establishment of state boundaries. This is something which for us is out of question, and there is no issue of direct or indirect acceptance of state boundaries.

In connection with the issue of security [for the Turkish Cypriots], the spokesman said a very wrong interpretation is being given to what concerns the Greek Cypriot positions. It is again stated, he stressed, that we have not accepted the Waldheim ideas as a basis for negotiation, but we have simply expressed and are expressing our views on them. The government spokesman added that the United Nations has explained repeatedly that the Waldheim ideas constitute a method and not a basis for negotiations. UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar repeated this during his recent meeting with Foreign Minister Rolandhis.

SPOKESMAN CLARIFIES 'REPOSITIONING' TERM

NC311750 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 31 Jan 82

[Excerpt] The government spokesman has reiterated that if the intercommunal dialogue does not bear fruit, then the Cyprus issue will be handled in other ways, such as focusing in the Cyprus debate at the UN General Assembly. As to what would actually be pursued, he said, it would be studied carefully and the National Council would be called on to express its views. The spokesman made this statement in answer to press criticism on the question of repositioning the Cyprus issue.

DENKTAS APPOINTS CAGATAY TO FORM NEW GOVERNMENT

TA011143 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Excerpt] President Denktas has again entrusted the task of forming a new government to the leader of the National Unity Party, [NUP], Mr Mustafa Cagatay. Speaking to correspondents this morning after a meeting with Mr Cagatay, President Denktas said that he had asked Mr Cagatay to form a new government after a delay of about 2 months since the previous government of Mr Cagatay had received a vote of no confidence at the legislative assembly. He said that the delay was because of a dialogue between the two largest parties in the assembly on the formation of a coalition government. President Denktas said that since the dialogue had not yielded positive results he has asked Mr Cagatay, as the leader of the party with a largest number of seats in the assembly, to form a new government and Mr Cagatay has accepted the task.

DENKTAS RECEIVES UN ASSISTANT SECRETARY GENERAL

TA010953 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Excerpt] President Rauf Denktas has reiterated that we will continue our positive and constructive attitude at the intercommunal talks. Denktas today received Assistant UN Secretary General for Special Political Affairs Urquhart. Replying to questions after the meeting, Denktas said Urquhart did not bring any proposal from Secretary General Perez de Cuellar in connection with the talks. Pointing out that the intercommunal talks are continuing within the framework of the views of former Secretary General Waldheim, Denktas said: Since the United Nations supports this, it will bring no further proposal. Denktas confirmed that he will meet with Perez de Cuellar at one of the UN centers in Europe during the first or second week of April but denied reports that he will have a joint meeting with Perez de Cuellar and Kiprianou.

FLEET TO BEGIN AEGEAN EXERCISES 1 FEBRUARY

NC301559 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1500 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] A medium-scale fleet exercise, codenamed Kataigis [Storm] 1-82, has been scheduled by the Navy General Staff to begin in the Aegean on 1 February. Destroyers, missile boats, torpedo boats, submarines, landing craft, helicopters,(?liaison) aircraft and support vessels will take part in the maneuvers. Certain phases of the maneuvers will be supported by air force planes. The purpose of the maneuvers is to train personnel in various forms of naval operations. The maneuvers will be directed by the commander of the fleet.

PAPANDREOU CRITICIZES U.S. OVER CYPRUS, POLAND

NC301134 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 30 Jan 82 p 1

[Text] The CYPRUS NEWS AGENCY reported yesterday that Mr Papandreou criticized the way certain Western countries are reacting to the Polish situation while doing nothing about the imposition of martial law in Turkey and the continuing invasion in Cyprus. Speaking to President Kiprianou in Athens, Mr Papandreou stressed that the Cyprus issue is not simply a problem of two communities, as incorrectly presented by some, but a problem of an invasion and foreign occupation of an independent state -- a member of the United Nations.

He then stated: "Within these deliberate deceits there is also something else. Today the West, particularly the United States, is in turmoil because of the martial law and the danger of a Soviet invasion in Poland, but not a word is being uttered by responsible lips about the stern dictatorship that has been imposed on the Turkish people, and not a word about the foul invasion of Attila 1 and Attila 2 in Cyprus. How is it possible to allow this great lie, these histrionics, of the big powers that none of the other powers seem to have the courage to reveal? Cyprus is under occupation and this is being discussed as if it were an issue of the two communities. The attention of our NATO and EEC partners is totally turned toward Poland, as if we have no problem. Our struggle will be to reveal and to disseminate the truth about the problem Cyprus is facing."

PAPANDREOU LEAVES FOR BONN, MAKES STATEMENT

NC011226 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1200 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Papandreou begins a 4-day official visit to the FRG today at the invitation of Chancellor Schmidt. Prior to his departure, the prime minister made the following statement to the Armed Forces Radio: I attach special importance to this visit. The FRG and Mr Schmidt constitute a decisive factor in political developments in Europe and the world. I shall have the opportunity for an in-depth examination of our relations at all levels, as well as the role we can play through our cooperation within the framework of Western Europe. I leave with optimism and I hope to return equally optimistic.

YUGOSLAV DELEGATION ARRIVES 31 JAN FOR TALKS

EVREN STATEMENT ON COUNCIL OF EUROPE RESOLUTION

TA311224 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 31 Jan 82

[Statement by head of state General Evren 31 January -- recorded]

[Text] Dear citizens: As you have noticed both on Turkish Radio and Television and in the press since the 12 September [1980] action, while Turkey was trying to cope with its daily problems and our lofty people were conducting a struggle for their survival, efforts have been made both in the Council of Europe and among the public of the friendly member countries of the council to incite an atmosphere against our country because of alleged violations of basic human rights and liberties. Before I explain the basic reasons that led to my present statement, I must say a few words to our citizens on the goals and activities of the Council of Eruope, whose stand and attitude toward Turkey -- has been contrary to all forms of friendship, has been incompatible with rules of international relations, has surpassed tolerable limits and has taken an almost hostile turn.

The Council of Europe was established on 5 May 1949 by countries of Western Europe after the bitter experiences of World War II in a bid to enhance the ideal of a united Europe, to defend and propagate the common goals and ideals of its members, provide for progress in the social, cultural and judicial fields, secure closer ties among them and to encourage broader cooperation among its members. For the realization of these goals, European countries with a democratic parlimentary system have been given the opportunity to become members of the council. Currently 21 countries are registered as members of the council.

Turkey -- which during its existence as a republic has always respected basic human rights and liberties -- has since its establishment been loyal to these goals of the council and has been one of its more enthusiastic members. The principal organs of the Council of Europe are a Ministerial Committee and a Parlimentary Assembly with consultative powers. Parliamentary delegates to the Consultative Assembly are appointed directly by the assemblies of the member countries or by a procedure accepted by parliaments by which political parties are authorized to send representatives in accordance with their representation in the home parliament. It can be claimed easily that all political parties and trends in the parliaments of the member countries are represented in the Council of Europe's Parliamentary Assembly.

Some members of the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe, which according to its statute has been established to work for greater unity among its members, to develop and uphold the principles of parliamentary democracy, the rule of law and human rights -- have preferred to remain silent, inactive and indifferent while incidents of terror were incited in Turkey by international terrorism and foreign sources, whose aim was to divide and disrupt our country, while brutal murders were committed in the streets at the rate of an average of 20 persons a day, creating a blood bath in the country, while the most natural rights and liberties of our citizens were trampled upon, while hate and discord was spread among our citizens, and, in brief, while the Turkish state was being destroyed. It has only been since the 12 September action that these parliamentarians have begun to take a great interest in happenings in our country and have realized that human beings were living in Turkey. These same parliamentarians have considered the trial of the treacherous criminals that were responsible for the killing of our 5,000 citizens and that were determined to destroy the unity and existence of our country before independent and just Turkish courts as a grave violation of basic human rights and liberties stipulated in Article 8 of the Council of Europe statutes.

Despite the fact that the parliament in Turkey was dissolved following the 12 September 1980 action, and as a result of the respect we felt toward the goals and principles of the Council of Europe, our parliamentarians who were members of the Consultative Assembly of the council were permitted to continue their duties until May 1981, at which time the council working sessions ended.

It is with the same belief that though Turkey had no representatives left in the council's Consultative Assembly, it has not asked to leave the council in accordance with article 7 of the council statutes. However, some members of the Council of Europe's Consultative Assembly with a certain political tendency have raised the question of the continuation of Turkey's membership in their deliberations in the committees of the council, as well as in its plenum, and have thus created both in the European and the Turkish public grounds for propaganda against our country, and have even tried to weaken the national administration in Turkey, which enjoys the great support of our lofty people.

The various committee and subcommittee members who have visited Turkey in connection with the matter have benefitted from the broad facilities granted to them by the administration in a manner they cannot receive in any other country, and they received any information they desired from the most authoritative sources. Despite this, there have been attempts to portray Turkey as a country that violates human rights and the principle of the supremacy of law and where inquisitorial methods of the Middle Ages are prevalent. Council of Europe members have thus continued their statements and attitudes that cast a shadow over the goals of the 12 September coup and even constitute interference in Turkey's internal affairs that are vitally important to Turkey by insistently dwelling on the possibilities of ousting Turkey from the Council of Europe or suspending Turkey's right to representation in the council. Judging from the extent of the efforts exerted by these members to secure a recommendation by the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe to expel Turkey from the council, there is no doubt that they are intentionally prejudiced and are acting through special calculations with regard to Turkey having gravely violated the third article of the council statutes.

Every sensible person appreciates the fact that through the 12 September operation the Turkish armed forces did not choose the path of rejecting human rights and the supremacy of law. On the contrary, through this operation the Turkish armed forces undertook their inevitable intervention which was the only solution in the extremely dangerous situation that prevailed prior to 12 September, when all basic rights and freedoms -- particularly the right to live -- were seriously threatened, when parliament was rendered unoperational and the very existence of the country and the state was being destroyed. The purpose of this operation was to establish rapidly a parliamentary and democratic system that respects human rights and basic freedoms. Great progress has already been achieved toward the goals announced at the beginning of the operation through serious, sincere and firm efforts that cannot be denied by anyone.

Therefore, it is impossible to explain the efforts to completely separate Turkey from the Council of Europe community -- in whose membership Turkey believes -- in terms of the feelings of friendship toward the Turkish nation, the statutes of the council or the de facto and legal situation in Turkey. Moreover, Turkey has not asked to send a representative to the Council of Europe Consultative Assembly until its new parliament is formed by the general elections to be held following the preparation and ratification by referendum of its new constitution. It has thus in practice terminated Turkey's representative in the Consultative Assembly of the council.

It must be realized that it is impossible for the Turkish nation to accept statements made against Turkey by persons before or after a visit here, to the effect of pretending not to understand the necessary transition period that began with 12 September and the conditions that led to this situation, or to accept proposals being prepared, and especially influence being exerted, to prevent Turkey from attaining its goals of 12 September. In other words, it is impossible for the Turkish nation to accept the adoption of proposals and resolutions that constitute blatant interference in Turkey's internal affairs.

As you know, the Council of Europe Consultative Assembly has again recently taken up the issue of Turkey. It has also adopted a recommendation resolution following great struggles and important clashes among viewpoints. These recent arguments have revealed that the issue has been diverted from concern over Turkey's return to democracy to subjects that are not in any way relevant to theprocess of establishing democratic institutions on a solid foundation. Certain parliamentarians have attacked Turkey with a ferocity originating from the discord between Turkey and their country rather than from loyalty to democracy.

As a result, a resolution has been adopted that deeply clashes not only with events but also with impressions received and conclusions recently reached by the Consultative Assembly delegation. It is evident that we cannot take into consideration this resolution adopted by the Consultative Assembly. In the face of the prejudiced, influenced and negative attitudes by certain Council of Europe representatives of states in whose friendship we believe, it is necessary to note that Turkey is resolute not to tolerate henceforth any steps that constitute interference in its internal affairs and not to accept as a subject for the agenda the latest resolution in this vein passed by the Council of Europe Consultative Assembly.

As of now, the emphasis in our relations with the Council of Europe has moved to the ministerial and delegates committee in which governments are represented. It is natural that we will coordinate our relations with the Council of Europe in accordance with governments' attitudes in the future. It must be known that if certain of these governments transform their interest in the developments in Turkey into interference in our internal affairs, our reaction will be firm and decisive. During our work, which aims at determining the necessary measures to avoid a return to the conditions prior to 12 September 1980 and which deals with the existence of the state, the task of reviving the democratic institutions in our country -- including political parties and labor unions -- and supervising the respect of human rights was assumed by the Turkish nation, which is extremely possessive about its independence, whose civilization extends beyond the ages and which valued human dignity above all other values long before our European friends.

All members must fully realize that Turkey is not a state that will worry over the possible consequences of the recent resolution, deviate from its national goals or make concessions in its dignity and sovereignty. If all our candor and sincere efforts we exerted in a bid to explain and show our friends the truth behind the events in Turkey and the facts in the most clear manner have not been sufficient, then we do not see any other course than abandoning their likes along with their own judgements. It is evident that in a way this attitude of these members who blame Turkey may be interpreted as encouraging international terrorist elements to perpetrate actions against Turkey and as support for them. The attacks directed against Turkish missions abroad, including the Los Angeles incident that occurred on 28 January constitute evidence of this viewpoint.

Meanwhile, another issue I would like to stress is the polemics by certain Council of Europe members on the content of the Turkish constitution, which is being drafted. The fact that it is the Turkish people themselves and not the European Council members who will determine the kind of constitution that must be drawn up is beyond explanation. This in turn will emerge through the referandum to be held. I would like openly to recommend to these honorable members to direct this interest, which has become interference in the internal affairs of Turkey, to their countries' own problems, to take effective measures courageously and faithfully against the terrorist incidents in their countries and to oppose international terrorism -- which become the disgrace of the human race at the end of the 20th century -- in their own countries so as to effect justice.

The roots of democracy in Turkey are much stronger than in certain countries that are now facing us as our critics. If those who attack us during our transition period in order to protect their own weak democratic structures believe they will acquire strength through this means, then I would like to point out that they are making an historical error. The current atmosphere in Turkey of trust in the future reflects the Turkish nation's political maturity based on past experience, its loyalty to the essence of democracy, its aspiration of a stable parliamentary regime and its trust in our administration. I extend my respect to all of you, my dear citizens.

Ulusu Statement

TA301228 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] In a statement in Ankara today, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu said the resolution passed by the Council of Europe Consultative Assembly did not seem to stem from a wish to see democracy restored in Turkey. Ulusu said the resolution included elements not relevant to this issue, contradicted the facts and carried a hostile approach to Turkey. He pointed out that this resolution would not affect government activities to be carried out in a bid to implement the goals of the 12 September action.

This incident has proved once more, Ulusu said, that Turkey cannot take into consideration resolutions by an organ in which it has not been represented. Recalling that the government was continuing to assess the resolution, Ulusu said head of state General Evren would make a radio and TV address to the people on this subject on 31 January.

On the issue of the assassination of Turkish Consul General Kemal Arikan in Los Angeles, the prime minister said this was the work of international terrorism and added that it should be clear that the assassins would not escape punishment. In conclusion, Ulusu expressed hope that the transition period aimed at restoring the democratic system, with all its institutions, would be realized in full cooperation without any problems and for the benefit of the people.

Ulusu Address to Assembly

TA301603 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Ankara, 30 Jan (AA) -- Addressing the last budget session of the Consultative Assembly, Ulusu said the Council of Europe resolution of 28 January contained certain "allegations and serious and unfair charges" against the Turkish administration which did not reflect the actual situation in Turkey. It was not possible to view the resolution as merely the reflection of a desire to see democracy reinstated in Turkey, he said, for it reflects a "hostile stance" against Turkey which is contrary to the facts.

Turkey had always tried to solve disputes with Greece through negotiations, Ulusu noted, but a dialogue was not established because the other side did not reciprocate Turkey's approach. "However," he daded, "Turkey will never tolerate any fait accompli," and will insist that Greece adhere to treaty obligations. Ulusu reiterated his government's emphasis on friendly relations and cooperation with countries of the Middle East, Balkans and Asia and Africa.

Referring to the assassination of the Turkish consul general in Los Angeles by Armenian terrorists, Ulusu noted the world had once more seen "the ugly face of terrorism." He called on U.S. authorities to bring the murderers to justice.

ECEVIT RELEASED FROM PRISON BY AUTHORITIES 1 FEB

NC011039 Paris AFP in English 1030 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Ankara, 1 Feb (AFP) -- Former Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit was released from prison here today, after serving two-thirds of a four-month sentence for violating a decree banning political activity. The social democrat leader emerged from Ankara central prison to a crowd of some 300 supporters shouting "Ecevit for the people." Another crowd of about 500 were waiting to greet him outside his home. Mr Ecevit was released under a Turkish law allowing a one-third pardon for good behavior.

AL FATAH SENDS WARNING TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

AU292216 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 2110 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] The Al Fatah Palestinian group has addressed a sharp warning to the Federal Government. A communique sent to the Austrian Embassy in Kuwait says in part that the Vienna government is responsible for the well-being of the arrested Palestinians Hasan, Rajih and Yunis. The three men had been arrested for the attack on the Vienna synagogue and for the murder of City Councilman Nittel.

Al-Asifah Threatens

AU301913 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1830 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] The Al-'Asifah Palestinian splinter group led by Abu Nidal has threatened the government with serious consequences if the two synagogue assailants Marwan Hasan and Husham Rajih, who received life sentences at their recent trial, as well as their alleged case officer Bahij Yunis are not set free. The Austrian Embassy in Beirut received a note to this effect. The note further states that the Vienna government must first enter into contact with Al-'Asifah before it accepts the new PLO representative.

DENMARK

FOREIGN MINISTER RESPONDS TO U.S. CRITICISM

NC300710 Paris AFP in English 0636 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] Copenhagen, 30 Jan (AFP) -- Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen last night defended Denmark's criticism of the Turkish military regime. His remarks were a reaction to complaints by U.S. leaders that certain Western Europeans had accused Washington of focusing criticism on Poland while forgetting to speak out against the Turkish regime because it is a Western ally.

Mr Olesen said: "Of course the human rights violations in Turkey and Poland cannot be compared, yet it is a fact that the Danish Government opposes what is happening in Poland as well as what is happening in Turkey -- in Poland because a violation of the Final Act at Helsinki is taking place, which naturally is particularly dangerous because it directly influences East-West relations. "As for Turkey, it is important for that country as a member of the Council of Europe to respect its commitments, as a big majority at the council's parliamentary assembly has just stated."

COMMUNIST PARTY CONGRESS ADOPTS NEW PROGRAM

[Text] About 550 delegates from all over Austria attended yesterday's special congress of the Austrian Communist Party [KPOE], which adopted a new party program. As party Chairman Franz Muhri underlined in his report, the program "Socialism in Austria's Colors" had been discussed for more than a year in the party organizations and in the communist press and was also presented to the people at public meetings. The KPOE program has two main parts -- sociopolitical and ideological -- on Austria's road to socialism. According to Muhri, there is no generally valid model for this road to socialism, neither a Soviet nor a Eurocommunist one, because "generally valid principles of socialism must be implemented in a national form."

The new party program pays great attention to the KPOE's demands and action program. The KPOE demands that the progress achieved in Helsinki on detente in Europe be consolidated and confirmed by specific disarmament steps. The program discusses in detail the pressing problems of Austria's economic and political situation. The demands voiced in this context include safeguarding jobs, democratization in all fields of life, expansion and strengthening of the nationalized industry sector and effective legislation for environmental protection.

EX-POLICE OFFICIAL SENTENCED ON SPY CHARGES

AU011448 Vienna WIENER ZEITING in German 30 Jan 82 p 5

[Summary] A Vienna court yesterday sentenced Edgar Berger, retired former head of the Vienna police alien affairs department, to 2 years' imprisonment for betraying state secrets to the Romanian intelligence service, misuse of office and supporting a secret service to the detriment of the Republic of Austria. A jury had found him guilty on all three charges. The state prosecutor stressed in his plea that although Berger was certainly no master spy causing East-West relations to be upset, he was nevertheless not harmless. The defense counsel claimed that the information supplied by Berger was not in the state secrets category and that he was exposed to pressure by the Romanians.

CHARGES ON POLAND MARK NEW MBFR ROUND OPENING

AU291915 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 29 Jan 82 p 3

[Excerpts] At the first plenary session this year of the Vienna negotiations on reduction of forces in central Europe, East and West have again mutually charged each other with being responsible for the virtual deadlock in the talks. Belgian chief delegate Ambassador Leon Doyen, who addressed yesterday's session, drew attention among other things to the NATO decision of 11 January which refers to negative consequences of the latest Polish events for security and cooperation in Europe as well as for the process of arms control. In spontaneous replies the Polish and Soviet chief delegates described Doyen's remarks on events in Poland as an "interference in Poland's internal affairs" and resolutely rejected them, arguing that there was no connection whatever with the force reduction talks.

Polish chief delegate Ambassador Stanislaw Przygodzki said at a press conference following the plenary session that it was necessary finally to "break away from the vicious circle of unproductive discussions in Vienna," and that the West should accept the Eastern proposal to appoint a drafting committee. This committee should start by working out written formulations on questions where the positions of the two sides have been reconciled.

PAPANDREOU ARRIVES FOR TALKS WITH SCHMIDT

LD011600 Hamburg DPA in German 1524 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 1 Feb (DPA) -- Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou arrived in Bonn on Monday for a 4-day visit. On Tuesday morning he will meet with Chancellor Schmidt for a private exchange of views. In addition he will have talks with President Karl Carstens, Economic Affairs Minister Count Otto Lambsdorff, Defense Minister Hans Apel and SPD Chairman Willy Brandt.

Current problems in NATO and the EEC will play a central role in Papandreou's visit. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker stressed on Monday to the press in Bonn that there could be no "special role" for Greece within the alliance and the EEC. In both organizations the partners have equal rights and duties. Every member country of NATO and the EEC will encounter the wish and desire of the majority that there should be no change in the continuity of the alliance and the community through a change of government.

Observers see this remark in connection with the fact that the new socialist head of state Papandreou adopted an independent position within NATO and the EEC in his first public appearances. According to information from Athens the demand for a guarantee of Greece's eastern borders with Turkey remains the principal question for Papandreou which, unless solved, could block progress in the reintegration of Athens into the NATO military wing. The prime minister will undoubtedly be looking for more German support for Greece's problems with Turkey and in the Cyprus question.

Papandreou stressed, when he left on the first foreign trip of his 100-day period of office that he attaches special importance to this visit, since the FRG and the chancellor are decisive factors in political developments both inside and outside Europe. He is traveling "optimistically" to Bonn.

Papandreou Interviewed

DW021203 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2130 GMT 1 Feb 82

["Excerpt" from Wolfgang Feller interview with Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou in Bonn; in English with superimposed German translation -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Prime Minister, you are a troublemaker in Europe; what is the objective of your foreign policy?

[Answer] It is aimed at serving our country's interests and security. The only difference with the past is that we are now shifting our national interests into the foreground.

[Question] NATO has stated that it is impossible to guarantee Greece's borders, for example, vis-a-vis Turkey. What do you think about this?

[Answer] Well, the last word hasn't been said about this yet. If NATO really cannot guarantee Greece's borders, then I ask: What kind of an alliance is this, anyway, if it does not guarantee the security of the territory of its member countries? As far as I am concerned this question has not yet been answered. We will definitely return to it at the next NATO meeting.

Schmidt, Papandreou Hold Talks

[Excerpt] Bonn, 2 Feb (DPA) -- Talks on Tuesday between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and his Greek counterpart Andreas Papandreou were marked by the attempts of the Federal Government to draw the new socialist government in Greece closer to the NATO alliance and the European Community. Bonn government circles confirmed that Greece, which has taken a critical stance toward NATO and the EEC since the socialist change of government, cannot demand a special role in the two bodies.

Papandreou's Bonn talks opened this morning with an exchange of views alone with the chancellor. Later the two men were joined by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Minister of State Gunter Huonker from the chancellor's office. According to reports, East-West relations and the situation in Poland were also discussed, as well as the central subjects of NATO and the EEC. Athens, like Bonn, opposes the idea that the CSCE follow-up conference in Madrid should be postponed because of the declaration of martial law in Poland.

ADDITIONAL U.S. FORCES TO BE DEPLOYED IN 1983

[Text] Hamburg, 1 Feb (DPA) -- According to Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD) the FRG and the United States intend to conclude an agreement on the deployment in case of emergency of six additional U.S. divisions in the FRG. In an interview in QUICK magazine Apel announced that beginning in 1983 it will require additional funds of about DM50 million. Negotiations on this were planned with the finance minister. The Foreign Ministry published the plans for additional deployment in September last year. It was also said then that some 2,000 Germans would maintain and guard the stored material for the U.S. troops in peacetime. At the moment there are some 200,000 U.S. soldiers in the FRG.

On cooperation within NATO, Apel said that through public statements the impression should not now arise "that the crisis of the Eastern alliance has become the crisis of the Western." There is "no doubt" about the FRG's loyalty to the alliance. A nuclear-free zone in Europe, such as was recently called for by the Hamburg party conference of the SPD would, in Apel's opinion, heighten the danger of war because the conventional superiority of the Warsaw Pact "by comparison with us could be used as a means of exerting pressure."

The interview was prereleased to DPA in an edited form.

MOVE TO POSTPONE MADRID CONFERENCE REJECTED

LD011614 Hamburg DPA in German 1527 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 1 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Government rejects all suggestions that the Madrid follow-up Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) should be postponed as a response to the events in Poland. The Foreign Ministry spokesman said this to journalists on Monday. He pointed out that it is Bonn's view that the Soviet Union especially at this point should not be released from its obligation to implement the CSCE final acts of Helsinki.

On reports from Washington, according to which the administration there is striving for a postponement of the CSCE, the spokesman said that Bonn does not know of an "official move" to this effect by the United States. He did, however, confirm that there are close consultations on this question within the Western alliance, in which "different nuances" exist. The spokesman said that Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has written to his U.S. counterpart, Alexander Haig on this topic. A reply is still awaited.

ECYPT'S MUBARAK ARRIVES FOR TALKS WITH MITTERRAND

Mubarak Interviewed

NC312236 Cairo MENA in Arabic 2040 GMT 31 Jan 82

[Text] Paris, 31 Jan (MENA) -- In its main newscast tonight, the French television channel two broadcast an interview with President Husni Mubarak. The president announced that our doors are open to the Arab world as of now and 25 April should not be a deadline. The president announced that the impression should not prevail that corruption is rampant in Egypt just because the courts are considering two or three cases, and that Egypt is exerting every effort to narrow the gap between the wealthy and the poor with the aim of creating equal opportunities for all. He said: We believe that the widening of the gap would represent a social danger. We provide opportunities to everyone, and this is what we will affirm.

He was asked why he meets with the Egyptian opposition, which has not changed its stance toward the Camp David treaty, and whether this matter represents a change in Egyptian policy. The president said: They are all Egyptians. It is their right that we should discuss all fateful issues with them, although many of them still oppose this treaty. In my opinion, this stance does not represent a policy change, rather, it represents another way of handling issues and dealing with people. President Mubarak was asked that if, by doing so, he is following in the footpath of the late President Jamal 'Abd an-Nasir, Mubarak said: Every president has his method of government, however, the objective is always the same. This is because the period in which President 'Abd an-Nasir ruled the country differs from the era of President as-Sadat's rule -- and the present phase is different from the two.

He was asked why Mrs Mubarak does not appear in society, while President as-Sadat's wife did so. He answered: This is our nature; it is not possible for us to change our way. Had we sought to make propaganda, we would have had the requisite means at our disposal. However, this is our way. He was asked: You were near President as-Sadat when he was assassinated. Therefore, do you fear death? He said: Death is the fate of every human being, including both of you -- in addressing the two television broadcasters. Death occurs to every person, sooner or later. I do not fear death.

President Mubarak was asked about the date of his visit to Israel. He said: I cannot now specify the date of this visit, however, and naturally, I will make this visit.

Mubarak answered a question about whether he believes the withdrawal will take place on schedule, about whether he confides in Israeli Prime Minister Begin and about his opinion on the opposition to the withdrawal existing in Israel. He said: I am confident of Prime Minister Begin. The present opposition in Israel is a domestic affair which does not concern me. It is imperative that they settle these matters internally. The reason is that we have signed a treaty with Israel. On my part, I respect this treaty and they also respect it.

Ghali Comments on Relations

NC011018 Cairo MENA in Arabic 0940 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 1 Feb (MENA) -- Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Dr Butrus Ghali has described Egyptian-French relations as excellent in all economic, cultural and military fields. Referring to President Husni Mubarak's visit to France, he emphasized the importance of continuing the consolidation and strengthening of these relations in all fields.

In an interview with the France-Inter Radio broadcast today, Dr Ghali referred to Egyptian-French cooperation in the building of nuclear stations. He said that the first nuclear station to be set up in Egypt will be French. On President Francois Mitterrand's forthcoming visit to Israel, Dr Ghali pointed out that the important thing is for France to help in reaching a solution to the Palestinian problem, emphasizing that France can play a major role with regard to the Palestinians' legitimate rights.

On the future of the Egyptian-Israeli relations following the Israeli withdrawal in April, Dr Ghali, in his interview with France-Inter Radio, affirmed the continuation of Egypt's foreign and domestic policy, saying that Egypt will continue to act in the Palestinian interest and will continue to negotiate with Israel and the United States to achieve a solution to the Palestinian problem. Dr Ghali added that the relations between Egypt and Israel will continue as they have continued thus far. On the return of some Soviet experts to work in Egypt, Dr Ghali explained that this is a technical matter, pointing out that Egypt is a nonaligned state.

Mitterrand-Mubarak Talks

NC011730 Paris AFP in English 1720 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 1 Feb (AFP) -- Egyptian President Husni Mubarak and President Francois Mitterrand met here today and discussed French diplomatic support for Egypt and Franco-Egyptian economic cooperation, following Mr Mubarak's arrival from Rome on the second leg of a tour of Western capitals. Mr Mubarak later announced that Mr Mitterrand has accepted an invitation to pay an official visit to Egypt, perhaps in the second half of this year. Mr Mitterrand arrives in Israel next month for an official visit.

Mr Mubarak said that during their meeting, which lasted more than an hour, he and Mr Mitterrand also discussed the Middle East and bilateral relations. A French presidential spokesman added that France did not want to act as a referee in the Middle East but did want to contribute to the peace process.

French officials stress that April 25, when Israel pulls out of the Sinai, will not mark an end to the process of settling the Israeli-Arab conflict, nor will it mark an end to the role that France might be called on to play in this context. France, along with Britain, Italy, and the Netherlands, will be taking part in the multinational peacekeeping force in the post-Israeli Sinai.

In addition, as Egypt's second-ranking supplier and creditor, after the United States, France is selling Egypt 20 Mirage jets and is committed to aiding Egypt develop its nuclear industry. France is also building the new Cairo airport and modernising Egypt's telecommunications. Mr Mubarak will meet tomorrow with Yvon Gattaz, head of the French Employers Federation, and former Iranian Prime Minister Shapur Bakhtiar, before flying off to Washington.

Meeting With Bakhtiar Denied

NC012134 Cairo MENA in Arabic 2110 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Cairo, 1 Feb (MENA) -- MENA has learned that there is no truth to a report published by AFP to the effect that during his current visit to Paris, President Husni Mubarak will meet with Shapur Bakhtiar, the former Iranian prime minister. AFP today carried a statement by Bakhtiar in which he says that he will meet with President Mubarak, and that the meeting will most probably take place in Paris tomorrow, Tuesday. MENA confirms that no such date has been set, and no such meeting will take place.

Further on Talks

NC011849 Cairo MENA in English 1720 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 1 Feb (MENA) -- Egyptian President Husni Mubarak and President Francois Mitterrand held their first tete-a-tete meeting this afternoon at the Elysee Palace. The French and Egyptian foreign ministers as well as other aides will join the two presidents at a working luncheon later today. The Mitterrand-Mubarak private meeting and the working lunch lasted three hours, after which the Egyptian president said the talks dealt with bilateral issues, an exchange of ideas on the Middle East, the Palestinian autonomy negotiations and what comes before and after the final Israeli withdrawal from Sinai on April 25.

He added that he invited President Mitterrand to visit Egypt, which he would effect in the second half of this year. He denied that he discussed with President Mitterrand the latter's forthcoming visit to Israel. He said that the purpose of his current tour was to have an exchange of ideas, adding that in the United States he would also discuss bilateral issues and the Middle East question.

The Elysee Palace spokesman said the meeting began with a one-hour tete-a-tete between the two presidents, followed by a plenary working lunch attended by the two delegations. The spokesman said the two presidents had met twice before, and President Mubarak was the first senior state official to visit France after President Mitterrand had assumed power. He said there are no problems between France and Egypt, adding that Egypt occupies a leading position in the Middle East. The spokesman said that today's meeting forms part of series of talks to be held in the future to review Franco-Egyptian relations and to exchange views on future Middle East developments.

President Mitterrand will visit Israel early next month and President Mubarak will visit Israel at a date not yet fixed, he added. The French spokesman said the talks dealt with Franco-Egyptian cultural relations as well as specific issues such as the Iraq-Iran war, the Golan dispute, Libyan-Sudanese relations, and the problems of the North-South and the East-West dialogues.

He added that the talks proceded in a very warm and friendly atmosphere, with the two presidents feeling comfortable with each other. He said that President Mitterrand has accepted President Mubarak's invitation to visit Egypt, noting that he had visited Egypt several times before becoming president. He recalled that President Mitterrand had said before that France should not take the position of a judge in Middle East affairs but should do what it could to help in the peace process.

Mitterrand Interviewed

NC012355 Cairo MENA in English 2245 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Cairo, 1 Feb (MENA) -- French President Francois Mitterrand asserted today the importance of President Husni Mubarak's visit to France, adding that the visit has its implications. In an interview with the Egyptian television, President Mitterrand said that President Mubarak was among the personalities he received at the Elysee adding that he attached great importance to that meeting and termed the visit as a historic one.

President Mitterrand hailed Egypt's role in the Middle East area and in Africa, asserting that no serious and permanent policy could be established in the region without Egypt, due to its role and special weight. The French president expressed his admiration of Egypt's courage in seeking peace and ending the wars. He also expressed his understanding of the solidarity relations binding Egypt and the Arab countries.

President Mitterrand expressed his full understanding of the economic problems facing Egypt, expressing France's readiness to help solve such problems and develop the Egyptian economy. President Mitterrand underlined that France's policy in the Middle East is based on its respect of the right [as received], adding that his country is always willing to have good relations with all the "peoples in the region."

In this respect, President Mitterrand stressed France's respect of the rights of the Palestinians, adding that in our relations with both the Arabs and the Israelis we should speak the same language, and that our relations with a state should not affect ours with others. President Mitterrand pointed out that his forthcoming visit to Israel does not mean his approval of Israel's policy in the region. He underlined that his country's policy is based on principles, adding that he would clarify the Western countries' situation and that we would speak the same language particularly during his visit to Israel.

'Ali Views Relations

NC020752 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 0500 GMT 2 Feb 82

[Text] Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali has stated that France is open to all Egyptian demands [matalib] and that at present it is making studies to increase its imports from Egypt to achieve a balance of trade between the two countries. The balance of payment deficit between Egypt and France totals $375 million. 'Ali said that his talks with External Relations Minister Cheysson dealt with these studies and Egyptian-French relations in general.

'Ali added: We proposed establishing a joint Egyptian-French chamber of commerce and that the idea has been welcomed. In a statement to a number of Egyptian reporters in Paris, 'Ali said that France is showing great readiness to give facilities to Egypt both in economic spheres and military cooperation. He said that details of the Mirage aircraft deal are currently under discussion.

MOROCCO'S KING HASSAN DEFENDS RIGHTS RECORD

LD011400 Rabat MAP in English 1244 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 1 Feb (MAP) -- King Hassan II of Morocco who is currently visiting France granted a number of interviews following the press-conference he held here last Friday. Thus King Hassan II granted the French television network "Antenne-2" an interview inaugurating a series of meetings with Arab heads of state organized by "Antenne-2." The Moroccan sovereign answered the questions of Mr Paul Nahon who first enquired about the results of his visit to France concerning Moroccan-French relations saying, "I can tell you one thing. When recently things seemed to be deteriorating between Morocco and France, never, there has never been the slightest cloud between the Elysee and the Rabat royal palace."

A.2: Things deteriorated because of human rights problems?

H.M.: You know, human rights is a subjective affair...a climatologic affair. Montesquieu would tell you so, and besides, human rights are respected in Morocco.

A.2: Majesty, at the time, the French Socialist Party had strongly criticized and protested against the emprisonment of Mr Bouabid, leader of the USFP (Socialist Union of Popular Forces). Do you believe that conditions for his liberation are now met?

H.M.: First, we have not condemned Mr Bouabid for his opinion. He has been condemned for a speech offense which pertains to penal law.

There is a great deal of freedom of speech in Morocco, but one should not harm the nation's spirit. Secondly, I can tell you that conditions for his liberation existed right after his trial because the king can grant free-pardon right after the sentence is pronounced. So, I could have done it at that time, I could have done it yesterday as I can do it today, or tomorrow...

A.2: Will you grant him this free-pardon?

H.M.: The less you talk about it, the better.

A.2: Majesty, you often affirm that Morocco is one of the sole democratic systems in the Maghreb. Do you still affirm this despite the imprisonment of scores of Moroccan trade unionists?

H.M.: So, those who advocate violence, who undertake actions against public order, who call for strikes and riots, are necessary and indispensable elements for a democracy?

A.2: These are also trade unionists, Your Majesty....

H.M.: I am talking about them...because the problems of June 22 were brought forth by the provocation of the C.D.T. [Democratic Labor Confederation].

A.2: Do you think that they have been manipulated?

H.M.: I am convinced of this.

A.2: Majesty, do you believe that France could play a role in the Sahara affair?

H.M.: I am sure that France can play an important role, provided the parties in presence accept to have this role lead to positive results. As for us, we are ready to say yes to France for this role, at any moment...

A.2: Majesty, don't you believe this is the right time?

H.M.: Not for us, for the others.

A.2: Do you think the referendum you have proposed would take place?

H.M.: By all means. It must take place. I have been bothered for six years with this referendum, at the United Nations, at the 24 member committee, at the OAU...everywhere... the mass media, journalists, televisions, including you, now that I want to hold it, nobody seems to believe in it. You must help me, you in the first place.

A.2: Majesty, you condemned several months ago President Anwar as-Sadat's initiative, do you think that President Mubarak stands more chances to succeed?

H.M.: President Mubarak has another personality. He has a different style. I think that several Arab countries are ready to trust him for the first months and weeks in power and responsibility...besides, he seems to be during this period as the least enthusiastic backer of a rapproachement, be it personal. with Begin...it is common knowledge.

A.2: Do you think that things will change after April 25?

H.M.: Not necessarily. There should be, to my opinion, and if Arabs want to be as I wished them to be, there should be celebrations throughout the Arab nation...

MATERIAL ON VISIT BY EGYPTIAN PRESIDENT MUBARAK

30 Jan Luncheon Speech

NC301543 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 1409 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Speech by Egyptian President Mubarak at Rome luncheon given by President Pertini -- live or recorded]

[Text] Your Excellency President Pertini, dear friends: From the bottom of my heart I extend to you sincerest thanks and gratitude for the hospitable welcome again accorded to us in your country of such ancient civilizations and for the kind speech in which President Pertini expressed his and the Italian people's feelings toward Egypt and its faithful people.

As a matter of fact, our mutual concern to strengthen our bonds of friendship and cooperation between our countries and people reflects our profound faith in the depth of the historical and cultural ties between them and the great role they are playing in the interest of peace and stability in the Mediterranean region, the Middle East, Europe, and in the whole world. Both countries believe peace is the choice of the people and the path for the future; both countries believe the real challenge facing all of us is to achieve prosperity and a better future for the coming generations of our sons and to reach an ideal formula for coexistence and creative interaction among nations and peoples.

O friends, Italy has always been a link between the European and Arab civilizations and a radiant center of cultural and intellectual activity, and artistic creativity. Italy was not content with the great cultural heritage of the Roman civilization; by its historical awareness, Italy realized that this cultural heritage belongs to one single march by mankind, and that a great deal of interaction and cohesion must be achieved with the other civilizations, primarily the Arab and Islamic civilization.

Italy has been a center for trade and scientific and technological cooperation between the peoples of southern Europe and the African and Asian countries. Italy proceeded from the premise that the world's prosperity is one indivisible question, and that the fruits of industrial and agricultural progress constitutes the crowning of a sequential human (?struggle) in which other nations participated throughout the ages. Thus it is the right of all these nations to share this progress to create a better world, based on equality and justice and in which differences will vanish between the large and small countries, strong and weak, rich and poor.

Therefore it is not strange that Italy was one of the first countries to show interest in the Middle East issue and gave it high priority. Italy realizes the regional and international dimensions of the Middle East issue and understands the urgent need to reach a just and comprehensive settlement, recognizing the legitimate rights of all the area's peoples to live a stable and secure life, enabling them to direct their creative potential for construction and building. Thus Italy hastened to support Egypt's peace policy and the Camp David documents and accepted the Egyptian proposal on mutual recognition between Israel and the Palestinian people. Italy also played a basic role in issuing the Venice declaration, which maintained a precise balance between the legitimate interests of all parties. Recently Italy agreed to participate in the multinational force in contributing to strenghtening the pillars of peace.

Your Excellency, you know that we are exerting efforts to reach agreement on a declaration of principles on full autonomy for the West Bank and Gaza Strip as a first step toward opening the road before the Palestinian people for their participation in the peace efforts as a prelude to the exercise of their natural right to self-determination. Thus, a new era of stability and prosperity will come to the area, which will continue its role in strengthening exchange and contacts among continents.

Your Excellency President Pertini, brothers and friends: We believe that the existing bilateral relations between our countries in all political, economic and cultural spheres constitute an example of cohesion and links worthy of being followed up by other peoples for their common benefit. We are acting together to strengthen the stronghold of world peace. We are struggling to reduce tension, calling for solving international disputes through peaceful means and advocating a new economic order that is more equitable. Thus we have followed, with appreciation and admiration, your constructive efforts within the framework of dialogue between the North and the South. We take pride in the role you are playing in the EEC to strengthen the ties of cooperation with the peoples of the Third World.

You know that Egypt was one of the first nonaligned countries which struggled for the peoples' freedom and pride and called for the establishment of balanced international relations, free from exploitation and domination. Egypt believes in the need for dialogue and interaction among the various international blocs because the human march is one and the interests of the peoples are interwoven. None of us can ignore what happens to others or pursue a selfish and isolationist policy. Therefore we very much welcome the strengthening relations between our countries and peoples and look forward to the growing firm friendship between us, a friendship that our late leader Anwar as-Sadat was proud of because of his profound appreciation of the Italian people and their wise leadership and his realization of the special role that both countries can play in the world arena.

It gives me pleasure to extend an invitation to my brother President Pertini to visit the Arab Republic of Egypt and to experience once again the feelings of amity and friendliness that the Egyptian people harbor for your friendly country. We have come to you with open hearts and concern about strengthening the bridges of cooperation and solidarity between our countries in various domains. I am fully confident that I will leave your beautiful capital with firmer faith in the strong ties linking us on the path of righteousness, goodness and peace. Brothers, allow me to ask you to stand up to greet dear friend President Pertini and the entire audience and the glorious Italian people. Long live Egyptian-Italian friendship and the friendly Italian people. May God's peace and blessing be upon you.

Calls on Pope

NC302025 Cairo MENA in English 1930 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] Vatican City, 30 Jan (MENA) -- Pope John Paul II today received Egyptian President Husni Mubarak in a private meeting. Later, the members of the Egyptian delegation joined the meeting to be introduced to his holiness. Afterwards the two delegations held a plenary meeting under President Mubarak and Vatican Premier Cardinal Casaroli.

A Vatican guard of honour lined up at the palace court for President Mubarak on his way in and out. A number of Egyptian residents also stood in the court to greet the president.

Foreign Ministers Comment

NC301430 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 1230 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has told our radio correspondent in Italy that he is very happy at President Mubarak's visit to Italy. He said that it is certainly an important visit because it will strengthen relations, which are in fact already very strong, between Egypt and Italy. He added that he hopes that these relations will continue to be strong and have the same understanding and cooperation in the interests of the Egyptian and Italian peoples.

In answer to our correspondent's question on Italy's efforts to support the Egyptian position to establish a just and lasting peace in the Middle East, the Italian foreign minister said: We have indeed been exerting efforts since the start of the peace process.

In the meantime, Kamal Hasan 'Ali told our correspondent in Rome that President Mubarak's visit has unusual importance because it is his first visit following his assumption of power. He said the countries President Mubarak will visit are not unfamiliar to him; he visited them several times as vice president.

'Ali said the visit comes at a time when internal affairs in Egypt have completely stabilized and all constitutional institutions have accomplished their constructive role with high-level internal cooperation. He said that Mubarak's visit also comes at a time when a dialogue is beginning on important political questions, both in the area and in the world, to boost economic cooperation between Egypt and the five European countries and the United States. He further said that Egypt's efforts are aimed at pushing the wheel of progress and development in Egypt.

'Ali on Autonomy Talks

NC301802 Paris AFP in English 1746 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Rome, 30 Jan (AFP) -- Egyptian President Husni Mubarak today reiterated his country's wish for Palestinian autonomy, but an Egyptian Foreign Ministry official expressed pessimism over the practicalities of reaching an autonomy accord with Israel. Mr Mubarak, who arrived here earlier today on the first leg of a five-nation Western tour, said his country was anxious to reach "a declaration of principle concerning complete autonomy" for Palestinians in the Israeli occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip. He termed autonomy "a natural right of the Palestinian people."

But Egyptian Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs Kamal Hasan 'Ali, in concurrent talks here with Italian Foreign Affairs Minister Emilio Colombo, expressed pessimism. He was quoted by an Italian source as saying Egypt "cannot subscribe to just any accord; we must reach an accord equally acceptable to the Palestinains." At present, autonomy negotiations "are practically at a standstill," Mr 'Ali was quoted as saying.

SOARES VIEWS EANES' POSSIBLE RESIGNATION

PM291051 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 23 Jan 82 p 4

[Unattributed 19 January interview in Lisbon with Socialist Party Secretary General Mario Soares]

[Excerpts] "The institutional situation is serious," Mario Soares said with a worried expression, in response to the news of Eanes' possible resignation. He explained his anxieties as follows: "I would be much happier if we were here to discuss something other than the situation regarding the president. Now we must establish guidelines for our conversation. First, I do not believe it would be a good thing for me to tell the public any more than is said in the communique that we released yesterday."

Nevertheless, of course, the main topic of the meeting was the possibility of Ramalho Eanes' resigning. "It is so absurd that when the news was announced on Spanish radio I even thought that it was a slanderous maneuver by the Democratic Alliance," the Socialist leader said in this connection. We mentioned [PCP secretary general] Alvaro Cunhal's statement about it. Soares replied peremptorily: "Well, of course, he was the first to talk about the president's resignation."

"Are you insinuating anything?" we asked.

"No, I am not insinuating anything. What I am saying is that the situation is very serious." Leaving in mid-air a vague suspicion of a link between Eanes' stance and the PCP's stance, he went on to attack the communists: "An international campaign is at present under way. The communist party has received orders to destabilize the Iberian Peninsula."

Mario Soares explained his theory as follows: "We are on the verge of another Yalta. Both the USSR and the United States want to score points off each other and extend their bargaining power. Above all, the Soviet Union wants to divert attention from Poland."

We asked: "Why the Iberian Peninsula?" "Through a process of elimination," the Socialist Party secretary general replied. In his opinion, it is happening here because it cannot happen in any other European country, because here in Portugal there is a communist party integrated into the Warsaw Pact's policy and because any destabilization here could cause a destabilization in Spain, where the situation is already precarious.

We returned to the question of Eanes' resignation: "I am certain of one thing," Soares announced gravely, "and that is that this was all examined carefully: nothing was done hurriedly or haphazardly." He cited the following facts to support this theory: "First, the news was announced on Spanish radio by a journalist friendly with the Belem Palace. It was a test. Then the president's own spokesman confirmed it, choosing DIARIO DE LISBOA for the purpose. This all came to a head precisely on the eve of the Socialist Party's parliamentary conference and in the final stage of the proceedings of the parliamentary committee on the revision of the constitution."

We discussed the major topic of the presidency: "Eanes was elected with a specific number of constitutional powers, and it is natural for him to want to complete his term with those same powers."

Eanes Knew About Revision

"But," Soares added at once, "when he stood for the presidency he already knew that there would be a revision of the constitution.

"In any case his powers have not been diminished; on the contrary, some have been extended. Apart from this, even deputies do not resign because their powers have been amended."

The major problem, we said, concerns the top military posts. "Yes, but the agreement between the Socialist Party and General Eanes is very clear on that point," the Socialist leader hastened to point out. He asked: "Why do you think I advocated separation of the presidency from chief of the armed forces general staff? This was, moreover, a condition that considerably delayed the signing of the agreement."

Mario Soares went on to suggest the method that he considers logical: "If there were any problems with the Socialist Party, why did the president not summon the party secretary general or some of the members of its leadership, before adopting such a stance? Especially since my friend Letria has been kind enough to say that the solution of the problem depends on me. Very well then, the president should have summoned me. If he had done so I could have reminded the president of what is written in the agreement which he reached with the Socialist Party and to which we remain loyal."

Nevertheless, he did express confidence in the president: "I am confident that common sense will prevail and that General Eanes will complete his term. He will undoubtedly maintain the common sense characteristic of people from Beira."

What about the repercussions of Ramalho Eanes' stance within the Socialist Party? we asked. Mario Soares laughed and, still smiling, he replied: "The repercussions are the best possible. Any intervention would prove counterproductive, because it is now clear that the president has a personal blueprint for power. Yes, because you can be sure of one thing: Even the Socialists who supported Eanes' election and who belonged to the CNARPE [expansion unknown], even they will definitely not support a presidential party." Then, more seriously and more resolutely, he added: "I will now make a forecast. I hope that it will not be forgotten. If the presidential party does go ahead, Melo Antunes will not be in it. You can be sure of it."

If it is not demanding elections or the government's resignation, in what does the Socialist Party's offensive consist? "It consists in presenting the Socialist Party to the country as the only possible alternative, putting forward specific solutions for resolving the nation's problems," the Socialist Party leader stressed. He took the opportunity to disclose that the government has no "dossiers" on anything: "I have spoken with the prime minister and discovered that there are no finalized sectoral policies. He wants to join the EEC but has no "dossiers" on fishing, agriculture, steel or anything."

Does the Socialist Party? we asked. "The Socialist Party is preparing them," Soares replied. "This will be the innovation, to present the Portuguese voters with very specific alternatives to the government's activity in the various sectors, as the French Socialists did."

BALSEMAO COMMENTS ON EEC NEGOTIATION PROSPECTS

LD310156 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao returned home today from a trip to Belgium, Luxembourg and Denmark. The trip was aimed primarily at establishing contacts with the respective governments and, in Brussels, with the European Commission, with a view to speeding up the process of Portugal's accession to the EEC.

Speaking on arrival at Lisbon Airport the prime minister stated: [Begin recording] Portugal is not engaged in a race with Spain. Portugal takes the view that the best solution would be the simultaneous entry of the two countries into the EEC.

However, our country and the government I represent take the view that we must neither be made to pay the penalty for any difficulties arising from Spain's negotiations, nor should our entry be delayed for that reason because, as is known, Spain's candidacy is based on different premises from Portugal's.

I believe that 1981 was a year of a certain stagnation within the EEC itself. Now there is a much stronger political resolve to overcome that stagnation, both within the EEC and with regard to the negotiations with Portugal. The Belgian tenure of the EEC Council of Ministers and commission presidency has proved invaluable in this regard and I am convinced after our talks in Copenhagen that the Danish tenure will continue at the same pace and in the same direction. SOARES MEETS WITH EXILED SOLIDARITY OFFICIAL

LD311424 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1300 GMT 31 Jan 82

[Text] A delegate of the Polish Solidarity trade union, currently in exile in West Europe, has been received by members of the General Workers' Federation [UGT] Secretariat. Andrzej Wolowski, who is in Portugal to take part in several demonstrations of solidarity with the Polish people, has accepted an invitation for his organization to be present at the UGT-sponsored rally to be held in Lisbon in February. On receiving Andrzej Wolowski, the UGT reaffirmed to the Solidarity representative its support for the Polish workers. It will be recalled that on his arrival in Lisbon the Polish trade unionist had the opportunity to stress the importance of the church's role in the solution of his country's crisis.

Andrzej Wolowski, who met yesterday with Secretary General of the Portuguese Socialist Party Mario Soares, was promised the Socialist Party's total solidarity with the struggle which the Polish Solidarity trade union is waging against the military dictatorship in Poland. At the Wolowski-Soares meeting the two sides drew attention to the action carried out by the Solidarity committee abroad and exchanged biews on the latest developments in Poland. A rally in support of Solidarity's struggle, attended by Andrzej Wolowski, will be held at the Voz de Operario in Lisbon today.

CARRILLO SUMS UP AT PCE SESSION ON POLAND

[Excerpts] I believe, Santiago Carrillo said, that the debate on the draft resolution has been very rich and that it has revealed distinctions -- and important ones -- among various stances, which reflect an established situation within the party. While we all concur in our approval of the draft resolution, there are, on a number of theoretical issues and even on some purely political issues, differences of interpretation and different viewpoints which are, of course, entirely legitimate and understandable.

I believe that as we advance along the path of our party's independence -- an increasingly clear-cut and well-defined independence -- and as we advance in our critique of the Soviet model and reach the conclusion that that model is historically exhausted, this does not mean that we consider all the socialist countries included in this formula of the Soviet model. There are differences not only of model but also of historical situation, which must be taken into account. As we advance along this path of independence a certain break occurs with the culture, with important aspects of the traditional culture of the communist movement. So, yes, as we advance along the path of our independence and dissociate ourselves from the Soviet model, a break does occur. I pointed this out in my speech and it is pointed out in the draft resolution too: There is a break with a model of socialism in the ideological field. I do not believe that the resolution can be any further developed from the economic viewpoint, because its critique of the Soviet model is a critique of bureaucratic state control and is accompanied by a proposal of self-management, which in our opinion is the solution for avoiding such phenomena. In other words, the substance is there and it is from that model as a whole that we are now clearly dissociating ourselves.

October Revolution and Identifying Features

But while breaking with this model -- and not only from a pedagogic viewpoint, but also from the viewpoint of substance -- we cannot fail to invoke the October Revolution as the start of the world revolutionary process which has led and is still leading mankind to free itself from social and national oppression. We cannot deny our identifying features in this regard. There they are. And if we do deny these identifying features, comrades, the way ahead is clear: Let us all join the socialist party. If we deny our attachment to everything implied by the October Revolution, as the start of a revolutionary process, we are denying not only the place of, but the historical necessity for, the communist parties.

While it is true that we communist parties, whether in power or not, have made errors during our history, it is a fact that it was the communist parties that began this world revolutionary process. We cannot deny this merit. We cannot deny it because we are in a historical situation in which the Mitterrand effect or the Papandreou effect or what might become the Felipe Gonzalez effect here seem to be challenging the place of the communist parties.

Those of us who are no longer youngsters have witnessed other effects, including some much more serious ones, among them there was the rise of fascism in Europe, which destroyed several communist parties. Nevertheless, the communist parties reformed.

I repeat: I do not believe that we should allow ourselves to be frightened by a temporary situation, because if it proves to be more than temporary and becomes the start of a phenomenon of real transformation in developed capitalist Europe, it will require the existence and role of the communist parties so as to provide a guarantee and a spur in these processes.

On the other hand, we must not underestimate the danger of these phenomena that we are now witnessing as eventually proving merely transient and ephemeral and not helping to basically change the situation in Europe, and that also goes for the situation worldwide.

The Communist Parties' Role

I believe that the idea of a break as outlined in some of the speeches here might suggest that we are breaking away from all relations with the communist parties. I believe that we cannot break off relations with the communist parties. We did so in one instance -- the Czechoslovak Communist Party [CPCZ] -- in line with our 1968 stance. Why did we break with that party? Because we said that after the military occupation the party that emerged would not be the CPCZ but something else.

We shall see what happens in Poland. I said earlier that in my opinion no authentic communist party can emerge from the military regime. Perhaps we should take the same course of action. I will not say any more on this subject now. But in general we do not break off bilateral relations with any communist party, including the CPSU (and in practice we have ceased to regard our relations with it as special ever since 1968).

We must maintain these relations because despite all the contradictions and despite the exhaustion of that system they are parties that exist in reality, which carry weight and which we must strive to attract and to win over to new ideas. This will not be easy and we will not achieve it on our own.

But Andre Claret mentioned the influence of our stances in the socialist countries too. I do not believe that this should be included in the resolution. Either we exert this influence or we do not, but there is no need to proclaim it. However, I believe we do have it and I believe that in the countries of so-called real socialism there are a considerable number of people who regard the Eurocommunist parties' formulations sympathetically, very sympathetically, especially if these formulations are carried forward and take specific form in deeds.

But Antonio Gutierrez has spoken a major truth here -- that this policy's victory is not guaranteed and ensured, that it is necessary to fight and to struggle. And if we achieve specific results, I really believe that this policy will have a positive effect in the socialist countries and could help create -- I am not talking about our influence as a party, which would be immodest, but as the Eurocommunist movement as a whole -- could help create in those countries a pole of reference that is not counterrevolution, a pole of reference that is not a return to capitalism, a pole of reference that refers to a step forward toward a genuine developed and evolved form of socialism.

Party's Line

I believe, as Gutierrez Diaz said, that the ideas presented in this resolution are the result of several years' formulations and a development of our party's formulations over several years that we must restore and recover, because we are not in fact starting from scratch, as sometimes seems to be implied by certain criticisms leveled by the so-called renewalists. We proceed from a line and development that have their shortcomings but also their good points and which contain a whole range of fundamental elements for tackling today's problems.

I believe that in the development of our formulations, the change that is now taking place is that for the first time the Central Committee is adopting proposals made by individual party leaders that were not binding upon the party and which thus did not make these proposals official party thinking, and the Central Committee is also completing, developing and improving these proposals as far as we can at this particular moment, without either being left behind -- and I do not believe that we are being left behind at all -- or moving ahead too fast and so far ahead that we ultimately move away from our country's very masses.

BASQUE RADIO SAYS TRUCE HAS 'ACHIEVED LITTLE'

[Dispatch from San Sebastian]

[Text] ETA- ilitary yesterday broadcast a radio program on a modulated frequency which was heard in areas of Navarra and Guipuzcoa. The program included commentaries and music. According to a report today in the newspaper EGIN, ETA listed the actions carried out against the Lemoniz nuclear power station in 1981 and expressed its intention of continuing the fight against the project. The subject of the Lipperheide kidnapping was presented as the consequence of his refusal to pay the revolutionary tax. Moreover, says the newspaper, the organization considers the calls for humanitarianism to be ridiculous.

The program also referred to Euskadiko Ezkerra [Basque Left Coalition] and the Basque Nationalist Party, saying that in the opinion of ETA-military the armed truce has achieved little. As you know the truce is being upheld by the other ETA wing, the Political-Military Front.

SIBERIAN GAS NEGOTIATIONS TO BE OPENED WITH USSR

PM011337 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 27 Jan 82 p 4

[FLN. report]

[Excerpt] Madrid -- Spain has formally requested to the Soviet Union the opening of formal talks to negotiate the supply of Siberian gas to our country, in what constitutes an unprecedented move in the recent history of Spanish-Soviet trade. The conveying of the Spanish official proposal to the Soviet authorities was entrusted on the cabinet's decision to Spanish Ambassador in Moscow Santiago Perinat, who was returning to the Soviet capital yesterday following a brief vacation in Spain. Sources in the Calvo-Sotelo cabinet are confident that the proposal "will be received favorably."

SORSA LEAVES FOR MOSCOW; DUE TO MEET BREZHNEV

LD011456 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1400 GMT 1 Feb 82

FIRM CONCLUDES CONSTRUCTION DEAL WITH USSR

PM021047 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 28 Jan 82 p 15

[Excerpt] Finn-Stroi Oy's tender won the contract for the so-called 3B-phase in Svetogorsk comprising additional buildings and plant for the paper and cellulose complex. The contract was signed with the Soviet foreign trade company V/O Prommashimport in Helsinki Wednesday [27 January]. The contract is worth over 600 million markkaa and when work is at its height it will provide jobs for 800 Finns.

The new project involves buildings with a total capacity of 600,000 cubic meters. The deal also includes 400,000 cubic meters of earthworks.

According to the contract Finn-Stroi will build a total of 250,000 cubic meters of industrial and other buildings to add to the paper and cellulose complex in Svetogorsk. The largest building here will be a storage area for machinery and other equipment. Other buildings which will be erected on the site include the complex's transformer house, an evaporation unit for the cellulose factory, an instrument repair workshop, a sulfur store and a thermal power station.

In the past the Finns have only built industrial buildings in Svetogorsk. The new contract, signed yesterday, also includes 13 apartment blocks containing around 1,300 dwelling units, a kindergarten for 320 children and a hotel. The hotel will have around 200 beds, a restaurant and a cafe.

The contract also includes a water purifying plant for waste water for which the Finns will also supply machinery and plant. Work on the Svetogorsk 3B-phase will begin in February and will be carried out in parallel with the third phase, which is under construction there at present.

According to Finn-Stroi's plans, the industrial buildings will be completed in the fall of 1982, while the housing and the other buildings will not be ready until the summer of 1984.

This means that Finn-Stroi's projects in the Soviet Union now employ 3,700 people. With the number of jobs these provide in Finland, the projects provide employment for almost 10,000 people.

This means that Finn-Stroi has guaranteed full employment through the end of 1984, and the present projects will be completed during 1985.

STRAY, FRYDENLUND DEBATE FOREIGN POLICY

PM291143 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 23 Jan 82 pp 20, 21

[Per Edgar Kokkvold interview with Foreign Minister Svenn Stray and former Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund -- date and place not specified]

[Text] ARBEIDERBLADET: At the Labor Party National Executive meeting last weekend the government was criticized for keeping the Storting inadequately informed about Poland, and it was also hinted that the Willoch government has taken a new tack in foreign policy in some fields....

Stray: I think the criticism is quite unjustified. Of course it is always possible to discuss at what point it is best to brief the Storting bodies on a foreign policy question, but we took the view that it would be correct to progress a little further in the process and gain a little more clarity about what actual views were dominant among our NATO allies before we went to the Storting.

Question: And what do you say, Foreign Minister, to the allegation that the government has started pursuing a new policy?

Stray: I cannot understand that.

Question: Mr Frydenlund, do you fear that the Willoch government will deviate from the course you followed as foreign minister?

Frydenlund: In purely numerical terms we can read from the government's budget proposal -- less Third World aid, more on defense. My grievance against the Conservative Party, however, is first and foremost the agitation which the Conservatives directed against the Labor government's foreign and security policy. As far as future policy is concerned, I would say that there is a very delicate balance between what must be done in the defense field and what is possible to do for detente and disarmament. If the Willoch government keeps this balance in mind and does its utmost to do what is possible in the disarmament field too, it will have our support. But if it fails us in this, then there will be criticism.

Question: It is said that the foreign minister suffered a defeat in the government over the Turkish and Polish question. Does this not mean that the foreign minister is now in a very difficult position?

Stray: There has been no defeat. The government has been unanimous in its decision on these issues. Of course, it is a completely different matter when it comes to such a complicated and difficult issue such as possible future measures from Norway against Poland and the Soviet Union, and there have of course been discussions inside the government. Arguments for and against across the whole range of the problem have been advanced. These discussions have resulted in a government position for which there is complete support from all sides -- that is, that it will be possible for Norway to adopt only what I would call political and diplomatic measures.

Question: Several quarters have criticized the government for "vacillation" over the Turkey question. Why has the government not reacted more forcefully?

Stray: I think the government has reacted fairly forcefully, at least in comparison with the total lack of reaction from the previous government on this question. We have suspended the 50 million kroner in aid which Turkey was to begin receiving in 1981.

We have done the same for 1982. We have raised the matter at the Council of Ministers of the Council of Europe, we have informed the Turkish ambassador in Oslo of our view of events in Turkey, we have withheld the delivery of a number of used antiaircraft guns and, as far as the question of raising the matter at the Human Rights Commission in Strasbourg is concerned, we will look into the matter as soon as we have seen the results of the investigation into conditions in Turkey carried out by the Council of Europe. At present we have the impression that the majority of the investigation committee will recommend that the matter be brought before the Human Rights Commission. For this reason we have already set up a working group at the Foreign Ministry to arrange all the technical details -- so that it will be possible to implement rapidly any decision the government may make.

Question: Do you think, Mr Frydenlund, that the Willoch government's stance on the Turkish question represents a break with the reaction pattern shown by Norway to the dictatorship in Greece and Portugal?

Frydenlund: First I must comment on what Stray said about the previous government's attitude. It is quite correct that I originally decided to let the military regime in Turkey have time and an opportunity to show if it intended to live up to its own solemn promises to reintroduce democracy in the country. We followed this course partly on the advice of Bulent Ecevit. But I have to say that the situation changed for us when, for example, Ecevit himself was arrested and a large number of trade union leaders were put on trial and were facing the death penalty. Then it was clear that we must react.

To answer the question: It is my opinion that it was wrong of Stray not to raise the question of Turkey at the last NATO Council of Ministers meeting in Brussels. I think that Norway should have done so. Norway has consistently done so in the past on similar issues. It would probably also have been easier to do so this time, since the matter was also raised by others.

Stray: One should not of course exclude the possibility of raising such matters in the context of NATO -- I myself raised the question of Greece in the past -- but at the 11 January NATO meeting no one raised the question of Turkey, unless we say that it was raised by the Turks themselves. The Turkish foreign minister reproached a number of NATO nations (he did not mention which, but it was obvious that Norway was one of those he meant) which, he claimed, had reacted more strongly to Turkey than to Poland. But otherwise none of the foreign ministers mentioned Turkey by name. However, I did have reason to stress that when we strongly condemn the violations of human rights in Poland -- there was every reason to do this -- each member nation must carefully consider whether it respects human rights in its own actions. If it did not show this respect, then it would be employing double standards, and we would have to dissociate ourselves from it.

Frydenlund: One would find oneself in a strange, unpleasant situation during the NATO meeting in deciding together with Turkey, which itself violates human rights, to condemn violations in Poland -- but this does not mean that I place Poland and Turkey on the same footing. Poland is a world affair.

Stray: There are also other important differences between the situations in the two countries apart from the world perspective. There is much to indicate that the military takeover in Turkey had the support of the overwhelming majority of the Turkish population, for example. The reports which have come in to the Foreign Ministry are unanimous on that point. This is not the case with Poland. But I would hasten to add that even if a dictatorship comes about with the support of the majority, this does not justify it. The most important objection to what is happening in Turkey now is that the return to democracy is beginning to take an unacceptably long time, but the worst thing is that there has been a trend toward less freedom of opinion and greater use of force. This cannot be defended, even if the regime does have the sympathy of the population because it has created calm and order and put an end to political terrorism.

Frydenlund: What Stray says about recent trends shows that the West must react more bluntly. And here Norway has a special tradition of taking the lead in such matters.

Stray: Yes, and this is what we are doing. Our reaction is much tougher than the previous government's.

Frydenlund: But the situation has changed.

Stray: Yes, and that is why we are reacting.

Question: Mr Frydenlund, you have said that "it is not in our interest" to abandon the detente policy because of what has happened in Poland....

Frydenlund: Despite the statements from many quarters that it is the Soviet Union which benefits from the policy of detente, all my thinking leads me to the conclusion that there are also clear advantages for the West. Detente and the greater traffic between East and West in Europe has led to relaxations in East Europe. And in connection with the situation in Poland it is in the West's interest to choose forms of reaction which at least seek to preserve as much as possible of the foundations of continued detente.

Question: Nevertheless, many people want to ask why West European social democrats are so darned cautious in their reaction to Poland. In many ways Solidarity is a social democratic movement, but today it is receiving its strongest support from rightwing sources, who for the first time in their lives are applauding striking, militant workers, and the extreme left, who want to introduce here what people there are trying to free themselves from.

Frydenlund: It is support for Solidarity which lies behind our total policy, but there are forces here who want to use the situation to revive the Cold War, and this is the worst thing that could happen both to Polish workers and to Solidarity. If detente can be saved, the situation is bound to improve for the Polish people. If anything could lead to long-term oppression, it would be a new Cold War.

Question: Poland experts seem to be very pessimistic about Poland's future. Are you gentlemen as pessimistic? What about the development of the oppressive Polish regime? And is there still the possibility of a Soviet invasion?

Frydenlund: Let me answer the last question. The moment a Soviet military intervention took place the situation would immediately change, but the cost to the Soviet Union would be too great, and that is probably why there has been no invasion. There would be armed resistance, there would probably be a bloodbath, and there would be incredibly strong reaction from the West. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union could probably carry off an invasion, but it could not use force to keep the people down forever: It could not keep Poland a vast concentration camp forever.

Stray: I do not expect a Soviet invasion in Poland either. On the other hand I am very pessimistic about the development of the oppressive Polish regime, which is now tightening its grip in almost all areas. That is why no further moves by the Soviet Union are necessary. Poles are doing the job for them!

Question: Are you in agreement with your predecessor, Mr Foreign Minister, when he says that "we must support the line taken by the West German Social Democrats" over the Polish question?

Stray: If I were to say something similar it would be that in general we should follow the same line as the West German Government, not just the Social Democrats, since as far as practical steps are concerned the West German Government has largely expressed views which coincide with our own.

Frydenlund: The reason why I felt a need to express myself as I did was partly because Helmut Schmidt has been subjected to the most incredible attacks from Western sources -- caricatures of Schmidt with a stranglehold on the Polish people, or polishing Brezhnev's shoes while Brezhnev has one foot on Poland.

We have seen some small signs of this tendency in Norway, too. It is correct that the Germans have national interests to look after in this connection, but the Germans' national interests coincide with the desire to make Europe a more peaceful place. Therefore it is in our interest too.

Stray: It is really in everyone's interest. I would also like to say that much of the criticism to which Helmut Schmidt has been subjected in the last few weeks is completely unreasonable.

Question: There is much talk at present of "problems within the Western alliance." How great are these problems? Primarily between the United States and West Europe....

Frydenlund: The long-term tendencies are undoubtedly there. We are seeing a trend which means that the United States will be less concerned with West Europe than in the past, and we are seeing forces in Europe which are less concerned with using the United States as a model for European social development. But the coincidence of interests is still so great that there will be no dramatic developments in this respect. I mean: What would West Europe be in the East-West context without the United States? Very little. Very exposed. And what would the United States be as a world power without West Europe? The coincidence of interests will be powerful, but there will be more friction, more conflicts within the alliance. On many questions West Europe will take a different view of the situation from the United States. Thus the concrete results of detente mean more to someone living in Cologne or Paris than to someone living in Texas.

Stray: I think that people are tending to dramatize the difference of opinion there can be between the United States and West Europe. In most cases there is no disagreement about objectives or about the fundamental components in assessments. There can be a certain amount of disagreement about the means to be employed. However, it should not be seen as "abnormal" for certain differences of opinion to emerge sometimes and for interests not to coincide completely.

Frydenlund: It is clear that the press and the media and the diplomats -- at least some of them -- dramatize the disagreements. Nevertheless, there is every reason to note Afghanistan and Poland, for example, which really are the Soviet Union's headaches, but which also lead to damaging conflicts between the Western nations, and this really is a paradox.

LACK OF DATE FOR START TALKS 'WORRYING'

PM011127 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 27 Jan 82 p 8

[Text] "The reports from Geneva that Haig and Gromyko did not arrive at an opening date for the new START negotiations are worrying," Foreign Minister Under Secretary Eivinn Berg said. Berg stressed that it would be regrettable if the Polish crisis and the deterioration in the climate between East and West were to mean that these important negotiations would not start. "However, we have noted that preparations are in progress," Berg said. "We in Norway see a connection between the START negotiations and the negotiations already underway in Geneva on the nuclear arms threatening Europe. We are pleased that the Geneva talks will continue," Under Secretary Berg said. Berg stressed that the government considers the continuation of the work for negotiations on disarmament and arms control a major objective, even in the present situation.

COMMUNIST PARTY ELECTS KLEVEN NEW CHAIRMAN

PM021005 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 25 Jan 82 p 5

[Text] The Norweigian Communist Party [NKP] National Executive elected Hans I. Kleven the new party chairman Sunday [24 January]. He succeeds Martin Gunnar Knutsen, who had declined reelection. Kleven was elected by 18 votes to 17. The minority voted for FRIHETEN Editor Arne Jorgensen.

Jorgensen was unanimously elected deputy chairman and he will also continue as editor of the party newspaper. The election of the second deputy chairman, Trygve Horgen from Hordaland, was also unanimous. He is new to the party leadership and is deputy chairman of the Bergen branch of the Iron and Metal Workers Union.

Martin Gunnar Knutsen said that he had declined reelection because it is difficult to combine the job of party chairman with his post as headmaster of a children's school. "I am 63 and I cannot in the long run live under the constant pressure of two demanding jobs. The party would be best served if it elected a chairman who could devote himself to party work full time," Knutsen said. He was unanimously elected to the NKP Central Committee. Hans I. Kleven, who is 55, has been a member of the NKP since 1945 and deputy chairman since 1975. He is a lawyer and works at present as chief advisory officer at the Church and Education Ministry. The intention is that he will seek leave from this post to work full time as salaried party chairman.

After his election Kleven said that it is necessary for the NKP to unite its forces and get the party moving forward again. He took the view that the resolutions made at the party's national congress in December last year and the elections at the National Executive meeting mean that the NKP is entering a period of consolidation and cooperation. Both Knutsen and Kleven stressed that there are no political differences between them or between Kleven and Jorgensen. It was said that the party does not have two political wings.

GOVERNMENT 'CALM' IN FACE OF SOVIET CHARGES

LD021040 Stockholm International Service in Swedish 1000 GMT 2 Feb 82

[Text] The government and Foreign Ministry adopt a calm attitude to the latest Soviet accusations that Swedish neutrality is being endangered through extended military-industrial contacts between the United States and Sweden. Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Leif Leifland said Soviet accusations took on a sharper tone after the submarine incident and the strong Swedish criticism of the military takeover in Poland. The Foreign Ministry, however, takes a relaxed view of these accusations, Leifland pointed out to SVENSKA DAGBLADET.

ADELSOHN TO VISIT NORWAY, MEET WITH WILLOCH

[Text] Swedish Moderate Coalition Party Chairman Ulf Adelsohn will visit Norway 17 and 18 March at the invitation of the Conservative Party. Adelsohn will meet Prime Minister Kaare Willoch and other government members, leading members of the Conservative Party and representatives of the Conservative Storting group, General Secretary Fridtjov Clemet told HOYRES PRESSEBYRAA. Ulf Adelsohn succeeded Goesta Bohman as chairman of the Moderate Coalition Party last fall, and this will be his first visit to Norway since his election.

BRIEFS

AID TO POLAND -- Total aid to Poland during the period after the declaration of the martial law amounts to over 100 million kronor. This figure is based on information collected from various aid organizations. The great fundraising campaign at the beginning of January brought in cash and goods of a total value 50 million kronor. RAF TO SEEK U.S. SUPPORT IN ISLANDS' AIR DEFENSE

PM281231 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 28 Jan 82 pp 1, 32

[Article by Air Commodore G.S. Cooper]

[Excerpts] The RAF faces such a shortage of fighter aircraft that the United States is to be asked to support the air defence of Britain. According to NATO sources the RAF is expected to have about 100 fewer front-line aircraft at the end of this year than planners intended. This is a drop of about a sixth in front-line strength understood to be about 600. The lack of combat aircraft is not expected to be fully made up until 1990.

In an interview with the Geneva-based INTERNATIONAL DEFENCE REVIEW, Mr Nott, defence secretary, agreed that a "window of vulnerability" is likely to open over the next five years. The Soviet Union might be tempted to make aggressive use of its military strength to divert attention from its political and economic failures in Eastern Europe. Russia has maintained the momentum of its defence industries when the West had not done so, Mr Nott said. But he emphasised that he did not see any immediate aggressive intentions on the part of the Soviet Union in Western Europe, because "Western Europe at the moment is strong enough to deter."

Asked about the shortage of fighters and air defence weapons, Mr Nott said: "Certainly we would seek the support of the American Air Force and this island would be very rapidly reinforced by a major air defence capability." Britain's dependence on the United States for air defence support has never been so strongly expressed in public. The statement will surprise the Americans whose own air defences have recently been recognised as inadequate against the threat of long-range attacks by the Soviet Union's Backfire bombers.

NAVY TO CUT NUCLEAR SUBMARINES FOR TRIDENT

[Desmond Wettern report]

[Excerpts] Expansion of the navy's force of nuclear-powered hunter-killer submarines, the principal weapon to counter the Russians, is to be cut to provide resources for the Trident missile programme. The Cabinet is expected to decide this month whether to order the advanced 6,000-mile range Trident D-5 missile from America for British submarines.

The hunter-killer submarines, described as "our most powerful vessels for maritime war" by Mr Nott, defence secretary, are a key element in the government's defence policy. Expansion of the force has been much publicised to calm NATO fears about cuts in the surface fleet. Twelve built between 1963 and 1981, are already in service but the two oldest, the 4,000-ton Dreadnought and the 4,500-ton Valiant, are to be scrapped before the end of the decade and it was intended to build seven of the new Trafalgar class to make up the total of 17. But now the Trafalgar class, of which four each costing 175 million pounds, are already under construction, will number five with the last to be ordered later this year.

In addition the ordering of major components needed for the submarine is being deliberately slowed, according to the engineers in order to ease the Defence Ministry's burden of over-spending. Only one ship yard in Britain, Vickers at Barrow-in-Furness, is able to build nuclear submarines and the government has rejected plans to re-open Cammel Laird's submarine building plant at Birkenhead which was moth-balled 11 years ago, after completing its third submarine. Each hunter-killer submarine takes five years to build and in the past two years, for economic reasons, only one has been ordered.

AKEL SEES U.S. BACKING OF TURKISH OCCUPATION

NC011200 Nicosia DHIMOKRATIA in Greek 1 Feb 82 pp 1, 8

[Speech by AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou to party cadres in Limassol 31 January]

[Excerpts] Some people attribute the lack of substantive progress in the intercommunal talks to the intransigence of Denktas and Ankara, which supports him. Of course this is correct, but it is not the whole truth because neither Denktas nor Ankara by themselves can reject the resolutions and decisions on the Cyprus problem or interpret the summit agreements in the way they like unless they are supported fanatically by the U.S. imperialists and the most reactionary NATO circles. Turkey, which is NATO's pampered child, would not dare invade Cyprus without the encouragement and support of the imperialists and especially the U.S. imperialists.

How then can the U.S. imperialists or NATO pressure Turkey to show understanding of the Cyprus problem when they are the ones who encouraged it to invade Cyprus and who still support the occupation by the Turkish troops of 40 percent of Cyprus territory? How can the archconspirators and underminers of Cyprus' independence, who are none other than the imperialists, pressure Turkey? It is at least naive and a delusion for one to believe that the people who inspired, organized and financed both the treacherous junta-fascist coup and the Attila invasion will now exert pressure on Turkey to respect the UN resolutions and the summit agreements.

The U.S. imperialists and their servants in NATO want the recognition of the faits accomplis of the invasion and occupation. They also want Attila to occupy all of Cyprus, because to them Cyprus is not inhabited by a people who want to live free, nonaligned, without foreign troops and foreign bases but is a strategic bridgehead and base for their missiles and nuclear weapons. For the imperialists Cyprus is only an unsinkable aircraft carrier in the eastern Mediterranean. Talk about human rights and freedoms, often cited by the U.S. imperialists in slandering the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, is nothing but a smokescreen behind which they seek to conceal their crimes in various countries. It is only a deception intended to misguide the U.S. people so they can justify their huge plans for rearmament.

It is difficult, if not impossible, for one to imagine a greater hypocrisy and a greater deception than the position of Reagan and the U.S. Pentagon circles toward Poland and the Soviet Union. U.S. imperialists and their supporters all over the world are shedding crocodile tears over the situation in the Polish People's Republic, a situation they created through their shameful intervention in that country's internal affairs, by financing counterrevolutionary elements and creating conditions of anarchy and chaos which they sought to exploit to overthrow socialism and establish a fascist regime of the type established by Pinochet in Chile.

Comrades, some people talk about the responsibility of the superpowers in the Cyprus problem and place the Soviet Union on the same footing with the United States. However, they distort reality and essentially abuse the Soviet Union, because it is not the Soviet Union which is encouraging Turkey in its intransigence but U.S. imperialism and the most reactionary NATO circles. From the very first day the Soviet Union supported Cyprus consistently. Furthermore let us not forget that since August 1974 the Soviet Union has proposed an international conference be within the UN framework on the Cyprus problem, and that Cyprus only in recent years officially raised the issue of an international conference. The Cypriot people have no stronger, more consistent ally than the great socialist country, the Soviet Union, in the struggle for an independent, sovereign, territorially integral, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyprus.

After we exhaust all possibilities for progress in the new round of the intercommunal talks without result, we shall be obliged to resort to the UN General Assembly or the Security Council to ask that measures be taken for the successful outcome of the intercommunal talks and tackling the international aspect of the Cyprus problem. We should ask that a committee composed of nonaligned countries be appointed to help in implementation of the UN resolutions on Cyprus and that an international conference be convened within the UN framework to deal with the international aspects of the Cyprus problem.

With friendly countries we should discuss possibilities for taking additional measures, always aiming at solving the internal aspect through the intercommunal talks on the basis of the UN resolutions and the summit agreements and at solving the external aspect through an international conference within the UN framework.

Yes to internationalization of the Cyprus problem at the highest possible level. Yes to defensive shielding, but no to adventurism of any form. These are AKEL's crystal-clear line and tactics for the solution of the Cyprus problem.

Comrades, for some time now AKEL has been discussing with other patriotic democratic forces the important issue of democratic cooperation. AKEL is principally interested in implementation of the minimum program which will be agreed upon, because the best program in the world is worthless unless it is alive and active. Our party is principally interested in serving the people's interests and cause. All the parties talk about change, but we understand change to be deeds, not just words. Change will be implemented only when the program agreed upon by the cooperating parties is put into action. For this reason the government, which will undertake to implement the program, should at least have the trust of the cooperating parties. In addition, the state machinery, which currently is pervaded by coupists, saboteurs and opportunists, must be purged to make it capable of implementing the program to serve the people and their cause.

Local reactionary forces and the imperialists have moved to foil patriotic, democratic cooperation. The provocation and the anomaly of the Democratic Rally deputies are not unconnected with this or with the effort to postpone the issue of the Cyprus dossier, which will burn them. The ambassador of a Western country has begun a scandalous intervention in Cyprus' internal affairs by approaching political circles in this connection. The reactionary press has literally become enraged and has lost its senses. This alone shows the correctness of the course for patriotic and democratic cooperation. The people regard the cooperation of the patriotic, democratic forces on the basis of a minimum program and a government trusted by such forces, as well as the purge of the state machinery, as indispensable prerequisites for the successful outcome of the Cyprus problem and the protection of the people's vital interests.

NEW COMMERCIAL AGREEMENT WITH LIBYA INITIALED

NC301907 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 30 Jan 82

[Text] An official statement on the visit of Commerce and Industry Minister Kittis to Libya says the talks the minister had are expected to contribute toward a further expansion of Cyprus-Libyan commercial relations. The text of a bipartite commercial agreement was initialled during the visit. The agreement will be signed during the visit by the Libyan minister of the economy to Cyprus.

Members of the Cyprus commercial delegation also had contacts with Libyan state organizations. The delegation discussed questions relating to the export of Cyprus products.

On his return to Cyprus, Kittis stopped over in Athens, where he concluded his contacts with members of the Greek Government. Kittis conferred with Coordination Minister Lazaris, with whom he discussed the question of Greek ships docking in Cyprus on their way to the Arab states to take on Cyprus products.

INTERLOCUTORS CONTINUE INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS 1 FEB

[Text] A new meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel today. A UN communique on the meeting says the talks were continued on the basis of the agreed agenda. The communique adds that a discussion also began on fundamental rights and freedoms. The next meeting will be on 8 February.

Prior to the meeting the representatives of the two sides at the talks, Ioannidhis and Onan, attended a luncheon given by the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, Gobbi, in honor of UN Under Secretary General for Special Political Affairs Urquhart, who is currently in Cyprus. In a statement prior to the meeting, the Greek Cypriot side's representative at the talks, Ioannidhis, said all four questions on the agenda were to be discussed and that a discussion of the constitutional aspect of the Cyprus problem was to be continued in an effort to make some progress and to determine the points of coincidence. Asked whether he shares the view of Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Onan that there are more points of coincidence than those noted in the Waldheim evaluation, Ioannidhis said: There are more points on which we are trying to agree than are noted in the evaluation.

Gobbi said all questions concerning the intercommunal talks would be discussed in the near future. He added: At the present time we are discussing some elements of the constitutional aspect of the Cyprus problem in accordance with the evaluation and proposals by the two sides. We do not contemplate using the talks solely for discussing the constitutional aspect.

Onan said that during today's meeting the discussion on the points of coincidence on the constitutional aspect was to be continued. He added: It is also likely that the chapter on human rights in the constitution will be discussed. Onan also said that there are sufficient points of coincidence. However, he said that on some aspects of these points there might not be full agreement. He added: We are trying to diminish any divergence of views that might exist on some points.

New Phase of Discussion

[Excerpts] The intercommunal negotiators have now moved to a new phase of discussion in the search for points of agreement in the "evaluation document" of the former UN secretary general Dr Waldheim, which the two sides agreed to consider as a "method" of negotiation in conjunction with the agenda previously accepted. However, the two sides were far from agreed about the first phase and had different assessments about the progress made so far on the first phase of "general provisions."

When the Turkish Cypriot negotiator Mr Onan was asked if progress has been made in the previous meetings he said: "The fact that we are continuing the talks and trying to find out the points of coincidence is in my view some sort of progress." However, Mr Ioannidhis was even less positive. In answer to the same question, he replied: "I cannot say so." But both of them said that they were trying to reduce the differences. When Mr Gobbi was asked when it was expected to finish with the constitutional aspects and start on the other items he said this was "the one million dollar question."

Mr Urquhart who had arrived on the island on Saturday evening had separate meetings with President Kiprianou Foreign Minister Mr Rolandhis and the Turkish Cypriot leader Mr Denktas in the presence of the Turkish Cypriot Foreign Affairs spokesman Mr Ata'ol. Mr Urquhart has completed his visit to Cyprus and is leaving today for New York via Beirut and Damascus.

CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY ADOPTS 1982 BUDGET BILL

[Text] The Consultative Assembly has adopted this 1982 budget bill 145 votes to 2. One assembly member abstained in the open roll call voting, in which 148 members participated. Consultative Assembly Speaker Sadi Irmak and Deputy Speaker Fenni Islimyeli, who chaired today's session, did not participate in the voting in accordance with the assembly rules.

Ten members did not participate in the voting. Ertugrul Alatli, appointed by the National Security Council and Vehbi Munis Tabakoglu of Diyarbakir voted against the bill and Himayet Ugur, also appointed by the National Security Council abstained. The following members did not participate in the voting: Hikmet Altug, Nedim Eray, Feyyaz Golouklu, Abdullah Pulat Gozubuyk and Ender Ciner, who were appointed by the National Security Council, Sener Akyol from Samsun, Feridun Ergin and Siyami Ersek from Istanbul, Ture Tuncbay from Izmir and Halit Zarbun from Gumushane.

Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, who took the rostrum after the results of the vote were announced, thanked the Consultative Assembly for adopting the budget. He hoped that the budget will be auspicious for the state and the nation. The assembly went into recess until 8 February. The budget bill will be discussed at the National Security Council in February. The budget will go into effect on 1 March.

ECEVIT RESUMES CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

TA011548 London BBC World Service in English 1500 GMT 1 Feb 82

[From "Radio Newsreel"]

[Excerpts] The former prime minister of Turkey, Mr Bulent Ecevit, has been released from prison in Ankara after serving 2 months of a sentence imposed by a martial law court. However, outside his home in an Ankara suburb Mr Ecevit immediately renewed his challenge to the 16-month-old military regime in language stronger than that for which he was originally jailed.

In what seems to be a reference to recent criticism of Turkey at the Council of Europe, he said that the country's real friends were those who wanted the same sort of democracy for Turkey as they had at home. There can be no double standards in democracy, he said. He suggested that the type of parliamentary democracy Turkey would have in the future was more important than the timetable for elections announced by the military in December. So long as the limitations of my freedom of expression continue, said Mr Ecevit, I feel as if I am in prison wherever I am.

His remarks will have caused fury in government circles here. But there have been hints in the last few days that the military are planning to drop the controversial ban on political statements. So it may be that they will now feel able to turn a blind eye to Mr Ecevit's remarks and thus spare themselves the international embarassment of another prosecution.

21 LEFTIST MILITANTS ARRESTED IN ISTANBUL

[Summary] Security forces in Istanbul arrested 21 members of the illegal Turkish People's Liberation Party Front-Revolutionary Left organization. The suspects were wanted on various charges of murder, armed assault, shootouts with security forces, firing shots at buildings, armed robbery and other martial law violations.

TA292050 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] The military prosecutor's office of the 1st Army and Martial Law Command has filed suit against 113 militants of the Marxist-Leninist Armed Propaganda Union with a supplementary indictment. The indictment states that the suspects murdered 20 persons -- 3 of whom were gendarmes and 1 a policeman -- and were responsible for numerous incidents of armed robbery, wounding, bombing, shooting and putting up posters. On the grounds of these crimes, death penalties are demanded for 41 suspects and prison terms ranging from 1 to 30 years for the remaining 72.

HIGHWAY TRANSPORTATION PACT SIGNED WITH HUNGARY

TA011020 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Transit fees for Turkish International Highway Transport [TIR] vehicles through Hungary will be reduced as of today. According to the protocol signed at the end of the joint Turkish-Hungarian highway transportation committee meetings, Hungary will reduce transit fees for Turkish TIR vehicles by 40 percent for empty vehicles and 10 percent for loaded vehicles. The fees charged by the two countries are thus equalized.

U.S. PROVOKING TENSION BETWEEN TURKEY, GREECE

TA020916 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 2 Feb 82

[Text] The Pentagon is discussing the junta's request for armaments. If the request by the coupist generals in Ankara is granted, it will be the biggest ever military agreement between the two countries. Never in history have the Pentagon warmongers extended military aid to any country without motives. The price of the current bargaining will be very high. You may ask why. Let us have a look:

The burden of the arms purchase from the United States on our economy -- which is struggling through crises -- will increase unemployment and prices. The bread on the tables of the workers will shrink. This is only one aspect of the problem. The other is this. Against whom will these arms be used? These arms will be pressed against the chests of the progressive and patriotic forces fighting for democratic rights and freedoms and of Kurdish democrats. The junta generals, who talk about restoring democracy by executing the 52, are involved in preparations for keeping the oppressive authoritarian regime alive with U.S. weapons.

But this is not the whole of the problem. The grand calculations of the U.S. warmongers lie behind this arms bargaining. The Pentagon has put forward the issue of the 300 fighter aircraft at a time when the tension between Turkey and Greece has reached dangerous dimensions. On the other hand, the Greek Government's stand toward NATO, EEC policy and the U.S. bases is quite clear. Greece has taken various positive steps conducive to detente and realistic from the viewpoint of national interests. It has even opposed the Reagan Administration's policy of interfering in the domestic affairs of Poland. These developments have frightened the Pentagon and NATO ringleaders. Washington plans to use Turkey as a tool of pressure with the aim of affecting these positive developments in Greece and further attaching this country to the antipeace and antidetente policy of imperialism. This is the major goal behind the arms negotiations in the Pentagon and the rumors concerning the 300 fighter aircraft.

It is clear that the Pentagon is preparing to use Turkey as a tool. It is provoking enmity between Turkey and Greece and increasing tension in the Aegean by arming Turkey against neighboring Greece. It is endangering our national security and regional peace. National security and regional peace can be achieved not by becoming a tool of the U.S. adventurist plans but through strengthening neighborly ties and cooperation with our neighbors. The unity of action of all anti-imperialist, antifascist and democratic forces is important and necessary to foil the dirty U.S. plans concerning Turkey and to thwart U.S. pressure.

PAPANDREOU ADDRESSES PASOK PARTY CADRES 31 JAN

NC311344 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 31 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Prime Minister and PASOK Chairman Papandreou today addressed a gathering of about 4,000 PASOK cadres at the stadium. During his 1-hour address, Papandreou referred to the fulfillment of the government's tasks during the first 100 days, to organizational matters of the movement and to developments within both the government and the party. Papandreou emphasized foreign policy and said this is the first time the independent voice of Greece has been heard on the international stage. The refusals we have expressed, he said, now have supporters. He referred specifically to the latest statements by the political leaders of West Germany and France on the Polish issue. After emphasizing the difficulties facing the government, Papandreou expressed optimism about the future, stating that the PASOK government cannot fail. He added the Central Committee will meet soon to prepare the party congress, which will be held in 1983.

GOVERNMENT HAILS MALTA'S NEUTRALITY STATEMENT

NC011311 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The Greek Government hails with satisfaction Malta's statement on adoption of a status of neutrality. A Foreign Ministry statement in this connection says the following: The Greek Government stresses the importance of this statement, which constitutes a factor of stability and contributes to the progress and peace of the peoples of the Mediterranean. The Government of the Hellenic Republic gives, in accordance with the UN Charter, full support to the independence of the Republic of Malta and to its status of neutrality, which is based on the status of the nonaligned, and undertakes to respect this neutrality.

FOREIGN MINISTER AFFIRMS POLAND-CSCE LINKAGE

[Excerpt] The Hague, 27 Jan -- The Netherlands will not support the Soviet Union's proposal for a European disarmament conference and would be even less likely to agree to a final communique from the Madrid followup conference as long as the situation in Poland has not returned to normal. Foreign Minister Van der Stoel will denounce in detail the violations of the principles of the Helsinki Final Act in a speech to the conference in the Spanish capital 12 February.

At the Foreign Ministry, where an assessment of recent events in Poland has just been completed, there are no doubts that the credibility of detente in Europe has been seriously affected by the Polish crisis. For this reason the Netherlands is unwilling to enter into any agreements in Madrid, including an agreement on a disarmament conference, "until the Polish Government is once again able to operate independently," a Foreign Ministry expert said.

U.S. SHOW ON POLAND -- The U.S. television show on Poland will not be transmitted directly by Dutch television on Sunday. It is possible that the Netherlands Christian Broadcasting Association [NCRV] will broadcast pictures of the show in an extra edition of its "Here and Now" current affairs program. An arbitration committee decided in Hilversum yesterday that the first television company to be offered the chance to broadcast the show should be NCRV, since the company has its normal transmission times on Sunday evening. However, NCRV is hesitant to transmit directly a political propaganda program whose contents are not known in advance. [Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 27 Jan 82 p 1 PM]

PAPANDREOU 'EXCEPTIONALLY SATISFIED' WITH TALKS

[Excerpts] The first round of talks between Prime Minister Papandreou with FRG leaders was completed this afternoon. Our correspondent in Bonn, Aris Xipolitidhis, reports:

[Begin recording] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou stated this evening that he is exceptionally satisfied with his talks with Chancellor Schmidt and the understanding the FRG leader manifested on Greek-Turkish differences. In a talk 2 hours ago with Greek journalists, the prime minister said that he had discussed with Chancellor Schmidt a very broad spectrum of issues such as the Polish issue, the method of handling the issue -- on which an increasing number of European countries now agree -- arms limitation in Europe, the Cyprus problem, Greek-Turkish differences, Greece's position in the EEC and economic cooperation between Greece and the FRG. Papandreou stressed that the chancellor demonstrated goodwill, absolutely did not show any intention to give advice, and that the talks in Germany had significantly promoted Greece's cause in all fields.

Earlier, at 1530 Greek time, Papandreou and Schmidt spoke to Greek and German journalists immediately after thier talks. Chancellor Schmidt spoke first, saying: First, I want to express my great joy over Prime Minister Papandreou's visit. There are no problems between our countries. Our relations with the previous government under Karamanlis and Rallis have always been friendly. We believe that they will remain equally friendly with the present Papandreou administration and that we will develop them even more.

During our talks we also spoke about the Polish issue and the military aid extended to Greece and Turkey. We talked further about relations between Greece and Turkey both of which are allies and friends of the Federal Republic and, we offered our help, if needed, to smooth out differences between them.

In reply to a question by a Greek journalist, Schmidt said that German military aid to Turkey is being given because of its needs as a NATO member and that in any case the FRG does not even think of changing the balance of forces in the Aegean.

After thanking Chancellor Schmidt for the warm reception, Prime Minister Papandreou said to the newsmen: The meeting with Chancellor Schmidt and the political leadership of the FRG afforded us an opportunity to exchange views on a number of very serious issues, some of which are connected with our Greek problems while others inevitably refer to the European and international political and economic areas. As you know very well neither Chancellor Schmidt nor I are diplomats. This means that when we talk together we talk openly, directly, and we try to get to the substance of issues as soon and as fully as we can.

It is obvious that I seized this opportunity to put forth to the chancellor problems which I consider special Greek problems and which preoccupy the Greek Government. As you know, one of these problems is our position in the EEC, whose 10th member we became recently. I beleive that many of the reporters here know the position of PASOK -- the party I lead -- which is, rather than having complete participation in the EEC, we aim for a special relationship. We seek this because the Rome treaty provides for a customs union, free movement of capital and workers within the community, and because EEC provisions cannot benefit a country that is economically less developed, has a lower per capita income, and also lags behind in the industrial and agricultural sectors in comparison to others in the EEC.

I also put forth the entire spectrum of the Cyprus problem to Chancellor Schmidt. I referred to the two stages of the Cyrpus invasion, Attila I and Attila II in 1974 and to the continuing occupation by Turkish troops of 36.3 percent of Cyprus territory. For some time now, intercommunal talks have taken place. Recently they have been conducted on the basis of former UN Secretary General Waldheim's ideas. I would not be telling you the truth if I were to deny that these negotiations will be as fruitless as those in the past. The basic reason is that the two interested parties are not Cyprus President Kiprianou and Denktas, but are in fact Nicosia and Ankara. However, Ankara continues to maintain a military presence in Cyprus which casts a shadow on all possible talks and developments. Perhaps this is the first time that I have put forth the problem in this way and in fact it concerns two problems. First, it is an international problem which belongs under the jurisdiction and supervision of the United Nations and which should be viewed in conjunction with the occupation of northern Cyprus by Turkish troops. I said to the chancellor that we are ready to withdraw all forms of the Greek military presence in Cyprus but that, at the same time, we expect the Turks to withdraw all their military forces from the island. Only then will it be possible -- with the presence of a peace force which the United Nations will decide to send -- for the two communities to come to the negotiating table to solve their internal problems, such as the determination of borders, percentage of participation in government, all of which constitutes the second problem. All these are internal problems which can and should be solved by the two communities under the supervision of the United Nations, without Greece's and Turkey's involvement being necessary.

Inevitably I touched upon one of the issues I put forth to the chancellor -- the problem of our country's national security. It concerns a special problem, a unique case. We have been confronting an obvious threat from the east ever since the Turkish leadership -- during Demirel's or Ecevit's tenure or other leaders' tenure -- made it clear to us that it is not ready to accept the status quo in the Aegean. This status quo is based on a number of treaties and conventions like the Lausanne treaty, the Paris convention, and the Geneva convention of 1958. I wanted to make it clear to you that Greece has no interest in making any demands on Turkey's sovereign rights. At the same time, however, Greece is not ready to accept any demand of Turkey at the expense of its national area. [end recording]

POLISH AIRCRAFT DENIED LANDING PERMISSION

LD011856 Hamburg DPA in German 1831 GMT 1 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 1 Feb (DPA) -- In keeping with the action of other countries the Federal Government, too, has denied the Polish state airlines LOT landing permission at federal German airports. A spokesman of the Federal Transport Ministry said on Monday in reply to an inquiry that this step has been taken on the basis of reciprocity as long as Lufthansa is not allowed to land at Polish airports. Switzerland, Austria, France, Britain and the Netherlands have also withdrawn landing permission from LOT aircraft until further notice.

COMMITTEE FOR SOLIDARITY WITH POLES FOUNDED

LD021248 Hamburg DPA in German 1143 GMT 2 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 2 Feb (DPA) -- The CDU social committees, the Ring of Christian Democratic Students and the International Federation for Human Rights have participated in the establishment of a federal committee, "Solidarity With the Polish People," in Bonn. The committee said on Tuesday that it considers itself independent of any parties. Its aim is to better coordinate solidarity actions for Poland and to provide a broader basis for them. In order to show that solidarity with Poland did not end with the day of solidarity of the International Federation of Free Trade Unions, the committee has called for "watches" in front of the Polish Embassy in Cologne.

PROBLEMS OF U.S. PRESENCE IN EUROPE VIEWED

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "Will the Americans Remain in Europe?"]

[Text] Polish developments have disclosed dangerous tensions in the Atlantic alliance. Western governments deny the existence of a crisis, but the reality is that NATO is as much out of step due to Polish developments as the Warsaw Pact. Henry Kissinger's criticism of his own government's reaction — with regard to Warsaw developments — is a reminder to the whole alliance. If the former secretary of state is no longer restrained in criticizing the White House for weak leadership, he addressed also the allies who haven't made any efforts to harmonize strategic concepts.

NATO speaks with many voices and it does not act. You can disagree with Kissinger's angry suggestions. You can also doubt whether he would have talked that freely had he been the secretary of state. But you should consider his New York TIMES article as a determined warning to the Soviet Union which will exploit every weakness of the Atlantic alliance to strengthen its own position. If NATO wants to be taken seriously as an alliance, and if it does not want to sink to the level of the United Nations, it must develop a policy on Poland which will be binding for all partners under the leadership of the United States.

But are demands and possibilities still in accord? Poland has made the rifts in the alliance clear, although it is not the reason for the threatened deterioration of NATO's unity of action. The discussion about sanctions is just a continuation of political and military differences of opinion which have burdened the alliance for quite some time. The United States and Europe no longer agree on many things in connection with an assessment of the future.

That has led to a special kind of anti-Americanism in Europe. "Yankee go home!," hasn't been heard yet but important sections of the public and some governments have an almost schizophrenic attitude with regard to the U.S. presence. They do not object to the presence of U.S. troops to defend them, they even secretly count on their help, but they do not want the U.S. divisions to use nuclear arms for the protection of Europe in an emergency. The fear exists that the United States could involve the Europeans against their will, in a nuclear war. The strategy of deterrence is insisted on, but they don't want to run the slightest risk.

Security policy without a risk, however, doesn't exist. The United States cannot do without a stragety including nuclear arms as a last resort. Their numerical inferiority with regard to conventional troops calls for a strategy of nuclear deterrence. Without nuclear arms the U.S. soldiers in Europe and their dependents are hostages in the hands of the Russians. With nuclear arms, however, they are an element of Western security policy which the East had better leave alone.

The inability of the Europeans to follow this strategic logic has contributed to the estrangement among the partners. People are wondering in the United States whether it makes sense to keep the divisions in Europe if the old world rejects U.S. strategic planning.

It will be significant for the coming debate on strategy which of the two powerful secretaries in the Reagan administration will prevail, Haig or Weinberger. Haig doesn't see a substitute for the current U.S. security policy. If the United States withdrew militarily from Europe, it would mean giving up the U.S. position in the world. For the United States Asia is not a substitute for Europe. World policy is European policy, Haig, therefore, always takes European objections into consideration.

Caspar Weinberger takes a different view. As a friend of the President he is closer to the domestic political intentions of Reagan than to foreign political necessities. The secretary of defense knows that his country cannot ignore strategic commitments as a world power, but he thinks, like many conservative Republicans, more in terms of strategic categories.

Weinberger recently told a committee that in order to defend U.S. interests, more ships and planes would be needed. It could concentrate its armed forces in the country and use them as needed. The committee is supposed to figure out whether it would be financially and technically possible to have a unit stationed and supplied in the United States which could be used everywhere, as well as to man advanced overseas bases with adequate forces.

The United States will not be able to change its strategy until these analyses have been completed. The decision will also depend on the ability of U.S. industry to produce the necessary armaments for a new strategy (or two coordinated strategies). The Europeans can influence the U.S. strategy if they can convince them that they are all in one boat together, and that the team is stroking without a coxswain.

PAPER SKEPTICAL ABOUT U.S.-GERMAN TROOP PACT

[Ruediger Moniac commentary: "Reinforcement or Pullout?"]

To begin with, the plan probably will not be able to get off the ground in light of the growing displeasure of Congress and the change in the political climate in West Europe in general and in the Federal Republic in particular, which irritates the United States. If the Republican majority leader in the Senate already says that a majority for the pullout of U.S. soldiers from Europe might emerge soon, then this is a bad omen.

Secondly, the plan misjudges the changed strategic threat to the West by the Soviet Union. The possibility of a military attack on the Persian Gulf and its oil wells which are vital for the Western industrial countries, cannot be ruled out. This is why the United States is adapting to that reality to an increasing degree.

European NATO members must reckon that the reinforcements originally envisaged for our continent, would be relocated to the Middle East region in the event of a crisis. This is all the more true since Washington has no intention whatsoever to set up new divisions for its "Rapid Deployment Force." Hence, it is up to Bonn and the European allies to keep more divisions of their own in reserve.

MUBARAK URGES BUSINESSMEN TO INVEST IN EGYPT

NC021633 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 1500 GMT 2 Feb 82

[Excerpt] This morning [in Paris], President Mubarak met with a number of French businessmen. The president urged the businessmen to increase their investments in Egypt, particularly in providing the Arab Republic of Egypt with technology. His excellency also asked the French businessmen not to confine their work to major projects alone. The meeting between President Mubarak and the French businessmen was attended by Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali, Foreign Ministry First Under Secretary Dr Usamah al-Baz, and the Egyptian ambassador to France.

NATURAL GAS AGREEMENT SIGNED WITH ALGERIA

[Text] Paris, 3 Feb (AFP) -- Algerian Sonatrach and Gaz de France today signed three commerical documents covering three contracts for the supply of Algerian liquefied natural gas to France. The documents related to price (not disclosed), indexing of prices, revision of clauses, regularity of supplies, updating of the third contract signed in 1976 and covering 5,150 million cubic metres per annum, and the payments made by France in 1980 and 1981.

Announcing the signatures, External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson said the price paid was "higher than certain other long-term contract prices, but lower than for certain current supplies." Noting that earlier price conditions had been revised, he said: "The two state companies have clearly demonstrated the wish of the leaders of the two countries to safeguard and enhance the revenue drawn from natural resources, a basic aspect of the North-South relationship." Mr Cheysson recalled that the negotiations had lasted two years. Today's outcome meant the three supply contracts dated 1964, 1972 and 1976 went into full effect.

In all, France will receive 9,150 million cubic metres of gas per annum over a period of 20 to 25 years. The gas will be shipped to the Breton port of Montoire, which was completed late in 1980 and has been idle since then. The port will also handle some gas destined for Belgium. Mr Cheysson said in return for buying the gas, French firms would book a number of contracts. He said Algeria was already going ahead with 15 projects totalling roughly 6,000 million dollars in the sectors of motors, airport construction, railways, a subway system, hydrocarbons and steel. "This is only a start," he declared.

The minister also said the two countries intended shortly to sign an overall co-operation agreement. He summed up the deal as an example of how Third World countries could ensure earnings from commodity exports. He added: "We think a system resembling this gas agreement should be gradually set up on a world basis."

AGRICULTURE MINISTER DETAINED BY ANGRY FARMERS

NC021410 Paris AFP in English 1405 GMT 2 Feb 82

[Text] Caen, northwest France, 2 Feb (AFP) -- A helicopter today rescued Agriculture Minister Edith Cresson from some 300 angry farmers who prevented her from leaving a farm near here. For a time, the farmers refused to allow the helicopter to land, but gendarmes charged them in order to clear a landing site in an orchard near the farm. The minister, who is on a tour of Normandy, visited the farm at Airan before inviting a group of local farmers to a question and answer session.

The discussion over government agricultural policies became heated and when Mrs Cresson tried to leave, the farmers closed in.

POLISARIO FRONT TO OPEN OFFICIAL BUREAU

NC021056 Paris AFP in English 1052 GMT 2 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 2 Feb (AFP) -- The Polisario Front, the nationalist guerrilla movement fighting Morocco for control of the Western Sahara, is to open an official bureau in France, the front's European representative Fadel Ismail said here today. Mr Ismail said the move had the approval of the French Government, which only last week had talks with the Polisario's arch enemy, King Hassan of Morocco, who was visiting Paris.

Mr Ismail said the new bureau would enable France "to establish a direct, official and continual dialogue with the other -- and principle -- party in the Saharan conflict, and promote and develop France-Saharaui relations with a view to promising cooperation for the future."

Since May 10 last year, and the election of Socialist President Francois Mitterrand, France had taken "the road of history," Mr Ismail said. "Hence the legitimacy of our hope to be considered on the same equal footing as....Morocco...by the French Government." However he added that the Polisario was still waiting for France to stop weapons deliveries which were used by Rabat "in its war on peoples whose right to self-determination France recognises," to withdraw its technical assistance to Morocco instead of stepping it up and "to come to the aid of our people at risk from genocide."

Mr Ismail accused the former French Government of President Valery Giscard d'Estaing of being "the main instigator of aggression in the Western Sahara." That government "in collusion with the American administration, was the main source of military and diplomatic support to the Moroccan regime in its expansionist war against the Saharan people," Mr Ismail said.

But "the French political forces in power today do not hide their support of the just cause of the Saharan people" while the Moroccan Government has turned its back on peace, he said. "During his recent visit to France, the king of Morocco even went so far in his arrogance by declaring that he would never negotiate with the Polisario Front," the Polisario official said.

He said that latest decisions by the United Nations and the Organisation of African Unity had helped a rapprochement between the two sides in the Western Saharan conflict, but said that "the American intervention on Morocco's side" had sabotaged this progress. "The Washington-Rabat-Tunis axis is seeking to neutralise the UN and the OAU at a time when their role is more indispensible than ever," he said.

SED DELEGATION ARRIVES FOR PCF CONGRESS

[Text] Paris, 2 Feb (ADN) -- A delegation of the SED Central Committee led by Kurt Hager, Politburo member and secretary of the SED Central Committee, arrived in Paris today to attend the 24th French Communist Party Congress, which is taking place from Wednesday to Sunday in Saint Quen, the Parisian workers district. The delegation was cordially welcomed at Orly Airport by leading representatives of the French Communist Party.

KAMPUCHEA'S HUN SEN TO TAKE PART IN PCF CONGRESS

BK030714 Hong Kong AFP in English 0613 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Bangkok, 3 Feb (AFP) -- One of the top leaders of the pro-Vietnamese Cambodian Government, Hun Sen, arrived in Paris Monday to take part in the 24th Congress of the French Communist Party, the Cambodian SPK news agency, monitored here, reported today.

Hun Sen is vice-prime minister, foreign minister and a member of the Politburo of the pro-Soviet People's Revolutionary Party of Cambodia. SPK said that Mr Hun Sen was welcomed on his arrival in the French capital by Maxime Gremetz, a member of the Political Bureau of the French Communist Party.

Delegations representing the pro-Soviet communist parties in Vietnam and Laos have also arrived in Paris for the communist party congress.

USSR DEFERS DECISION ON VISA FOR WOMAN

[Text] A visa for Inna Lavrova, the young Soviet woman who had undertaken a 36-day hunger strike to obtain a visa in order to be able to marry the French engineer Guy Torrent, has been deferred. The Soviet authorities have changed their mind. They have deferred their decision to grant a visa to the young woman. They have been putting opposition to the marriage of the young couple for 4 years.

PAPER VIEWS GAS CONTRACT AND INTERNAL TENSIONS

[Text] "Was it necessary to add to the Poles' tragedy the complementary tragedy of the French deprived of gas supplies?" Mr Mauroy was prompted to say in Cambrai [on 25 January]. A more formal and technical statement by the premier in the evening was unable to fully remedy that blunder. A great deal has been said over the past 3 days about this contract, its appropriateness in present international circumstances and the fact that it will make France dependent on the USSR in the sphere of gas, if not energy.

Less emphasis has been given to the government's internal tensions on this subject. Isn't Mr Jobert reported to have said when speaking to the Institute for Advanced National Defense Studies on January -- which has not been denied -- that the contract may correspond to the French [national] gas company's needs but not to those of France? And everybody is aware of the fact that the Quai d'Orsay -- before and after 10 May -- has always had more reservations about such a major commitment to the Soviet Union.

But as soon as people had been convinced of the need for gas supplies from a country which possesses one-third of the world's gas reserves -- and both the Elysee and the Ministry of Industry were convinced of that -- there was a strong temptation to sign quickly to end internal pressures; since the contract would be signed in any case.... hence the instructions given to the French gas company, at the highest level, to pursue negotiations as usual.

Nonetheless, the government should probably have better prepared people "politically and technically" for that signing. Can the political nature of some trade relations be denied when we are going to sign a political agreement on the price of gas with Algeria in a few days' time? Was it necessary to wait 3 days before announcing that measures were going to be taken to cushion the effects of a possible break in supplies? Explaining and informing is sometimes as important as taking action.

ENVOY TO CHAD -- France has reopened its embassy in Ndjamena and has appointed an ambassador to Chad again, namely Mr Claude Soubeste, whose appointment was published in the JOURNAL OFFICIEL on 23 January. Owing to the proximity of the fighting, the French Embassy in Ndjamena had been closed in May 1980 and the ambassador, Mr Marcel Beaux, had been recalled in Paris. A charge d'affaires at the French Embassy in Kousseri, Cameroon, Mr Ricard, had taken care of the embassy's affairs. [Text] [Paris LE MONDE in French 24-25 Jan 82 p 24 PM]

LOWER HOUSE DEBATES RESPONSE TO TERRORISM

[Text] Rome, 2 Feb (ANSA) -- The lower house debate here on the freeing of U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier January 28 and subsequent police operations against his Red Brigades captors has provided another opening for checking out the solidity of the present government coalition led by Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini, according to political observers today. Winding up the debate, Spadolini warned that the battle against terrorism in Italy will "be long and difficult...and not without its unforeseeable difficulties." But he also pointed to the "coordination and cohesion" shown by the various branches of the Italian police and noted that the fact that the situation had been solved within normal legal and institutional procedures [and] was a "confirmation of strength for this republic." The Spadolini government is a five-way partnership of his own Republicans with the Christian Democrats, the Socialists, the Social Democrats, and the Liberals.

Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni, a Christian Democrat, argued that the success in the Dozier affair was not "chance" because of the efficiency and professional level of the police. But he, too, warned that it would be a mistake to think that the "best of the job has been done against terrorism."

All the political parties agreed, to various degrees, with these analyses, but they also took the chance to make their own views heard on the current government alliance. The lower house floor-leader of the Christian Democrats, Gerardo Bianco, for example, asserted that it was "misleading and a mystification" to say that all the merit should go to the present non-Christian Democrat premiership, the first since shortly after World War II when Christian Democrat monopoly on the prime minister's office began.

The Italian Communist Party, the major force on the opposition, (?expressed) appreciation for the efforts of the police against terrorism in recent months. But their spokesman, Ugo Spagnoli, also criticized Justice Minister Clelio Darida for coming out against the de-militarization of the police and prison guards. According to the Communists, one of the major factors in the fight against terrorism has been a series of measures designed to remove the police from their military role in order to bring them closer to the man-on-the-street.

Most of the speakers brought up allegations from various quarters (?of) the Italian urban guerillas' international ties. In particular, those speaking on behalf of the Communists, the Radicals, and the Proletarian Unity Party urged the government to produce precise proofs rather than proceed by allusion.

[Excerpts] Rome, 3 Feb (ANSA) -- Unconfirmed reports had it that a draft of what was to have been the Red Brigades sixth communique announcing the killing of General James Lee Dozier and where to find his body, was among the papers seized by investigators in the Padua apartment where the NATO officer was rescued.

Other leaks claimed that police had found several letters in the Padua hideout, written in English and addressed to U.S. President Ronald Reagan, the U.S. ambassador to Rome, Maxwell Rabb and to other high Pentagon officials. These letters were said to propose Dozier's safe return in exchange for the release of several jailed founding leaders of the Red Brigades organization, including Renato Curcio. However, during a press conference Tuesday, Dozier denied writing to Reagan during his captivity.

In any case, all of the material seized in the Padua hideout has been handed over to Judge Pietro Calogero who launched the investigation into the extreme leftwing "Autonomy" movement which led to the arrest on April 7, 1979 of many members of that group, including Professor Toni Negri.

In the meantime, it has been confirmed in Verona that the arrests in early January of brigadists like Giovanni Senzani had not been instrumental in the discovery of the Padua hideout. After the general's rescue, 8 more terrorist hideouts were discovered in Verona itself. A police official in that city said that one of these was set up to house Dozier if his kidnappers did not manage to get out of Verona because of road blocks, thrown up by police.

In another development it was learned that Italian border police and Carabinieri had seized a sailboat in the small port of Chioggia on the Venetian lagoon. The boat belongs to the father of Manuela Frascella whose apartment was used to hold Dozier prisoner. According to leaks, the 12-and-a-half meter sailboat "Pretty Peggy" was equipped with a tiny engine and has made numerous trips abroad over recent months. Investigations were being made to see if the craft has been used to transport arms.

Rome police have given no particulars on the three persons picked up by them last Saturday on suspicion of belonging to the Red Brigades "Militarist" branch which shot and wounded anti-terrorist police official Nicola Simone in Rome on January 6. The U.S. Government has invited Simone to the United States to be treated in a hospital specializing in plastic surgery. The official was seriously wounded in the mouth by terrorist bullets.

It still has not been proven beyond any shadow of a doubt that slain Christian Democratic Party President and former Premier Aldo Moro was held prisoner by the Red Brigades in an apartment on the outskirts of Rome used by Laura Braghetti, a brigades member. Her brother Alessandro told ANSA that during the time of the Moro kidnapping he shared the apartment with her. On Tuesday 260 arrest warrants were issued by those investigating the Moro case. At the top of the list was Renato Curcio who is already in jail on terrorist charges. The warrants were issued for crimes of armed insurrection against the state and conducting civil war. Both crimes call for life imprisonment in the case of conviction.

STUDENTS FEAR PRO-KHOMEYNI 'DEATH SQUADS' ON WAY

[Text] Perugia, 3 Feb (ANSA) -- The General Union of Democratic Iranian Students has warned that Iranians loyal to Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeyni had formed "death squads" that had left Iran for Italy and other European countries to create trouble for anti-Khomeynists living in exile. A spokesman for the union, an organism politically linked to the People's Mojahedin group which is outlawed in Iran, said that "the death squads" planned to create incidents that would cause anti-Khomeynist Iranians studying at universities in Perugia, Pescara and Turin to be expelled from Italy.

These incidents might break out on February 11, the spokesman said, as this date marks the third anniversary of the Islamic revolution in Iran that toppled Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi and brought Khomeyni to power. To back up their claims, students belonging to the union provided the press here yesterday with photocopies of allegedly classified documents from Iranian embassies in Europe which indicate plans to create trouble for anti-Khomeynists who live outside Iran.

BRAZIL'S PLANNING MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS

FY280117 Brasilia Domestic Service in Portuguese 2200 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Today Planning Minister Delfim Neto arrived in Portugal where he will hold meetings with Portuguese authorities. Tomorrow he will preside over a preliminary meeting of inter-American Development Bank governors in charge of drawing up the 1982-83 budget to be submitted in Cartagena, Colombia, in March.

This morning Minister Delfim Neto met with Ricardo Baiao Horta, Portuguese industry, energy and exports minister and with the import-export secretary of the Finance Ministry with whom he had lunch. During the two meetings the Brazilian and Portuguese authorities reviewed the terms of the $90 million agreement which includes the sale of Brazilian-made Bandeirante planes to the Portuguese Government. Among other issues it was agreed at the meeting that Brazilian-Portuguese trade is experiencing a phase of changes which at present are of great importance, considering Portugal's entry into the EEC in January 1983.

NIC Classification Discussed

FY290235 Brasilia Domestic Service in Portuguese 2200 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Text] Brazil is not at odds with the United States over the subject of classification of Newly Industrialized Countries [NIC] for the purpose of obtaining resources from international organizations, Planning Minister Delfim Neto today told the international press on his second day in Lisbon.

Neto said that this is not an emotional issue but an objective, practical one. When a country grows it obviously has to be reclassified; there can be no objection to this. He said: What we want to do is to influence international organizations so that the criteria for granting loans to NIC's is not based on the per-capita income alone, which is a poor indicator. He said it would be better to establish degrees in the interest rates so that the NIC may continue to obtain funds at rates which would be close to those prevailing on the market.

At the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) meeting held today in Lisbon under the chairmanship of Minister Neto, the Brazilian governor, Central Bank President Carlos Langoni, clearly established the Brazilian position on the subject of classification. He said it is unacceptable to classify NIC's on the mere, simple basis of per-capita income because this would be an arbitrary, ineffective way of redistributing the resources of multilateral institutions toward less developed countries. Langoni proposed a natural process of differentiation of the financial costs of loans among countries at different development stages.

The IDB meeting will continue tomorrow in Lisbon when other issues will be discussed. On Saturday, Neto will leave for Paris to continue his tour of three European countries: Portugal, France and Belgium.

OLESEN, GDR FOREIGN MINISTER HOLD TALKS

LD291612 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1250 GMT 29 Jan 82

[Text] Copenhagen, 29 Jan (ADN) -- GDR Deputy Foreign Minister Kurt Nier and Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen held talks in Copenhagen on Thursday. Both politicians praised the steady development of mutually advantageous relations between the two states. They spoke in favor of the deepening of cooperation in the political and economic spheres and in other areas on the basis of the Helsinki Final Act.

They agreed that, in view of the aggravated international situation, the political dialogue and the development of good-neighborly relations are of special importance and are an important contribution to the preservation and continuation of the process of detente. In consultations with the under secretary of state in the Foreign Ministry, Peter Dyvig, Kurt Nier stressed that it is the states' responsibility to consolidate European security and oppose a further exacerbation of the international situation. Particularly urgent in this area are results in arms limitation and disarmament in the nuclear field. Kurt Nier said that outstanding problems had to be solved through negotiations with strict observance of the principle of equality, equal security and noninterference. All attempts to replace the policy of detente with a policy of confrontation must be resolutely opposed.

MAUNO KOIVISTO INTERVIEWED ON FUTURE POLICY

DW021050 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 1 Feb 82 pp 120-122

[Interview by unidentified reporter with President Mauno Koivisto -- date and place not given]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Doctor Koivisto, for more than a quarter of a century Finnish policy has been characterized by the predominant President Kekkonen. You yourself once said that "there will never be a second Kekkonen." Now you are president. What will be changed while you are in office?

Koivisto: A very high percentage of Finns, more than ever before, currently consider our basic political approach to be a good policy. Our system is widely supported by the people, and all parties say basically the same although with different words. There is, therefore, no popular pressure to change our political thinking. The question about the role of the president involves a mood rather than real political content. I will handle the problems in much the same way as my predecessor; much depends on the government Finland has during coming years. I do not foresee great changes.

SPIEGEL: Do you have a personal list of priorities regarding the domestic political matters you want to change?

Koivisto: The president should not be the domestic political leader of the country -- and he is not. That was my opinion when I was prime minister. My predecessor as prime minister, the Social Democrat Sorsa, once said to me that he never discussed matters with the president which he considered to be government problems.

I don't think that this is correct, though. As prime minister I regularly saw the president and informed him about what my government intended to do. I did not ask him, however, whether this would be acceptable to him.

The president can say what he wants, but he should not be asked to do it. That will also be my approach in the future. Even during the short time as acting president I have experienced how limited the president's opportunities are to know what is going on in the government. The president is very much a man who derives his political knowledge from the newspapers.

SPIEGEL: The Social Democrats will not take their compatriots' summer houses on the sea away from them?

Koivisto: No, no. It was unwise of my political opponents to make something evil out of socialism. When you speak of socialism, you normally think of criticism of property, particularly the means of production. In the socialist countries of East Europe and in the Soviet Union, people are also permitted to have their own houses. The peasants in Poland have kept their own farms for the most part, but I don't know whether workers have their own houses.

But this has not been an issue for years in the Western social democratic movement. There was a movement, however -- and I participated in it, which wanted to curtail the expansion of property rights. We have laws in this respect, such as that forbidding the owner of property to ruin the land. In other words, property does not play the role today it once did. We already have enough problems with state-owned plants where relations with workers are even a problem at times. A government often has fewer problems with private firms.

SPIEGEL: Your election is not all that harmless. You are the first Social Democratic president in Finland's history. Nonsocialist politicians continuously warned against you as being the "Finnish Mitterrand." Will you socialize Finland, a nonsocialist republic?

Koivisto: The term "socialism" stands for so many things. As long as we have a freely elected parliament, there will be no changes in the political atmosphere. A person, not political programs, has been elected here. However, there will naturally be political implications. Naturally there will be political difficulties after this presidential election. I expect that we will have a new government very soon after my election. But will the presidential election have the effect of signaling the composiiton of the next parliament? That is an interesting problem.

SPIEGEL: The Finnish Constitution says that the president alone determines the country's foreign policy. For 33 years now, the close and friendly relations with the great neighbor, the Soviet Union, have been the pillar of Finnish foreign policy. Will this policy change under President Koivisto, and can it change at all?

Koivisto: The political framework is solid. Thus the only thing that matters is what new problems arise in the future, or whether any such problems arise. Therefore the point is this: If a new foreign policy situation emerges, how helpful are the foreign policy principles that have been valid for us to date? But I am sure that these principles will be quite useful in the future as well. Our foreign policy is one that comes naturally for a country like Finland with its geographic location and its current economic and political system. Above all with the liberal political....

SPIEGEL: ...and the profitable economic one, the business with East Europe. In an article last Monday, which caused a considerable sensation in Finland, Moscow's PRAVDA made it quite clear that the Kremlin wished somebody other than you, to be president of Finland. Wouldn't you be inclined to agree that this constitutes interference in Finland's internal affairs?

Koivisto: To my knowledge PRAVDA did not write anything against me.

SPIEGEL: Not against you, but in favor of your political opponent.

Koivisto: As always in such cases, they simply relied on the feelings of the Finnish press rather than those of the people.

SPIEGEL: Thus such an article does not constitute interference?

Koivisto: We should not be oversensitive. You know, a lot is written in East and West alike, except that what is written in the West is normally not considered interference in internal affairs.

SPIEGEL: Finland's other neighbor, the Baltic Sea country of Poland, is your most important trade partner in East Europe, second only to the USSR. Do the latest Polish developments have any direct political influence on Finland?

Koivisto: Naturally it is hard to predict what will happen. There are plenty of guesses. However, not even the press was able to foresee what has happened. The journalists are only guessing. Experts, too, were taken by surprise.

I was not very surprised by the developments in Poland because I lost my confidence in the Polish Government many years ago. Yes, I was perfectly aware that the government and the party in Poland were unable to get the new problems under control. Well, it is absolutely clear that the leading party there lost courage and, consequently, its sense of reality. As a result it lost control of events in the country. Then the army seized power -- it is perhaps the only Polish organization which can still exert influence on the course of events.

SPIEGEL: And what about "Solidarity?"

Koivisto: Trade unions basically constitute opposition. There were some scholars in the 19th century who believed that trade unions could dominate society. Such scholars no longer exist today. The trade union movement is an oppositional phenomenon. This is why we and why I believe that the Poles must first of all quickly get a grip on the supply of goods to consumers before they lose control of the ship of state's course. Production must be normalized and people must be persuaded to work again. This is what the Poles must do, and in this process they must continue their gradual reforms. This needs to be done very cautiously -- it will be an extremely long and difficult process.

DOCUMENTS ON WALLENBERG TO BE PUBLISHED IN APRIL

[Ingmar Lindmarker report]

[Excerpt] Perhaps the largest number of secret documents ever to be released from Swedish archives will be published soon. They comprise around 14,500 pages from the Foreign Ministry's documentation on Raoul Wallenberg. After a delay of almost 1 year it looks as if the publication will be able to take place in April. It comprises material about Wallenberg for the period 1950-70. One of the Foreign Ministry's experts on the Wallenberg affair, Embassy Councillor Lars-Ake Nilsson, has just finished going through the thick file. He had been recalled from his post in London for the purpose. On the basis of this examination cabinet secretary Leif Leifland, who has followed the case closely over the years, will recommend to the government how large a part of the material can be made public.

FALL CSCE MADRID CONFERENCE MAY BE POSTPONED

LD021432 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1334 GMT 2 Feb 82

[Text] Madrid, 2 Feb (TANJUG) -- The host of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) Madrid follow-up, head of the Spanish delegation to the conference Javier Reperez, has for the first time announced the possibility of postponing the CSCE Madrid session for fall 1982. The resumption of the CSCE Madrid follow-up is expected next Tuesday. Ruperez stressed that the conference plenary session will be devoted to discussing the Polish question. (?As) soon as the Western countries' foreign ministers on February 9 raise the Polish issue, Washington proposes to put off the conference until next fall.

Ruperez said that the Madrid negotiations cannot continue "because of the flagrant violation of the Helsinki spirit" by the imposition of martial law in Poland. Spanish Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo stated at the same time that the West wants to negotiate with the East only after the prior abolition of the martial law in Poland, the release of all the arrested Poles and the renewal of the dialogue with "the social forces in the spirit of reconciliation and full respect for human rights." Calvo-Sotelo stated the view that events in Poland are directly to the detriment of the CSCE Madrid follow-up and added that the Poles will be "given moral and material support in the struggle for the resoration of freedoms."

SCHMIDT OUTLINES UNEMPLOYMENT PACKAGE

[Text] Bonn, 3 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Cabinet today adopted a comprehensive package of measures to improve the labor market situation. Chancellor Helmut Schmidt told newsmen that the government had given the measures decided on in connection with the 1982 annual economic report the title "Joint Initiatives for Jobs, Growth and Stability." The chairmen of the SPD and FDP parliamentary groups also took part in the cabinet consultations. The chancellor stressed that all countries, at least in the West, have to cope with rising unemployment. Part of the reason for this is that people born in the years of the baby boom are now reaching the labor market. Joint action by all groups in society was necessary. Schmidt appealed to the Bundesrat and Bundestag and to the Laender and the local authorities to join in the common efforts for growth and stability.

Schmidt named as the first measures in the jobs creation program a 10-percent investment bonus, for a limited period, for fixed assets and construction projects. The subsidy is to be granted, retroactive, from January 1982 to 31 December 1982 for all investment goods ordered in this period which meet the conditions. One condition is that investments should exceed the company's average investments over the preceding 3 years.

Schmidt said that the Federal Government expects this measure to prompt investments totalling DM40 billion. He said that the burden imposed on public budgets by the subsidy will be about DM4 billion up to 1985, but that they will first be felt in 1983.

Schmidt said that a further measure is the additional credit programs of the Reconstruction Loan Corporation and of the European Recovery Program [ERP] special fund amounting to over DM6 billion. The low-interest rate programs of the Reconstruction Loan Corporation are intended mainly for small and medium-sized companies. The money from the ERP special fund is earmarked primarily for public environment measures such as sewage purification and the maintenance of clean air. Schmidt said that in addition the federal authorities will spend some DM800 million on construction in the public housing sector.

In addition to measures providing incentives in the privately-financed housing sector and aimed at increasing the amount of land available for building, Schmidt announced that up to 1985 the federal authorities intend to spend some DM400 million on combating youth unemployment. A working group led by the federal employment minister will also examine all suggestions for an earlier retirement age incurring additional burdens for those paying pension contributions.

To finance the program, the value added tax is to be raised from 13 percent to 14 percent effective 1 July 1983. Schmidt said that this additional revenue would also be used to finance tax relief with regard to wages and income tax from 1 January 1984.

The chancellor stressed that the main thrust of the measures adopted is clearly toward a promotion of private and public investment. Here we are quite aware that not every investment would lead to the removal of lasting unemployment. There was also agreement in the cabinet that the most effective program for stimulating the job market lies in a significant lowering of interest rates."

To Request Confidence Vote

[Text] Bonn, 3 Feb (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will ask for a vote of confidence in the Bundestag on Friday.

Further Details

LD031632 Hamburg DPA in German 1407 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 3 Feb (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt intends to ask the Bundestag for a vote of confidence in connection with the measures decided on by the Federal Government to stimulate employment. Schmidt announced to newsmen on Wednesday that he made the application to the Bundestag president on Wednesday in accordance with Article 68 of the Basic Law as a result of this joint initiative.

If the chancellor's measures do not receive an absolute majority in the Bundestag (at least 249 votes), the federal president can dissolve the Bundestag within 21 days at the chancellor's request. This right loses validity as soon as the majority of Bundestag representatives elects another chancellor.

GENSCHER RECOMMENDS FDP SUPPORT FOR SCHMIDT

LD031636 Hamburg DPA in German 1556 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 3 Feb (DPA) -- FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher today recommended that the FDP Bundestag group declare its confidence in the federal chancellor in Friday's vote. Genscher also recommended that the FDP deputies declare their full support for the government's employment program. According to a spokesman, the FDP group greeted the recommendations with loud applause.

EPPLER CALLS FOR RALLIES AGAINST COUNTERARMING

[Werner Kahl report]

[Text] Bonn -- In the debate on the Federal Government's security policy, Erhard Eppler, member of the SPD Executive Board, has called for new demonstrations. "It is not enough for the federal chancellor to bring pressure to bear on President Reagan," he stressed at the Bonn university. "What is needed is counterpressure from the street." At a meeting of the Bonn JUSO [Young Socialists] university group, Eppler was introduced as the leading spokesman of the "peace movement" and of the opposition within the SPD.

In the discussion Eppler presented the view that during the next 6 months "West Europe, including the Federal Republic," will either succumb to "the growing pressure exerted by the United States" or "the coalition of rearmers" will be "forced to give up their positions." An alternative to counterarmament, Eppler said, can only come from the grassroots. He did not want to wait to express his "no" to the stationing of Western weapons in the Federal Republic until the party congress in 1983.

Describing the "peace movement and the Krefeld appeal" as part of the "counterpressure," Eppler said that his role was that of a "link between the SPD and the peace movement." "Channeling" the "peace movement" into a new party, as has often been proposed, would mean paralyzing it. Referring to the debates within the SPD Executive Board, he said: "I do not want to elaborate on everything I am doing during my discussions with Helmut Schmidt."

PAPANDREOU'S TALKS WITH SCHMIDT CONTINUE

NC031425 Paris AFP in English 1354 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 3 Feb (AFP) -- Talks here between Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt did nothing to bring the two governments closer on their views of Greek action within the European Community and the Atlantic alliance, a reliable source said here today.

The sources said Mr Schmidt had reiterated that Greece should pull its weight as a partner within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), aiming at consensus and not at carving out a special position.

On the issue of West German military aid to Turkey, Mr Schmidt told his guest yesterday that Bonn would continue to supply aid to both Turkey and Greece, in a ratio of five to three-and-a-half, and that this was due to Turkey's greater territory. The source said that the chancellor had added that arms were not being supplied to prevent the two nations from rearming against each other.

Turning to the Greek psoition in the EEC -- Mr Papandreou's socialist government has recently disassociated itself from its nine partners on the Mideast, Poland and sanctions against the Kremlin, while demanding to renogotiate membership — Mr Schmidt advised the Greek premier to "have a few years' patience." Mr Papandreou was to meet today with Mr Schmidt's predecessor Willy Brandt, who heads the Socialist International, and to fly home tomorrow after talks with defence minister Hans Apel.

NC040836 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0500 GMT 4 Feb 82

[Text] At a press conference yesterday, Prime Minister Papandreou stated that, in his person, Greece was particularly honored by the West German leaders. He added that he had the opportunity for long and productive talks with Chancellor Schmidt and other West German personalities. Referring to the discussions he had with Schmidt on the Polish issue, Papandreou said that the position of the Greek Government has proved to be correct.

On the two issues most vital to Greece, the Aegean and Cyprus, the prime minister said that he discussed them in detail with his interlocutors. Specifically on the Aegean, he said that the policy of the Greek Government is to promote peace both in the area where our country is situated as well as in Europe more generally. We claim absolutely nothing in the Aegean over and above our national rights, he said, and we hope that this position is fully understood by Ankara. In any event, we are determined to defend our borders. On the Cyprus issue, the prime minister said that former Chancellor Willy Brandt offered unofficially to present and promote the Cyprus issue in the West.

On the question of the Greek emigrants who live and work in West Germany, it was stressed there is a need to form a repatriation organization to handle problems related to their return. In reference to the question of Greeks living outside the country voting, the prime minister said that very soon the government will submit a draft law to the Chamber of Deputies to settle the matter.

Specifically on the question of economic aid, Papandreou said that he conferred with representatives of the chambers of commerce and industry of West Germany and stressed that West German investments are welcome in Greece as long as the rules and laws of the country are observed. He added that the Greek Government is not prepared to tolerate any over-tariffing. What Greece asks from foreign investors the prime minister said, is parity. Lack of parity causes Greece to lose approximately $1 billion annually.

Papandreou then answered questions from the press, stressing that the Cyprus issue is not an issue between the two island communities. The Cyprus issue, he said, is a difficult one to solve. The two communities can offer very little through their dialogue, because in reality the dialogue is between Kiprianou and Evren. Only when Cyprus becomes independent and demilitarized will the two communities be able to proceed with a dialogue and find a solution to the problem.

On the Aegean, the prime minister said that our partners in NATO must fully understand that NATO does not guarantee our country's frontiers and territorial integrity. He stressed that the continual arming of Turkey is putting Greece in a difficult position causing diversion of vast resources to national defense while it has special needs in health, education and other sectors. On the Turkish position toward Greece, Parandreou said he was struck by the uncontrolled articles in the Turkish press and the statements by Turkish officials presenting Greece as a threat to Turkish shores on the Aegean. This Turkish attempt to present Greece as the aggressor at this moment only creates laughter. He admitted that we are passing through a period when there is no tension in Greek-Turkish relations, but rather a particular verbalism on the part of General Evren.

On the EC, he reiterated his statements of last November at the European Council session in London. After reiterating our positions, Papandreou concluded, Chancellor Schmidt expressed the opinion that Greece will not be forced to renegotiate with the community or withdraw from it.

BRANDT MEETS WITH GREEK PRIME MINISTER

LD031806 Hamburg DPA in German 1652 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 3 Feb (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has assured Greek Prime Minister Papandreou of his party's particular interest in a further intensification of cooperation with the Greek socialists. This was stated by the spokesman of the SPD Executive, Wolfgang Clement, at the end of a talk between Brandt and Papandreou. During the talk, which lasted several hours, Papandreou announced that the Greek side will take part in the exchange of views of European social democrat and democratic socialist parties on current economic problems.

The chairman of the DGB, Vetter, at a meeting with Papandreou criticized the fact that the freely-elected Executive of the Greek trade union federation, GSEE, has been replaced, by a decision of an Athens magistrate, by a new Executive. According to the DGB press office, Papandreou said that he too regarded such a measure as undesirable.

Papandreou also had a meeting with representatives of German industry in the building of the Association of German Chambers of Industry and Commerce in Bonn. The Greek prime minister will end his visit tomorrow, with a talk with Federal Defense Minister Apel and return to Athens.

COUNTERESPIONAGE AUTHORITIES DISCOVER GDR PLAN

[Excerpt] Hanover; 3 Feb (DPA) -- The counterespionage authorities in the Federal Republic claim to have dealt a decisive blow to efforts by the GDR Ministry for State Security to set up a so-called network of moles in the FRG. According to information confirmed by the Lower Saxony Interior Ministry's Department for the Protection of the Constitution today, counterespionage officials found a special radio set of a hitherto unidentified type in a small wood near Varel, north of Oldenburg.

According to the Lower Saxony Interior Ministry, so-called "moles" are only to be activated in a tense situation. They are trained in the GDR, come to the West without equipment -- like radio sets -- and collect it there, where they are concealed by other agents. As a result of the find near Varel, it has been possible for the first time in the West to establish proof of these GDR plans. The protection of the constitution authorities were given a tip-off about the hiding place. It is said to have been set up there by an agent trained in the GDR about whose identity and whereabouts no information was given.

BONN, WASHINGTON DIFFER ON APPROACHES TO CSCE

[Thomas Kielinger commentary]

[Text] The statement by the Federal Press and Information Office that no discord exists between Washington and Bonn on the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference is, unfortunately, no reason to feel reassured. Haig probably did not show his privately expressed indignation ("He was incensed," we were told) over Bonn's attitude when he talked to his colleague Genscher on the phone. That would not have been in line with the rules of diplomatic long distance calls. What is involved in whether the U.S. request to adjourn the CSCE follow-up conference should be honored. At first glance the German position -- against adjournment -- has something to it.

The so-called "Helsinki process" is a useful means to deal with human rights violations in the Soviet sphere of influence. For Moscow it would also be an interesting place to make all kinds of moves regarding European disarmament which would be unacceptable for the West, so why shouldn't we continue talking? The point is that pursuing "business as usual" with Moscow is unacceptable to Washington as long as suppression continues in Poland. Most of all, however, they do not want to do the other side the favor of entering a discussion on the European disarmament conference just now. Human rights can be discussed elsewhere even if the CSCE meeting is adjourned. Now the danger of a one-sided U.S. boycott exists if Bonn and the other partners do not muster greater firmness. Disappointment on the Potomac was caused by the Genscher letter indicating that the European allies could leave the United States standing out in the rain again.

NATO STANCE ON POLAND COULD UNDERMINE HAIG

DW031057 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 3 Feb 82 p 10

[Commentary signed EIN: "Against Haig"]

[Text] The Reagan administration does not expect a solution to the Polish crisis soon. The current skepticism in Washington is demonstrated by the schedule of the President's visit to Europe. This visit is planned for June and one point on the agenda -- the Brussels meeting -- between the President and European statesmen is devoted to Poland. Reagan wants Poland to be thoroughly discussed at the special NATO session. However, many things can happen inthe 5 months before the planned mammoth session of the Atlantic alliance. The question is being asked correctly whether one of the U.S. officials who most understands the Europeans, namely Alexander Haig, will still be at the side of Reagan then. There are increasing signs in Washington which indicate that the moderate stance of the secretary of state toward the Polish issue and his concern for the European reservations has irritated not just the Republicans. If NATO continues doing what it has done so far -- namely nothing -- it will thus be doing everything to undermine the position of one of the few experts on Europe in the administration. The absence of Haig at the June summit would widen the gap between the United States and Europe.

CHEYSSON DEFENDS MEETING WITH POLAND'S CZYREK

LD031504 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Text] Late this afternoon the minister of external relations is due to meet the Polish minister of foreign affairs, who has come to Paris to attend the communist party congress. This morning, while he was commenting on the signing of the contract on Algerian gas, Mr Cheysson outlined his position on Paris-Warsaw relations. The relations between the two countries cannot be normal, given what is happening there, but that does not mean that there is any kind of diplomatic break. Claude Cheysson was speaking to (Jerome Bonaldi):

[Begin recording] These relations cannot be normal, given that the promises made by General Jaruzelski on three fundamental issues have not been kept: the lifting of martial law and the release of the internees, the resumption of dialogue with the political forces and returning to the process of democratic renewal. Having said that, our ambassador continues to meet members of the Polish administration; sometimes the minister of foreign affairs is referred to as the head of diplomacy and the head of diplomacy must, like his representatives, meet a foreign representative who requests this. You already know what I shall say to Mr Czyrek, I have just told you. This conversation will add nothing new but I had no reason to refuse the request to meet me made by Mr Czyrek, who is in Paris for other reasons. [end recording]

Meets With Czyrek

[Text] Paris, 3 Feb (AFP) -- French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson called for an end to martial law and a return of civil liberties in Poland during a brief meeting here with Polish Foreign Minister Jozef Czyrek. A communique from the French Foreign Ministry said that Mr Cheysson had "marked the disapproval of French authorities and the population at the evolution of the situation in Poland."

Mr Cheysson reaffirmed the French position calling for "an end to the state of siege, the release of interned persons, the reestablishment of trade union liberties and resumption of a real dialogue between the forces representing the Polish people," the communique said. Mr Czyrek had attended the opening session of the 24th French Communist Party Congress outside Paris today. Announcement that he would meet with Mr Cheysson set off a wave of criticism in the French press, which commented that it was untimely for the foreign ministers to meet given their diametrically opposed positions on the crisis in Poland.

CHEYSSON COMMENTS ON GAS AGREEMENT WITH ALGERIA

[Summary] In accordance with France's policy of diversifying its energy supplies, an agreement was signed this morning on supplies of Algerian gas. Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson spoke to (Jerome Bonaldi) just after signing the contract:

[Begin Cheysson recording] At present, France depends on crude oil for 50 percent of its energy requirements. Such a level of dependence is formidable. To be precise, it represents 92 million tons of oil in 1981 out of a total energy requirement equivalent to 185 million tons of oil. We are determined to reduce that percentage to 42 percent in 1985, to 32 percent in 1990. [end recording]

Officially, the price negotiated for the approximately 9 billion cubic meters of gas to be supplied by Algeria annually is secret because the agreement is not just a commercial one but also has a political nature.

However, there were some indiscretions in Algiers this morning and the price is reported to be about F 1.40 a cubic meter delivered to French ports. This is about 15 percent above the world market price and is higher than the price of Soviet gas. At present, deliveries from Algiers and Moscow represent 30 percent of our gas supplies and this figure will go up to 55 percent in 1990. Claude Cheysson said this morning, and I quote: The French-Algerian agreement is within the framework of the North-South policy defended by France and this is an example which should be followed at the international level.

MARCHAIS DELIVERS POLICY SPEECH AT PCF CONGRESS

NC031651 Paris AFP in English 1643 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 3 Feb (AFP) -- French Communist Party Chairman Georges Marchais opened the party's first congress in three years today with an affirmation that the refusal of French communists to align with other European parties in condemning the events in Poland was "just and reasonable." The French party's attitude on Poland was "to do nothing which could favorise internal confrontation or the internationalization of the conflict," Mr Marchais told some 2,000 delegates to the 24th congress, held at a giant sports complex in the working-class suburb of Saint-Ouen just north of Paris.

"Life tends to confirm that our position was just and reasonable," he said.

The French party has differed sharply both from its Socialist partners in the coalition government in Paris and from the other major communist European parties, in Italy and Spain, which have vigorously opposed the state of siege imposed in Poland on December 13. This stand increased internal party conflict which arose after disastrous showings in last spring's elections, which certain party sections speaking out against Mr Marchais' consistent support for the Moscow line. [as received]

In a speech which lasted almost five hours, Mr Marchais appeared to mitigate his previous pro-Moscow stance somewhat, affirming that the party did not aim to "transplant a model to France." As leading figures from Moscow-aligned parties looked on, Mr Marchais called for "an unconditional condemnation of Stalinism," adding that the French party's support of other communist parties was "not unconditional." Among those listening were Soviet Politburo member Konstantin Chernenko, one of the Kremlin's leading figures, Polish Foreign Minister Jozef Czyrek, Afghan President Babrak Karmal's brother Mahmud Barialay and officials from Kampuchea, Laos, Vietnam and a number of East European countries. China was represented by its ambassador to France, Yao Guang. All four Communist ministers in the French Socialist-dominated government were present with Mr Marchais on the speaker's podium.

While the party chief refrained from criticizing French Government policy since Socialist President Francois Mitterrand took over last May, he warned that "major serious problems remain," citing inflation, unemployment and the lack of democracy in businesses. However, he instructed the party to "respect at all times the will of the majority," and called for construction of "French-style socialism," a term also employed by Mr Mitterrand.

On relations with Western Europe, Mr Marchais said that France must "meet its commitments which stem from its membership" in the Atlantic alliance. But he also called for "the simultaneous dissolution of the blocs." Mr Marchais said that the balance sheet of communist countries had been "globally positive." He blasted what he called a U.S.-initiated "anti-socialist campaign" led "in the name of human rights."

"That American President has a lot of nerve -- flanked by Margaret Thatcher, the assassin of Bobby Sands, and by a spokesman for fascist Turkish General (Kenan) Evren -- he was the master mind of an anti-Polish television show which was as ridiculous as it was odious," the party chief said.

On the communists' dwindling stature among the French left, Mr Marchais alleged that the results of last spring's elections, in which the party's share of the vote dropped from 22 to 15 percent, had "prolonged and accentuated a brutal tendency toward the erosion of our electoral influence." But despite the decline, Mr Marchais is widely expected to maintain the top party post before the conclusion of the congress on Sunday. He has served as French Communist chief since 1972. The French Communist Party counts 710,000 members, from a total French population of 53 million.

DEFENSE MINISTER REITERATES SUPPORT FOR SAUDIS

[Excerpt] [Question] What is the purpose of your [30 January] Saudi visit, and what is its significance in light of the fact that this is your first visit to the kingdom since you assumed the post of defense minister in the French Government?

[Answer] This visit is a friendly visit of a political nature and must be placed in the context of continuing work in the spirit of the Saudi-French summit talks of June and September last year, in Paris and Riyadh respectively. Thus the new meeting between the French and the Saudis shows that there are strong and vital relations between the Saudi Arabian kingdom and France. My talks with His Highness Amir Sultan will be another opportunity to continue with mutual confidence the friendly and useful dialogue between France and the Saudi Arabian kingdom.

[Question] What are the most important points that you intend to discuss with Saudi officials?

[Answer] There is no doubt that during our discussions many subjects of particular importance will be discussed, as is natural between ministers of two friendly countries. This means that we will discuss all issues of cooperation between the two countries and we will review the projects now being carried out in the Saudi Arabian kingdom and the progress made in their implementation, particularly naval armament projects. We will also discuss the question of cooperation in the military industry and of training cadres and technicians, to which the French and the Saudis attach great importance. I believe we will also discuss the situation in the Middle East and the French attitude in this regard.

This will give me the opportunity to discuss the basic principles on which our policy is based and which President Mitterrand has explained to Saudi officials. This policy is clear and is based on four principles:

First, ensuring the rights of all the peoples of the area, including the Palestinian people, who should be able to determine their own future -- which, of course, is to be done through establishing their own state on a basis of their own choosing.

Second, ensuring the security of every country in the area, including the Arab countries and Israel, so that after a comprehensive solution is found to the Middle East problem, each of these countries will live in peace.

Third, nonacceptance of any unilateral action which is contrary to international law and particularly to Security Council resolutions.

Fourth, the need to deal with problems through negotiations between the parties concerned including, of course, the Palestinians.

As you can see, France talks to all the parties in the same language, proceeding from a neutral and friendly stand based on principles and law. On this basis France intends to continue its work in the interest of peace and justice.

[Question] French-Saudi military cooperation has developed to a great extent in the past years. How do you view the future of this cooperation?

[Answer] As is known, French-Saudi cooperation in the military field is long-standing, varied and large in scale. France believes in the right of all the countries to safeguard their own security . In this light we understand and support the kingdom's desire to safeguard its security and protect its independence and interests as it wishes. Consequently, France intends to continue its cooperation with the kingdom and to develop it in the various military fields. We hope that this cooperation will not stop at the mere implementation of military contracts but will gradually expand to include industrial cooperation, in which greater concentration will be placed on manpower training. I believe that we should not hesitate to be more ambitious in everything between France and the Saudi Arabian kingdom.

CHEYSSON INTERVIEWED ON RELATIONS WITH JAPAN

NC031300 Paris AFP in English 1211 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 3 Feb (AFP) -- French Foreign Affairs Minister Claude Cheysson confirmed Wednesday President Francois Mitterrand's trip to Japan in April and told the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee that the voyage was of "exceptional interest" as "the first visit of a French head of state to this country." Mr Cheysson said it "will be an occasion to develop Franco-Japanese relations, mainly in industry and culture, and to expand the convergent fields of interest between two countries confronted with similar problems of access to natural resources."

Asked by committee president conservative Jean Lecanuet to comment on the Middle East, Mr Cheysson spoke of the "importance of the evacuation of the Sinai (by Israeli forces) since this operation is the beginning of applying (United Nations) Security Council Resolution 242 and a demonstration that negotiation in the Middle East can lead to results." He said France was contributing to this process by "agreeing to participate in the multilateral (peacekeeping) force in the Sinai."

On Poland, Mr Cheysson said that since "the coup of December 13" the Franch position had not varied, "France asking for the liberation of detainees, the lifting of martial law and the resumption of talks." He said France had decided "not to send an emissary to Warsaw nor to receive a special emissary from Warsaw as long as France's demands were not met."

PCI, CPSU: A STATE OF 'LEGAL SEPARATION'

[Editorial: "Mr Berlinguer's Blasphemy"]

[Text] For years the Italian and Soviet Communist Parties have virtually been living in a state of legal separation. Is a divorce going to be pronounced? The article which PRAVDA has just devoted to the latest stances taken by Mr Berlinguer and his party's leadership suggest that it is. The PCI leaders, the Soviet newspaper writes, are giving "direct assistance to imperialism." They are opposing world socialism.

Thus Togliatti's successor has been relegated to the category of communist leaders who have gone over to the enemy, like Tito, Mao or even Enver Hoxha, for the simple reason that at some point in their career they dared to attack Moscow.

The Italian communists' main crime is summed up in this phrase which PRAVDA applies to them: During the last Central Committee session they made "a truly sacreligious attempt" by maintaining that the USSR's foreign policy is no different from that of the United States.

The present quarrel has been sparked by the Polish crisis. Mr Berlinguer has not accepted a junta which has crushed the democratic movement in Poland, nor the USSR's support for that operation even if it did not control it from a distance. But the underlying reasons for the quarrel are much older than that. Like their French comrades, the Italian communists disapproved of the Warsaw Pact forces' intervention in Prague in 1968. But unlike Mr Marchais they also condemned the use of Vietnam in bringing Kampuchea back into line in 1979 and the Soviet troops' action in Afghanistan 1 year later. Until recently the Italian communists tried to preserve at least some appearances. No doubt they refused to recognize that the USSR had the merit of having conceived "the" model for socialism. Since Togliatti's days -- in 1956 -- they have maintained that the communist movement should be "polycentrist," which amounts to saying that it must leave each of its members virtually complete freedom as regards the building of socialism in their own countries. That concept is a far cry from the one defended by the Soviet ideologues. They advocate respect for "national characteristics" but the new builders can only show originality in the embellishments; the main structure should copy the plan established by Lenin because it has universal value.

The Italian communists and, generally speaking, those known as the "Eurocommunists" think differently. The methods which may have been useful in a developing society are harmful in a strongly-rooted democracy. The Polish crisis has given Mr Berlinguer and, moreover, Mr Carrillo, the opportunity to go much further. "Real socialism" has stopped being the holiest of holies that it was until Stalin's death for the Italian and Spanish communists and it is gradually turning into a hindrance. Last December Mr Berlinguer called into question not only Stalinism but also Marxism-Leninism. In practical terms the Soviet experiment is becoming the anti-model. Is the Soviet Union content to excommunicate? In Italy, as in Spain, the Kremlin is seeking "real communists."

FRANCE-SOIR VIEWS U.S.-FRG TROOP ACCORD

[Thierry Desjardins editorial]

[Text] Washington and Bonn are preparing to sign an agreement which will enable the United States to send 120,000 additional U.S. soldiers to West Germany "in periods of tension." Those 6 new divisions will therefore join the 200,000 GI's already stationed on the other side of the Rhine as soon as the two capitals agree that the situation has become "tense." This is a fundamental agreement which radically overturns the present facts of international politics.

Indeed, for several months we had been living with, on the one hand, Soviet troops which were being strengthened and were scoring points and, on the other hand, a free world which was, to say the least, defeatist. Young Europeans were only mobilizing to take part in pacifist and neutralist demonstrations and the United States, for its part, was beginning to be seduced by the temptations of the haughtiest isolationism. In theory pacifism is a very fine thing. Everybody dreams of peace. But as long as there are wolves, sheep will only be able to bleat before being devoured. There are probably excuses for isolationism. The United States has still not forgotten Vietnam and the ingratitude and even thoughtlessness which we were showing them was bound to prompt them to withdraw into themselves somewhat. But the free world's very survival prohibits any isolationism on the part of the United States, which is its self-appointed defender.

ULLSTEN SEES NO AGREEMENT ON BALTIC DEMARCATION

LD031500 Stockholm International Service in Swedish 1000 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Text] No agreement has been reached yet between Sweden and the Soviet Union on the demarcation of the Baltic. Sweden has not changed its stance to the effect that the demarcation must be drawn according to the median line between Gotland and the Baltic coast, despite the fact that the government has offered the Soviet Union certain modifications in order that some agreement may be reached on the whole, Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten said during the Riksdag question time. Center Party member Gunhild Bolander said she believes that there is no sympathy among the Swedish people for making any modifications. The Soviet Union holds the view that the fishing zones on the continental shelf should be divided along the median line between the Swedish mainland and the Baltic coast, in other words just east of Gotland.

NAVY 'PESSIMISTIC' ABOUT DEFENSE CREDIBILITY

[Text] The government has received a report from Supreme Commander Lennart Ljung on how Swedish coastal defenses may be strengthened following incidents such as the visit of the Russian 137 submarine to the Blekinge Archipelago, and on how such incidents may be avoided in the future. The basis of this report is an investigation conducted by the commander of the navy. The navy is demanding 500 million Swedish kronor [SKr] over a 5-year period in addition to the SKr200 million which the defense committee wants to allocate especially for strengthening the guarding of our long Swedish coastline. Here is Anders Thunberg:

[Thunberg] The report is marked "classified confidential," but it is no secret that the navy is deeply dissatisfied with what the supreme commander has for many years given top priority. When Sweden began to invest in the air force at the expense of the navy, the thinking among defense politicians and the military was that Sweden would acquire nuclear weapons of its own to compensate for the relative weakening of the navy. This is stated by Capt Sven Carlsson of the naval staff:

[Begin Carlsson recording] A defense resolution was adopted in 1958, and before that there had been discussion on whether Sweden should acquire nuclear weapons. In that discussion the possibilities of the navy making a contribution were deemed as substantially fewer than they had been earlier. The consequence was that the [word indistinct] share of the navy defense allocations decreased from more than 18 percent to more than 13 percent. We have had this situation since then, despite the fact that no nuclear weapons were acquired -- about which we can be glad -- and that in the world around us there has been a clear shift of emphasis toward naval units. [end recording]

[Thunberg] Sweden's ability to maintain its neutrality in peacetime is no longer credible: this is the pessimistic conclusion the navy has now reached following the submarine affair. Now the politicians and the public will be told that the SKr200 million with which the defense committee wants to strengthen the coastal defenses will yeild only a marginal improvement.

[Begin Carlsson recording] As regards the possibility of guarding and upholding our territory in peacetime, we do not have sufficient resources. We have priorities [words indistinct] roughly for the defense against invasion, in other words direct defense against invasion, and unfortunately have had to use them for an [?event] such as the hunt for the submarine. It will now take a long time before it is decided to regain what has been lost and to build these resources up again, although there are certain possibilities quickly [words indistinct]. [end recording]

COUNCIL OF EUROPE DELEGATIONS NO LONGER RECEIVED

[Text] It has been announced that it is now clear that visits to Turkey by Council of Europe delegations will yield no benefits; therefore these delegations will no longer be received. In his weekly news conference in Ankara today, Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman said Turkey has not left the Council of Europe; however, the bulk of relations with the council will from now on be shifted to the ministerial and delegates committees. Recalling that since last May Turkey has not in practice participated in the deliberations of the Council of Europe Consultative Assembly, Akiman noted that despite this, certain resolutions were adopted at the Consultative Assembly without Turkey's contribution. Akiman noted that this is why it is out of the question for Turkey to take these resolutions into consideration.

Pointing out that Turkey is trying to continue the dialogue with the Council of Europe and that numerous delegations have come to Turkey to this end, Akiman said: It has now become clear that there is no connection any longer between the conclusions reached by visiting delegations and the resolutions adopted by the assembly. The Consultative Assembly has not taken the observations of the delegations into consideration. Akiman noted that this originates from a group in the assembly trying to sever Turkey's ties with the council and of Greek parliamentarians who want systematically to exploit the Consultative Assembly against Turkey. Under these circumstances, he noted, it is obvious that the arrival of delegations from the Council of Europe will yield no practical benefit.

Answering a question on complaints to be lodged with the Council of Europe Human Rights Commission on the subject of Turkey, the Foreign Ministry spokesman said: The application that certain countries plan to submit on Turkey does not reflect concern for human rights from a legal viewpoint but a move emerging from internal politics. If these countries had reasons for concern originating from human rights and for complaints against Turkey based on sound foundations, they should have submitted their application at a time when an average of 20 persons were being killed daily in Turkey. Akiman recalled that there are attempts to make democracy fully operational in Turkey and that a schedule on this subject has been announced, adding: The voicing of these complaints at such a time clearly exposes the real intentions of these countries. Turkey has nothing to be offended about on the subject of human rights. Turkey is a nation of law and will continue to be so.

LEFTIST PARTIES MEET, AGREE ON JOINT ACTION

TA040801 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 4 Feb 82

[Joint statement issued by Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen, Labor Party leader Behice Boran and Socialist Workers Party leader Ahmet Kacmaz dated 4 February]

[Text] A meeting at the highest level was held among the Turkish Labor Party (TLP), the Turkish Communist Party (TCP) and the Turkish Socialist Workers Party [TSIP] in February 1982. The three parties discussed developments in the country and the international situation. They exchanged information about their parties, looked into problems concerning the political unity of the working class and concerning a broad front and looked into the possibilities of unity of action for concrete aims.

The three parties decided that from now on relations among them should be conducted in an organized way, that the political campaigns they have been conducting against the junta, imperialism and the monopolies should be carried out within the framework of a program that is coordinated as much as possible or united, and that foundations for a broad front be laid as soon as possible so the struggle can be spread and strengthened further.

The three parties decided that for this purpose the principles, areas and aims of the front should be determined and that all possible efforts must be exerted to include all the patriotic and democratic forces in this front. The three parties will carry out their joint work on the basis of equality.

The delegations of the three parties expressed all problems with sincerity. They established their differences of opinion regarding the issue of political unity. Each party is continuing to defend all the fundamental positions it has defended so far. The three parties have decided to organize joint symposiums on a number of ideological and political issues. The common belief of the three parties is that their differences of view will be eliminated within the framework of brotherly activities, within the struggles of the working masses and within the process of unity of action.

At the end of the meeting, the three parties approved a document entitled "Joint Appeal of the TLP, TCP and the TSIP."

ASSYRIAN COMMUNITY DENOUNCES ARMENIAN TERRORISM

TA031657 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Text] The administrative council of the Assyrian community in Mardin has issued a statement denouncing the attacks on Turkish diplomats by Armenian terrorist organizations. The statement says the community will not allow any power to disrupt its fraternal ties with the Turkish community and notes: There are allegations that we are also suppressed; this alleged oppression is given as yet another reason for the despicable Armenian terror and murders of Turkish diplomats in recent years. For centuries we have not been subject to any suppression by either the local people or the Turkish Government. We are members of the young republic. On behalf of our religious community, we denounce those Armenian terror organizations that are trying to portray us as a separate entity and the countries that voice the opinions of these organizations.

KURDS ARRESTED FOR IRAQI PIPELINE SABOTAGE

NC031444 Paris AFP in English 1409 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Ankara, 3 Feb (AFP) --Five Kurdish militants close to the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan led by Iraqi Kurd Jalal Talabani have been arrested in eastern Turkey and confessed to two attacks on an Iraqi pipeline, Turkish military officials said today. Sources at state of siege headquarters in Diyarbakir Province said the five had admitted their part in two attacks, in May 1979 and June 1980, on the pipeline carrying Iraqi oil from Kirkuk to the Turkish port of Iskenderun. The source said that one of the Kurdish militants had told investigators that Soviet-manufactured bombs had been supplied by Syrian militants in the patriotic union.

MARTIAL LAW TRIALS OF SEPARATIST GROUPS BEGIN

[Excerpts] Ankara, 3 Feb (AA) -- The trial of 136 members of the secessionist organization Partiya Karkere Kurdistane, also known as "Apoists," from the eastern province of Kars, began Wednesday at an Erzurum martial law court. The gang is charged with secessionist activity as well as with terrorist acts involving the murder of nine persons. In Diyarbakir, interrogation of defendants started in the trial of another separatist organization, National Liberators of Kurdistan.

In Ankara, the military prosecutor attached to the Martial Law Command started a lawsuit against 12 members of the separatist group "KAWA". The prosecutor also started legal proceedings against 15 members of the illegal organization calling itself Communist Party of the Workers' Voice on charges of violating Articles 141 and 17 of the Penal Code.

AKEL DENOUNCES PCI STAND ON POLISH SITUATION

[Excerpts] The Cyprus communist AKEL party has denounced the Italian Communist Party's stand on the Polish events. A statement issued yesterday by AKEL shows that the party's Political Bureau held a special meeting to consider the Italian attitude, which it sees as causing harm to the communist cause, especially since socialists have taken a stand against martial law in Poland. The AKEL party statement describes the American expression of concern for Poland as hypocritical, considering the U.S. stand on the regimes in Turkey, Chile and El Salvador, and deplores the Italian Communist attitude which, it says, serves only "imperialists and their reactionary plans."

PAPER ASKS WHO DICTATES COUNTRY'S FOREIGN POLICY

NC041000 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 4 Feb 82 p 3

[From the "Freely" column: "Who Dictates Our Foreign Policy?"]

[Excerpts] What Foreign Minister Rolandhis stated before the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee is not only preposterous, it is also proof of the irresponsibility, inefficiency and lack of seriousness of those who govern us. Rolandhis let it be understood that we are not pushing for restoration of our diplomatic relations with Egypt because this could displease Libya and Syria. On one hand Rolandhis' argument appears to be logical. But it is not convincing for the following reasons: 1) Whether we like it or not, Egypt is the largest Arab country, with which Cyprus maintained excellent relations until February 1978; 2) Syria and Libya are not examples to be followed or respected since both these countries openly support the Turks; these two would be among the first to support proclamation of a Turkist Cypriot "state", 3) Most important, who formulates our own foreign policy? Al-Qadhdafi or Al-Asad? If in fact our economy is brought to its knees because we restore relations with Egypt, isn't this an admission of failure of the government's economic policy? If we truly rely on these countries to the degree that Rolandhis says we do, isn't this proof of the government's inability to seek out other markets for our products?

PCI WEEKLY RESPONDS TO SOVIET CRITICISM OF STAND

LD032108 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 3 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The PCI weekly RINASCITA carries a long unsigned editorial on the current polemic between the PCI and the Kremlin leaders. RINASCITA reiterates the criticism of the method and substance of the harsh accusations launched by Moscow against the PCI. The method reminds one of the Cominform excommunication of the Yugoslav Communists in 1948. A method, RINASCITA writes, the PCI considers to be wrong. Another impropriety of the Soviets, the PCI weekly continues, lies in their knowledge of the ideas and choices of the Italian Communists, knowledge which is almost nonexistent and which profoundly distorts the image of the PCI.

The PCI does not want to be locked in a doctrinaire cage, although it considers Marx and Lenin as great revolutionary thinkers. Speaking of the Polish events, the PCI weekly recalls the condemnation expressed from the beginning of the military dictatorship and describes as a "distortion of reality" the accusation of anti-Sovietism launched by Moscow in connection with the PCI stance. What we challenge, RINASCITA writes, is the right to pass sentences from a high throne. The only opinion that is valid for us is the workers' opinion. While we do not accept thrones and excommunications, the PCI weekly concludes, we are available for a loyal debate on an equal basis.

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG BEFORE VOTE

DW051609 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1400 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Speech by FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at Bundestag debate in Bonn prior to vote of confidence -- live]

[Excerpts] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen: With the right given to the Federal Chancellor by Article 68 of the Basic Law, on Wednesday I requested a vote of confidence. Before the Bundestag members decide on this today, I would like to justify my motion. When Willy Brandt asked for a vote of confidence in May 1972 for the first time ever, it was a matter of clearing the way for new elections of all deputies due to a change of majorities which was not caused by the voters, but by the fact that several deputies had changed factions at that time.

This time, however, the vote of confidence deals with something quite different, namely, giving a signal of clarity to our citizens who have a right to clarity in difficult times, as well as to the international public. [applause] Those who voted for the Social Democrats and the Free Democrats on 5 October 1980 because they wanted the policy of the Social-Liberal coalition to be continued need the certainty that the government will really carry out its mandate for 4 years -- carry it out with the support of a solid parliamentary majority of both parties, the SPD and the FDP. [applause]

Our allies in the West must also have clarity as to where they stand with regard to the Federal Republic. The states in the East, with whom the SPD has signed treaties and with whom it seeks reconciliation and compromise, must also know where they stand. [laughter] Our partners in the Third World must have no doubt that our policy with its fair balance of interests will be continued. [applause] The necessary clarity has not always existed in an adequate way in past weeks and months. [applause, laughter]

There has been speculation about the course of peace and security policies. Indeed, some events have sometimes indeed created an unclear image with regard to the course of the Federal Government and the cohesion of the Social-Liberal coalition. Nobody in the coalition can claim that he is absolutely innocent in this connection. The consideration of less competent people as to whether the Social-Liberal coalition was an alliance or a marriage of convenience have created confusion. All such considerations are beside the point. The Social-Liberal coalition supports the continuation of a policy implemented by Willy Brandt and Walter Scheel which has been continued by Hans-Dietrich Genscher and myself, a policy which was fought by the CDU/CSU then and today, a policy aimed at a dialogue and cooperation with the East, at preservation of social peace, at safeguarding jobs and the social network [laughter] and at economic efficiency. [laughter, applause]

Today's vote is supposed to make the common way obvious to everybody again -- to everybody counting on the Social-Liberal coalition and also to those hoping to oust us from the position of responsibility. No industrial country, including communist and developing countries, has been able to resist the pressure of adapting to the new worldwide economic conditions. No matter which forces or parties bear responsibility in the various governments of the different states, the challenge to all governments is the same, namely, the struggle against unemployment, the containment of inflation, structural change and modernization of production, preservation of free trade, and the gradual reduction of the excessive domestic interest rate level. [applause] The Federal Government is facing the same challenges; it does not propose to dodge these challenges.

Together with the economic contortions of the world, international relations at present are exposed to hard tests, especially regarding the East-West relationship.

Developments which are intended to promote human rights and peaceful changes are being forcibly suppressed. The trails already blazed to dialogue, understanding and negotiation are threatened with destruction by new hotbeds of conflict. The danger of a worldwide arms race exists. In this world situation the Federal Republic has had to reassure itself again of its position, interests and political options. The result is the retention of the course of the Social-Liberal Federal Government. [applause] The course is not intended for weeks or months, but is designed for a long-term basis.

Only a very few of the more than 160 countries in the world economy would not like to change places with the Germans with regard to employment, price stability and standard of living. The Federal Republic has so far succeeded in better coping with these problems than its comparable partners in the world economy. [applause] In stating this we cannot lie back with satisfaction: In stating this we must rather become aware of the extent and character of the international challenge to national, economic and financial policies. Anyone closing his eyes to the fact that the Federal Republic, the world's number two trading nation, cannot screen itself against either the world economic recession or the worldwide high interest level, may be culpably committing serious mistakes.

The strongly increasing unemployment in all Western industrial countries is additionally influenced in our case by high birthrate pressures on the labor market. This necessitates a concerted action by all people, groups and institutions bearing responsibility in the economy and society. In connection with its discussion of the annual economic report for this year, the Federal Government adopted a common initiative for jobs, growth and stability. This decision represents the second part of an overall program whose first part, also referred to as Operation 82, had already been adopted last year and became effective at the beginning of this year. By Operation 82 both the Bundestag and the Federal Government adopted measures for the improvement of the economic structure and for employment. These measures are worth nearly DM28 billion for the 1982-85 period. Together with the joint initiative now adopted, a total of DM40 billion in financing funds will be available for the purpose of helping solve structural problems and problems of the labor market.

Irrespective of the measures decided by the government, it is the conviction of the Federal Government that the most effective step toward creating jobs at this time would be a clear and permanent decline in interest rates. In mapping out the budget for 1982 within our own national economy, the Federal Government pursues the goal of creating the preconditions for this, that is for the decline in interest rates. We will not change this course. This is why we do not intend to finance state investment grants by means of additional state borrowing; this is why we must continue to advocate the reduction in the trade and services deficit in the German balance of payments and, thanks to an excellent export development, this process is well underway. [applause]

On several occasions in the history of the Federal Republic we have seen that we can measure up to great challenges, provided we view them as tasks confronting all and which, therefore, can be managed only in concerted action and in solidarity. [applause] In my appeal I list, foremost of all, the trade unions. From this rostrum I would like to thank the DGB for having enlightened the public about the extent and the character of the challenge in labor market policy. [applause] The trade unions once again lived up to a responsibility which they have often exercised in the past for the development of our state, namely, acting as the free and responsible representatives of the workers and employees. We would never have succeeded in attaining the high level of competitiveness of our German industry without our free and uniform trade unions. [applause] At the same time, I call on the enterpreneurs and the managements of companies to contribute their share by showing courage to invest and by exercising price discipline. [applause] Surely it is true for enterprises and trade unions alike that both will have to make allowances for our tight economic situation in the year's wage agreements. I want to call most urgently on the industry, the medium and small enterprises, retail trade and the artisan trade to make every effort to create new apprentice and training openings. [applause]

By the same token we expect the Federal Bank to extend its support to this initiative. It should contribute by working for payment times [der obere zielkorridor] in its monetary policy and to actually utilize margins resulting from international developments to reduce interest rates. [applause] I call likewise on every individual citizen in this country: We will be able to measure up to the challenges jointly if and when everyone is prepared to carry his share of inevitable cutbacks together in the interests of the community. This applies to pensioners, workers and employees, public servants and farmers alike.

I appeal seriously to all three factions to see that the Bundestag also does not shirk from a common initiative for jobs, growth and stability. This requires the speedy implementation of the legislative projects. [applause] It is often not easy to ask for something. This is particularly hard to do now when in a number of CDU/CSU ruled Laender, rash actions seem to have been taken. Refusal and rejection cannot be the last work of these land governments. [applause] This is why in the interests of our country, and its future, and in the interests of our social peace I also appeal to the Bundesrat, asking it to make its contribution and not hinder the necessary legislation. [prolonged applause] Any further prolonging of the public debate would be harmful to economic development and investments. [applause]

The political line on which I ask the Bundestag today to renew its confidence applies not only to economic and labor market policy. The question of confidence likewise applies to the foreign policy course of the Federal Government, which I head, and to its security and peace policy. [shouts, applause] Ever since the introduction of an active Ostpolitik through the first Social-Liberal government this course has been clearly marked out. Our line, however, not only constitutes German policy but is also the common policy of the alliance, which was developed in the alliance with our rather substantial cooperation and which is borne jointly in the alliance. [applause] It is based on the defense capability and the defense readiness of the alliance and at the same time on the readiness for dialogue with the East and the will for cooperating. Nothing has changed here even though there have been repeated changes of government in all of our Western partner countries. We have contributed in the partnership-like alliance to cultivating the two component parts of the alliance's policy and we continue to do so. In this it was inevitable that continuity in international relations sometimes was subject to severe tests. The Federal Government's course sometimes also met with misunderstandings and I appeal to every Bundestag member not to provide any food for thought to such misinterpretations. [applause] Our peace policy aimed at military balance as well as dialogue and readiness for cooperation has met with criticism from abroad, too. We take notice of this without regret and also without overrating ourselves.

There can be no doubt of our firm position in the community of peoples united in the alliance. What we see in this alliance is not simply an insurance policy on a basis of reciprocity, but above all the association of free peoples with a common concept of values and objectives. This also includes the freedom of economic initiative, the freedom of criticism and countercriticism, and the freedom of workers and employees to unite for the promotion of their own interests. We know that with these freedoms only a just and solid society can be strived for, a society which can preserve a lasting peace inwardly and secure it outwardly. [applause]

The Federal Government knows that its elbow-room and its weight in the field of foreign policy depend on the political strength of the alliance as well as on the role played by the Federal Republic in the alliance. This is why we make our political positions clear in the alliance and coordinate (our actions) with our partners. It is one of the special merits of Foreign Minister Genscher that this has been achieved to a large degree. [prolonged applause]

Latest misunderstandings concerned our stance toward Poland. In the meantime it has been understood everywhere that in our solidarity with the Polish people we Germans are not inferior to anybody in the world. [applause] This is in line with our concepts of human dignity and human rights and it is also expressive of the German-Polish history laden with guilt. Former German guilt is committing Germany today to be moderate in tone.

No indignation can change anything in the power ratio of our Europe divided into blocs. No indignation can change anything about the fact that great armament potentials are confronting each other here in Europe. There exists nothing but the means of negotiations so as to achieve a turning back of the trend toward ever new weapons and ever new annihilation means. [applause] What is needed for negotiations is to expound one's own position with all clearness but also to never allow any doubt to be cast one's readiness for negotiations. Security can be achieved only through binding treaties. Treaties are acceptable and durable only if they stipulate military balance. Durable treaties must be aimed at an as low as possible military level. And the prerequisite for negotiations is the will for a dialogue and the will for a balance. The prerequisite for treaties is an equilibrium. This is the sense of security partnership. [applause]

We adhered to this line also in the talks with General Secretary Brezhnev. It was only by embarking on this road that the Geneva negotiations were achieved, which are aimed at mitigating or removing the serious threat against the Federal Republic through Soviet medium-range missiles. The Geneva negotiations would neither have been started at all nor would they have any prospects for success without the Brussels dual decision. [applause] Events since then have made it even more obvious that this decision is the expression appropriate to the problems of the North Atlantic alliance's basic line, namely to safeguard one's own military security on the one hand and to strive for negotiations and agreement with the East on the other. I welcome the fact that President Reagan this week submitted to the Soviet side a draft treaty for a mutual zero solution. This is in the German interest as well and we Germans had proposed it this way. [applause] The Federal Government pursues its peace-policy course with a sense of proportion but also with steadfastness and reliability. I know that in this we can reckon with a rather large maj ity of the Germans. [applause] I ask for confidence. I ask for confidence in my foreign and domestic policy continuity and reliability. I ask for confidence for the Federal Government jointly borne by the factions of the Social Democrats and the Free Democrats. [prolonged applause] Please show that we do not think of wavering even in rough weather but that we, like a compass needle, are heading unswervingly toward the same common goal, regardless of where we start from. [prolonged applause]

Vote of Confidence

LD051656 Hamburg DPA in German 1642 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 5 Feb (DPA) -- As expected, the German Bundestag expressed its confidence in Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. Altogether 269 deputies supported the chancellor's policies in the vote. Two hundred forty-nine votes are required for an absolute majority. In the Bundestag the SPD has 216, the FDP 53 and the CDU/CSU 226 votes at its disposal. After the counting was finished, Bundestag President Richard Stuecklen said that deputies had voted against.

Office Corrects Voting Figure

[Text] [No dateline received] During the vote of confidence only 225 members of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group fully entitled to vote were present and they all voted against. The Bundestag president's office confirmed tonight a correction of the voting result. It transpired that indisposed CDU Deputy Matthias Wissmann was not present after all. The 226th vote against was that of the 22 Berlin deputies who had, however, no full voting right.

FDP Chairman Pledges Support

LD051638 Hamburg DPA in German 1609 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 5 Feb (DPA) -- Just as Schmidt and Brandt had done before him, FDP Parliamentary Group Chairman Wolfgang Mischnick pledged full support for the continuation of the Social-Liberation coalition.

"We will continue this coalition with fairness and mutual consideration," he said. There are good reasons for the Free Democrats to vote for the chancellor in the vote of confidence. The most important is the "joint securing of our policy aimed at peace and understanding."

Schmidt Foresees Cooperation

DW081109 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2100 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Reporter Hans-Joachim Reiche interview with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn on 5 February -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] How do you feel tonight? Like a winner?

[Answer] Winner would be a bit too much, but I am very pleased because the joint declaration of confidence by all members of both coalition factions is naturally a very good basis for political work in 1982.

[Question] How long will such a vote have an effect?

[Answer] Such a vote of confidence is unusual, at least in the German parliament -- there are other parliaments in West Europe where it happens more frequently -- and it is not a decision on individual matters. It was not a vote on a bill, but on the policy principles and on a person. The vote made all members of the Social Democratic faction and all members of the Free Democratic faction aware that their quarrels, both within their own faction and with the other coalition faction, are dangerous. I think that this will provide an incentive for all of us, and I do not exclude myself, to cooperate a bit more with each other.

[Question] Will such votes possibly be necessary more often in the future in the political life of our country?

[Answer] No, I don't think so.

[Question] Certainly not everybody was pleased by the subject involved -- the employment program -- and both sides had to compromise. Are there any scars as a result, perhaps with you and Mr Genscher?

[Answer] No, I don't think so, certainly not as far as Mr Genscher and I are concerned. I do not think there are any scars on other participants either. However, some of them had to give up ideas they liked very much. That pertains to both sides, and both sides had to accept steps they would not have made if they had been alone. I also wasn't able to implement something I would have very much liked to if had I been alone, namely additional taxes for those earning a lot of money.

[Question] If the Bundesrat were to block the bill because of the added value tax, would you then once again discuss other financing possibilities?

[Answer] I don't like to discuss hypothetical questions -- what would be if? I assume in this case that Minister-President Albrecht and Minister-President Stoltenberg in Schleswig-Holstein will thoroughly consider whether with their veto they want to cause the collapse of a program for creating jobs, growth and stability. So far just one person has spoken up loudly, claiming to speak on behalf of all others. The others have observed restraint so far.

[Question] Mr Stoltenberg was also very outspoken, yet you are optimistic the bill could pass?

[Answer] I consider it possible, or rather, likely.

[Question] You have actually appealed to everyone?

[Answer] I have forgotten a group in the heat of the argument. I wanted to most clearly ask the Laender and communities to use the means they will now be getting for the construction of more low income housing.

[Question] You have approached everybody, even the partners in wage negotiations because you consider this to be most urgent?

[Answer] That is true,the export successes we are now having are urgently needed for all of 1982. They must even increase. The two main factors in international competition which cause high costs are high interest rates in the world -- ours are lower than those abroad -- and high wages -- ours are higher than those abroad. I have, therefore, appealed to both sides this year to be aware in the sage discussions that the leeway we have is not very great.

MUBARAK MEETS WITH PRESIDENT, SEEKS SUPPORT

[Text] Bonn, 7 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Republic of Germany will support any Middle East peace plan based on the renunciation of force and which realizes both the rights of the Palestinians and the security requirements of all states of that region, including Israel, German President Karl Carstens told the Egyptian head of state Husni Mubarak today at the beginning of 2 days of talks in Bonn. Earlier, Mubarak had discussed in Rome, Paris, Washington and London the possibilities for continuing the Egyptian-Israeli peace process and increased Western economic aid for his country.

During a luncheon given for the Egyptian President, Carstens said that the impending withdrawal by Israel from the Sinai Peninsula and reestablishment of full sovereignty by Egypt over the whole of its territory is an important step forward for realization of the U.N. Middle East resolutions. The federal president referred to the continuing willingness of the EC countries to help work on guarantees for a comprehensive, just and lasting Middle East solution. The Middle East statements of 1980 in Venice and Luxembourg, in which the EC countries formulated their principles for the peace process in the Middle East, were intended to safeguard that which had been achieved and to make possible further progress.

"Our support is available for all efforts at reconciliation among the states of the Arab world whose independence, autonomy and genuine nonalignment we are keenly interested in," Carstens said, "striving for hegemony and interference from outside endanger peace: stability, based on balance, secures peace." The federal president underlined in his address that Bonn and its EC partners support Israel's right to existence in secure and recognized borders.

Mubarak Hails Dialogue

[Excerpts] Bonn, 7 Feb (DPA) -- Egyptian President Husni Mubarak paid tribute today in Bonn to the permanent dialogue between Cairo and Bonn as a "cornerstone of our policy" and spoke in favor of expanding cooperation between the two countries in all fields. Mubarak also received assurance from Federal President Karl Carstens that the Federal Republic of Germany supports to the best of its ability the Egyptian peace policy and wants to strengthen economic cooperation.

The meeting between the two heads of state marked the start of 2 days of talks by the Egyptian president in Bonn. On Sunday afternoon Mubarak received in his residence in Schloss Gymnich near Bonn the chairman of the CSU, Franz Josef Strauss.

At a luncheon, Mubarak pointed out agreement in the German and Egyptian attitude and stressed the FRG's "extremely constructive role" in the European Community. The Egyptian president invited Carstens to pay a visit. In Bonn some 5,000 demonstrators, mainly Turks, protested against alleged persecutions of Muslims in Egypt.

[Text] Bonn, 7 Feb (MENA) -- President Karl Carstens held a luncheon ceremony today in honour of Egyptian President Husni Mubarak and his accompanying delegation currently on a visit to West Germany. The Egyptian president delivered a word marking the occasion. President Mubarak said:

Dear Federal President, Mrs Carstens, Dear Friends: We are very pleased to be here again among friends. Whenever we come to your great country we feel the depth of the friendship that exists between our nations. You have been a good friend of Egypt and its people under all circumstances. We appreciate your help and understanding. Your role in the European Community is a most constructive one. As you know President as-Sadat had a soft spot for the Federal Republic, its people and its leadership. This admiration and affection are shared by all Egyptians. The talks we held an hour ago demonstrated the similarity of our views. We are both committed to peace all over the world. We believe that the prosperity and security are linked to stability in the Middle East.

I am sure that the talks we will hold during this visit with your Chancellor Schmidt, and your colleagues will strengthen the ties between our two nations. We want to intensify our cooperation in all fields. I would like to invite you, Mr President, to visit Egypt with Mrs Carstens to renew the bonds of our friendship and affinity. Our friend Minister Genscher has not been in Egypt for four months, which is a long time. This continued dialogue and exchange among us is one of the cornerstones of our policy. Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to invite you to rise in a tribute to President and Mrs Carstens and Mr and Mrs Genscher and all our friends in the Federal Republic.

Discusses Mideast With Kohl

LD071920 Hamburg DPA in German 1855 GMT 7 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 7 Feb (DPA) -- CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl this evening met Egyptian State President Husni Mubarak for a 1-hour talk. After the talk a CDU spokesman said that both men agreed that peaceful developments in the Middle East are a central contribution to world peace. They agreed that West European states should contribute jointly to stability in the Middle East. The spokesman said that, apart from the subject of the Middle East, bilateral questions were also discussed.

Genscher Talk 'Constructive'

NC072220 Cairo MENA in English 2145 GMT 7 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 7 Feb (MENA) -- Egyptian President Husni Mubarak had an hour-long meeting this evening with West German Deputy Chancellor and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The talks were constructive and useful and were conducted in a cordial atmosphere, the official spokesman of the Foreign Ministry said. He said that the meeting was held between two friends and dealt with different political issues, mainly the Middle East, development of the situation in Iran, and the exportation of the German arms.

President Husni Mubarak briefed Genscher on the outcome of his talks in Washington, expounded Egypt's position in regard to self-rule. The Foreign Ministry spokesman said independence and right to self-determination in Poland has also been stressed by Genscher, who added that the Polish problem stresses that the Soviet Union finds itself against a strong international attitude, the spokesman said.

The spokesman affirmed that the Egyptian side has not expressed its interest in obtaining any German arms, stressing that the philosophy of the foreign German policy is based on supporting forces in the world, particularly the Third World countries to gain their independence and right to self-determination.

Exchanges Views With Schmidt

LD081010 Hamburg DPA in German 0953 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 8 Feb (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Egyptian President Husni Mubarak met in Bonn on Monday for a wide-ranging exchange of views, in which the situation in the Middle East and German-Egyptian cooperation were probably the main areas of concern. After the meeting the chancellor intends to give a luncheon for the Egyptian head of state, who has been in Bonn since Sunday for political talks. Mubarak plans to fly to Vienna in the early afternoon. Prior to his meeting with the chancellor, Mubarak received Deputy SPD Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski for a talk. On Sunday the Egyptian president called for the development of cooperation between Bonn and Cairo on all levels.

GENSCHER MEETS WITH IRANIAN COUNTERPART IN BONN

LD051406 Hamburg DPA in German 1258 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 5 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today received his Iranian counterpart, 'Ali Akbar Velayati, in Bonn for a 1-hour, unscheduled talk. According to the Foreign Office, Genscher expressed the Federal Government's concern at the death sentences passed in Iran and mentioned Bonn's initiative at the United Nations for worldwide abolition of the death sentence. The talk focused on the development of German-Iranian relations. Both ministers said they were interested in expanding relations between Bonn and Iran, the Foreign Office stated. It said that with the talk, Genscher continued the exchange of views that he had had on 8 October with Velayati's predecessor in office, present Prime Minister Mir Hoseyn Musavi.

CZECH CONSTRUCTION MINISTER ENDS VISIT

LD051324 Hamburg DPA in German 1330 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 5 Feb (DPA -- CSSR Minister of Construction Karel Polak ended his 4-day visit to the Federal Republic today. He invited Federal Minister for Construction Dieter Haack (SPD) to visit Prague. According to the Ministry of Construction, Polak had talks in Bonn and visited the Constructa exhibition in Hanover. The talks focused on, among other things, possibilities for cooperation between Czech and German construction companies on third markets.

MAUROY, CHERNENKO DISCUSS POLISH SITUATION

NC061202 Paris AFP in English 1154 GMT 6 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 6 Feb (AFP) -- France mourns the loss of freedom in Poland, French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy told Konstantin Chernenko, the second-ranking member of the Soviet communist party, a French spokesman said today after a meeting between the two officials. Mr Chernenko, who was in Paris for the current 24th congress of the French Communist Party, found Mr Mauroy's attitude towards Poland "exaggerated," the spokesman said after the meeting at Mr Mauroy's official residence. The Soviet leader also voiced surprise that France should formulate "political conditions for the development of trade exchanges between the two countries," the spokesman said.

Mr Mauroy told Mr Chernenko that France rejected the idea of an economic blockade of Poland. But he also said he wanted "the Soviet Union to be informed of France's concern for human rights everywhere, in the Soviet Union as well as in El Salvador and Turkey." While emphasizing the deterioration of international events, particularly over Afghanistan, Mr Mauroy said France still put its hopes in detente and cooperation. He said France expected the Soviet Union to make "significant gestures" to improve the situation.

The spokesman said Mr Chernenko had underlined the "importance of personal and direct links and conversations." He pointed to difficulties in achieving good political relations, and said economic and commercial cooperation was going "rather well." Mr Chernenko said his country was continuing its "struggle for peace" and that recent Soviet disarmament proposals were "sincere with no ulterior motives."

Mr Mauroy said that while the two sides differed in their analysis of the international situation and in political matters, France was "willing to do its part in detente and cooperation with the Soviet Union." Mr Chernenko said that the "great frankness" of his talks with Mr Mauroy was proof of the friendship between the French and Soviet people.

MARCHAIS REELECTED PCF SECRETARY GENERAL

[Excerpts] The PCF congress at Saint-Ouen is ending. This is the last day of this 24th congress. At this very moment, I have learned that Georges Marchais has been reelected secretary general of the PCF. But within the Political Bureau there is a surprise: Georges Seguy is no longer a member of the Political Bureau. I immediately call Michel Lemaire in Saint-Ouen:

Yes, of course, the reelection of Georges Marchais is not a surprise. It has just taken place. After that, the replacement of Georges Seguy on the Political Bureau is a surprise. Georges Seguy was replaced on the Political Bureau by Jean Claude Gessault, a worker from the national railroads company and a member of the General Confederation of Workers. There was also another trade unionist elected to the Political Bureau: Louis [name indistinct] who belongs to the Mail Workers Federation.

As for the Central Committee Secretariat, Andre Lajoinie joins it. He is chairman of the Communist group in the National Assembly and is close to Georges Marchais. On the other hand, Jean Colpin leaves the Secretariat.

There was no surprise in the elections to the Central Committee of 145 members; there are 12 new members.

DISSIDENT PCF ORGAN ASKED TO CARRY PRAVDA ITEM

PM051513 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Jan 82 p 3

[Text] Vladislav Shevchenko, director of the Soviet information office in Paris, has asked the RENCONTRES COMMUNISTES HEBDO editorial board to publish the full translation of the PRAVDA article replying to the PCI. RECONTRES COMMUNISTES HEBDO will publish that text in its 30 January issue, just as it published the full translation of the PCI document on Poland in its 23 January issue. This official Soviet approach to communists opposed by the PCF leadership is somewhat surprising. It is true that L'HUMANITE, which had not printed the PCI document, only carried a few lines on the PRAVDA article on 25 January and on the L'UNITA reply on 27 January.

PREMIER MAUROY INTERVIEWED ON DOMESTIC POLICIES

PM051531 Paris LE MONDE in French 2 Feb 82 p 8

[Unattributed report on 31 January Luxembourg Radio and Television interview with Premier Pierre Mauroy]

[Text] Appearing on the Luxembourg Radio and Television-LE MONDE "Grand Jury" program 31 January, Mr Pierre Mauroy began by reviewing the three tasks entrusted to the government by the president. The first tasks -- which he says have been successfully completed -- related to the transition from one set of policies to a different set. "People were proclaiming," he said, "that the left would mean inflation at 25 percent. I think that, for the first time in France's history, the left means change without disruption -- without disruption from the economic viewpoint, from the monetary viewpoint and from the viewpoint of inflation."

The second task is to embark on a new policy, particularly in the economic and social sphere. "Of course," he stated, "thoroughness will be needed and it will take time before the policy can be appreciated. The government has set a timetable; I hope we will be able to reverse the trend in unemployment by the end of 1982. Since the people will go to the polls in March 1983 to elect their mayors and municipal councillors and also their regional presidents and regional councillors, I think they will be able to see the affects of new policy of the new president and the government."

The third task is to "direct the change": "To direct the change is simply to get all the laws adopted and all the drafts adopted in the forms in which they were announced by the president himself, in the forms chosen by the people." Mr Mauroy finds that "things are not moving fast enough in this regard," and he adds: "In order to direct the change it was absolutely essential, not to move too quickly, but to organize the basis of the change -- in other words, to get the structural reforms passed. The structural reforms are the laws relating to decentralization and the nationalizations.

"This has taken us a lot of time, too much time; there has been parliamentary harassment in an attempt to stop our process of change. No one can stop it, but it has taken us too long.... The Constitutional Council also held us up. There is also the new issue of confidence in the government.... We have adopted the decree system solely to expedite the changes. Now, it's true, one and sometimes two decrees have been adopted every week since the beginning of the year. These decrees -- shortening the work week, specific contracts, temporary work -- affect ordinary life. We're going to continue by lowering the retirement age to 60 and permitting a system of early retirement, which will be very important in the fight against unemployment. Each week there will be a decree, which is naturally going to affect people in their daily lives. True, I think it's a bit late, 8 months after our election. I would have preferred to do it sooner, but that wasn't possible, for the reasons I have pointed out."

Relations With Communist Ministers

Mr Mauroy listed everything that remains to be done and pointed out: "It's a lot, I have talked with the president and I'm going to talk with the presidents of the National Assembly and of the Senate, as well as with the majority and the opposition parliamentary groups, because 1982 will be marked by a legislative workload without parallel in the history of the Third Republic -- so that we can organize the changes so that they are accepted and voted through by the National Assembly and the Senate and can be progressively implemented. "I think -- to finish with the subject -- that the main elements of the changes should be completed by the beginning of 1982.... It is a question of not being delayed, as we have been, and of ensuring that the changes can be steadily implemented." The premier stated that the government is not planning to reform the constitution.

In connection with the transport card for the Paris region (the orange card), Mr Mauroy went on to speak of the Communist ministers (LE MONDE for 31 January and 1 February). He stressed the quality of Mr Fiterman's speech at the last Council of Ministers session regarding the problem of transportation in the Paris region, but stated that the issue of finance has not been settled. He added: "Mr Fiterman has one idea for financing the orange card. A number of justifications can be found for his proposal, but, as premier, I have clearly stated that there will be no aggravation of the burden on enterprises in view of their difficulties and the need to resume investment.

"Mr Fiterman is not the first minister and will not be the last to think about this reform, and to submit it to the Council of Ministers. When the reform is adopted by the Council of Ministers, the minister in question wants to see it implemented as swiftly as possible, so he makes a suggestion for financing it. Of course, the premier must play his role of bandmaster and take into account the economic situation, economic problems and promises that have been made.... The Communists are backing the government action, and there is no problem here.

"This is why we were all agreed in accepting his proposals regarding transport, but we thought it premature to pass the expenses on to enterprises."

Mr Mauroy then replied to the criticisms voiced by Mr Krasucki, secretary of the CGT (LE MONDE for 31 January 31 and 1 February). "He thinks," he declared, "that the changes are not proceeding fast enough. We are at present in a kind of no man's land, because the changes have pretty much been initiated, but France is not yet experiencing the changes for the reasons I have just explained. Some people are worrying because things are moving too fast, and others think we ought to speed things up. So I'm inclined to think that the government is at some kind of median point and is conducting the changes at a satisfactory pace that the government itself wants to accelerate, for the reasons I have outlined." The premier said that in his letter to Mr Krasucki about Renault, he had recalled, "that negotiations are proceeding under satisfactory conditions that fall within the framework of government directives and they should result without delay in a solidarity contract." So far as purchasing power is concerned, he admitted that the government is demanding great prudence from trade union organizations.

Soviet Gas

Generally, Mr Mauroy thinks that the leftwing experience is proceeding in "a perfectly satisfactory climate" and "hopes that the Socialists will really get their voters out to vote, and the communists will do likewise" in the upcoming elections. "It is a question," he said, "of maintaining the high level of turnout in last June's parliamentary elections, which would be the greatest possible success for the government. Everyone realizes that if you reduce the number of votes for one component of the current majority, you are weakening that majority. I don't want a weakened majority; on the contrary, I want a strengthened majority."

Mr Mauroy was asked about the gas contract with the USSR. "If you're trying to get me to say that the timing was not particularly good," he declared, "I'm entirely in agreement. But technical problems follow a calendar that does not always coincide with the political calendar of major world events.... We believe that to suspend trade and to embark on the road of an economic blockade would be, in short, to opt for an act of war. I'm not saying these problems couldn't arise if we found ourselves in a situation even more serious than the present one. Anyhow — as I've already emphasized to the nation's representatives -- we didn't want to go that far.... We will defend our country's security and independence; we will also evaluate political developments by what happens or does not happen in Poland and elsewhere. So we will be perfectly capable at any moment of calling trade exchanges into question, particularly the gas agreement."

The premier also stated: "When we meet with our partners again in Madrid (the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe), it's likely -- because the French viewpoint seems to be prevailing -- that we will be politically tough to ensure that a label of democracy or pseudo-democracy is not given to those who do not deserve it, who flout human rights and freedom."

"The recovery is here," the premier said, pointing out that 3-percent growth would make it possible to create 100,000-150,000 of the 250,000 new jobs to be created each year; the remainder will come from a policy of work-sharing with a target of a 35-hour week. "Chancellor Schmidt, who used to be skeptical," Mr Mauory stated, "asked during my talks with him last Friday that this important problem be placed on the agenda of the next summit of heads of state and prime ministers." The premier continued: "I'm sure that the recovery is going to be a reality; at any rate, we're going to take every measure to do everything to ensure this. I certainly hope to suceed. The first successes we have scored are already interesting the Germans, and I hope they will also interest the British."

Mr Mauroy concluded by speaking about television. "The government," he said, "has changed the chairmen but has not wanted to stage a witch hunt, so television is now essentially the result of the work of journalists, producers and performers. It's true that everybody in television and radio too has a mission to fulfill before, and for the people. It is precisely because I think this mission is not being fulfilled in a completely satisfactory fashion that, quite simply, I would like to meet with the chairmen to tell them that the debate about this point must be continuous, that people must be demanding and that everyone working in television must work to ensure that television improves."

INTENSIVE ANTITERRORIST OPERATION CONTINUING

[Text] Rome, 6 Feb (ANSA) -- Up and down the peninsula, Italian anti-terrorist forces have uncovered arms caches and hideouts and arrested suspected members of subversive groups, and the operation is still in full swing. Around forty suspected terrorists have been nabbed so far, deposits of arms and munitions have been found in the central Umbrian and northern Veneto regions, and Red Brigades and Front Line hideouts have been located in Catanzaro in the south and in Catania and Actrezza in Sicily.

Investigators placed special importance on the arms discovered in the Veneto town of Volpago del Montello. They believe that this cache was used by the BR's "Ludmann" column held responsible for the kidnapping of U.S. NATO General James Lee Dozier on December 17 in Verona. Dozier was freed by anti-terrorist police on January 28 in a spectacularly efficient raid on the Padua apartment where the general was being held captive. Among the weapons found in this cache were three land-to-air missiles and 3 powerful anti-tank rockets. The weapons were wrapped in Italian newspapers and in several copies of the Egyptian daily AL AHRAM dated 3 August 30, 1979 investigators said. It is believed that the terorists received these weapons in September 1979 when a load of arms was brought to Mestre by sea from the Middle East by Mario Moretti (a BR leader arrested last year). The delivery was apparently divided up among terrorist groups at that time, investigators said, with a part going to the Ludmann column.

UIL union official Luigi Scriciolo, who along with his wife Paola was arrested Thursday on charges of membership in the Red Brigades terrorist organization, has not yet been interrogated. He is head of UIL's international office and the union has promised a press conference on reports that it has been infiltrated by terrorist elements.

Meanwhile, investigations were pointed at an Ancona psychiatrist named Massimo Gidoni who was arrested two days ago on charges of illegally bringing arms into the country and of belonging to an armed gang. According to press leaks, Gidoni made several trips to Cyprus and back on his sailboat in the summer of 1979 to supply northern Red Brigades groups with arms which included bazookas and machine guns. These revelations were reportedly made by Antonio Savasta, one of the five terrorists arrested in Padua during the police raid that freed Dozier. Over recent days there have been insistent rumors that Savasta, a hardline brigadist who is said to have boasted of 17 murders, was spilling all he knew to investigators. Gidoni, on the other hand is said not to be willing to cooperate with police.

COMMUNISTS' ROLE IN GOVERNMENT SUBJECT OF DEBATE

[Text] Rome, 8 Feb (ANSA) -- The split between the Italian and Soviet communist parties over the declaration of martial law in Poland has now become the focus for debate among the Italian parties, and even for the stability of the present government. The incumbent administration led by Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini is a five-way coalition of the Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals and Spadolini's own Republicans. According to political analysts, Socialist and Social Democrat demands that the agreements forming the basis of the coalition be checked out are still in the air but the prime question now is the role the Communists can play now that they have clarified their absolute independence from Moscow on the international scene. In the Rome parliament, the Communists are the second largest party, close on the heels of the Christian Democrats. The Socialists rank third.

"For an effective political direction of the country," said the head of the Italian Communist Party's cultural commission Aldo Tortorella in Milan Sunday, "the programs, methods of management and very conception of government must be renewed and refurbished." According to Tortorella, this cannot be done "with the repetition of old formulas." Rather, it would be "of great importance if the Socialist Party, and other forces voicing critical positions, were to opt for a line alternative to the Christian Democrat system of power."

"The Communists have already advanced concrete proposals in this field..." he added. "The facts prove that Italy cannot be renewed without the decisive contribution of the Communists."

Predictably a Christian Democrat veteran like Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo did not agree. Interviewed for yesterday's edition of the conservative Rome daily, IL TEMPO, he said that the Italian Communists' ideas on "economic democracy" were "of great interest," but raise "serious questions over the consequences all this would have on our society." He cited in particular the "characteristics which we think must be preserved and strengthened in a free Western society based on the market economy." For Colombo, in effect, the split between Soviet and Italian communists changes nothing in relations between majority and opposition in Italy. According to Colombo, there is no alternative to the present alliance. He said this is not the time for "leapfrogging in the old style" towards the Communists, a presumed reference to a Socialist-Communist alliance.

The Liberals, usually classified as right-of-center, also came out against the Communists' view. Speaking in Genoa Sunday, their deputy secretary Alfredo Biondi described the present government alliance as "a reality not to be dispersed." Rather, he said, it should be "consolidated with political initiatives and parliamentary actions coherent with the commitments of the majority and the government."

In other speeches, Spadolini said near Como Sunday that "the economic emergency and terrorism are two sides of the same coin which should be fought with the same coherence and the same intransigent determination." He also warned against "superficial optimism" because "the struggle will be long and hard."

PCI DIRECTORATE: WIDE SUPPORT FOR POLAND STAND

[Report on PCI Directorate 28 January "document"]

The PCI Directorate today made an examination of the broad and committed debate taking place in all party organizations on the stances and decisions adopted by the Central Committee and Central Control Commission at their 11-13 January session on the PRAVDA article and on L'UNITA's reply. The debate reveals very broad adherence to and agreement with the policy line and the prospects for the struggle for socialism and peace outlined in the party documents and with the steadfast defense of the attitudes, stances and method adopted against the attack mounted on our party and its leaders by some of the CPSU press organs. The Directorate, confirming the stances adopted, urges the entire party to extend its work to acquaint members, citizens and the public with, and to make them debate, our policy and to carry out a thorough elucidation of the historical and political foundations, the validity and the soundness of the third way and the new internationalism. The Directorate appraised the positive repercussions, comments and interpretations prompted in Italy and abroad by the development in PCI policy and has decided to step up its initiative in the European and international fields to ensure the broadest and most accurate possible knowledge of the PCI's stances and aims. The Directorate intends to develop international relations with all communist, socialist, social democratic, revolutionary and progressive parties and movements with the aim of the most open and equal-based dialogue, for the fundamental objectives of safeguarding peace, disarmament, the peoples' emancipation and liberation and the advance of socialism. In the Italian situation the political impact of the stances adopted by the PCI has been significant. Leaving aside differences of appraisal and obvious manipulations, it is essential to acknowledge the untenability of prejudices and biases against the PCI. The Directorate, confirming the democratic alternative line, pledges the entire party to the struggle to bring about this necessary and pressing change in our country's life. The Directorate decided to convene a meeting of regional and federation secretaries on 2 February, principally devoted to an examination of the use of party organizations in social struggles and for the resumption of the peace movement.

SOVIET EMBASSY CALLS SOARES 'MENTALLY ILL'

LD062346 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2100 GMT 6 Feb 82

[Text] The Soviet Embassy in Lisbon today expressed the view that the Socialist Party secretary general, Dr Mario Soares, is mentally ill and in need of a lengthy period of treatment. A short while ago we managed to contact the Socialist leader -- who is on a visit to the district of Vila Real -- by telephone. Mario Soares commented on the Soviet Embassy's statement as follows: [Begin recording] [Soares] This is a conditioned reflex on the embassy's part, since, as is known, in the Soviet Union opponents and critics of the regime are detained in psychiatric hospitals. So the embassy official acted on reflex and would like to detain me in a psychiatric hospital as well. Luckily, this is a free country and therefore his wish cannot be fulfilled.

[Question] Dr Soares: The embassy statement says it is in connection with claims you have made of the existence of Soviet plans to destabilize the Iberian Peninsula.

[Answer] That is inaccurate. What I said was that the strategy of the [Portuguese] Communist Party is not concerned with national interests alone and is part and parcel of an international and global [as heard] strategy aimed at destabilizing the Iberian Peninsula. [end recording]

Socialists Respond

LD071026 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 0815 GMT 7 Feb 82

[Excerpt] The Permanent Committee of the Socialist Party will demand that the government immediately expel senior diplomatic officials of the Soviet Embassy in Lisbon if a statement released Saturday evening by the Soviet Embassy press office in the Portuguese capital is officially confirmed. Jorge Campinos, on behalf of the Socialist Party Permanent Committee, issued this warning to the Soviet diplomats last night when he referred to a statement released a few hours earlier by the embassy's press office directly aimed at Mario Soares.

Embassy Clarifies

LD070132 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0100 GMT 7 Feb 82

[Text] The Soviet Embassy in Lisbon has issued a communique with the following clarification: A translation error changed the meaning of the statement released yesterday to the news media. The correct version of the statement is as follows: In connection with the appearance in some Portuguese newspapers of insinuations over the alleged existence of Soviet plans to destabilize the Iberian Peninsula, the press office of the Soviet Embassy in Portugal deems it possible to say only that provocative lies of this nature can be nothing more than the fruit of a morbid imagination. Such lies require a lengthy analysis and adequate treatment. [sentence as heard]

GOVERNMENT 'CONSIDERING' PURCHASE OF SOVIET GAS

LD051924 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1800 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Text] The secretary of state for energy has announced that the government is considering the possibility of importing gas from the USSR. This, however, will only be possible if the negotiations between Spain and the USSR on the supply of gas prove to be successful and if the Spanish authorities set up a pipeline system reaching at least to Madrid. The possibility of Portugal being supplied with Soviet gas falls within the framework of the planned construction of a gas pipeline which will supply some European countries, and which will reach -- in view of the negotiations completed so far -- into France.

CARRILLO DISCUSSES CPSU TIES, EUROCOMMUNISM

PM051429 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 4 Feb 82 p 2

[Benoit Rayski 3 February interview in Madrid with PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo]

[Excerpts] Question: You said recently that the organization of the communist movement around the Soviet Union is over and done with once and for all. What do you and the Soviet Union still have in common?

Answer: You know that there is a fairly long history between my party and the CPSU because my party was a member of the Comintern and the international communist movement, consequently it took part in what we now call the communist movement's traditional culture, in other words we share a history. But from 1968 onwards, in other words from the invasion of Czechoslovakia, we moved away from the CPSU. That was because we felt that the Warsaw Pact troops' entry into Czechoslovakia ran counter to our principles and ideas and brutally destroyed any hope of a renewal in the East-bloc socialist regimes.

Who Is Democratic

Subsequently we followed a course which moved further and further away from that of the CPSU leadership, and today, after Prague, Afghanistan and Poland -- where we have seen something inconceivable for a Marxist, namely the establishment a military regime -- we reached the conclusion that there is an essential split between what we considered to be the socialist ideal and the Soviet Union's official ideology.

Question: Mr Carrillo, you are a communist, Berlinguer is a communist, Marchais is a communist, Brezhnev is a communist, Jaruzelski is a communist.... Which of you is really a communist?

Answer: I could answer you by putting another question. I saw a very bad program on television 3 days ago; it was the show on Poland organized by Ronald Reagan. During that program there was a procession of democrats who spoke about the Polish people, among those democrats there were some who are democrats but there were others who say they are, like the Turkish prime minister for instance. All it needed was Napoleon Duarte, the president of the El Salvador junta, so I could ask you who is really a democrat?

Question: In a way you have answered my question by saying that because the comparison which you make with Turkey and El Salvador can scarcely please Brezhnev, Jaruzelski or Marchais...

Answer: You said it....

Question: But could you, like Georges Marchais, write a letter to General Jaruzelski addressing him as "dear comrade"?

Answer: I do not think so.

A Valid Policy

Question: Poland is a country in which trade unionists and intellectuals are now imprisoned, a country in which hard labor is being established, a country in which there is a military dictatorship. In your opinion is there really a difference between that communist country and what you call a fascist dictatorship?

Answer: From the political viewpoint there is no difference but from the economic viewpoint there is; in Poland there is no capitalist ownership. That is the only difference....

Question: You, together with Enrico Berlinguer and Georges Marchais, initiated what was called Eurocommunism. What remains of it now there are only two of you left, you and Berlinguer, now that Georges Marchais has left you. Do you think that you can make Eurocommunism work with just two members, you and the Italians, but without the French?

Answer: Why not?

Question: Is Eurocommunism still a valid notion or does it strike you as outdated?

Answer: I think that Eurocommunism -- the word is not important, only the content counts -- is the only valid policy for the communist parties in the developed capitalist countries.

Question: I wonder about one thing: If you spoke like that in Moscow you would possibly be in prison; in Warsaw you would probably be interned and in Lisbon or Paris you would already have been expelled from the communist party. Don't you find that strange?

Answer: You know, some people here in Madrid would like to see me in prison too!

Question: Not the same people as in Moscow or Warsaw....

Answer: That's true. But who knows...if I was communist party secretary in the countries you mention I could probably make the same statements as here in Madrid.

A Break

Question: In the past you were the preferred target for Soviet attacks. This time it is Berlinguer. Why do you think that is so?

Answer: I think that when I was attacked they were also attacking Berlinguer indirectly and that when Berlinguer is attacked it is also an indirect way of attacking me. It may now be in the Soviet leadership's interest to try and break up the PCI, which is stronger than the PCE.... And it may also be that in the past, while pursuing a Eurocommunist policy, Berlinguer avoided head-on clashes with Moscow while I probably went further because I am Spanish and therefore a little crazier or, if you prefer, a little more fiery....

Question: Do you still have consultations with the PCF on Eurocommunist questions?

Answer: Comrade Gremetz was here recently. We agreed to discuss all problems after the PCF congress. I hope that that discussion will take place.

Question: To sum up your views: Is there a complete split between you and the Soviet system?

Answer: There is a split between my party's position and the Soviet leadership's position in that what it puts forward as Marxist-Leninist ideology does not correspond to our ideological position.

Question: So, in your view, is the Soviet Union a communist country or not?

Answer: The Soviet Union is not a communist country. There is no communism in the Soviet Union.

Question: Is the Soviet Union a socialist country then?

Answer: I think that the USSR is a country which has gone beyond capitalism and has eliminated private ownership of the main means of production. That does not mean that a developed socialist society exists in the Soviet Union as they say over there....

KOIVISTO SENDS REPLY TO BREZHNEV TELEGRAM

LD041556 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 4 Feb 82

[Text] President Mauno Koivisto gives an assurance of the continuity of Finland's foreign policy line in his telegram to Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev. Thanking Brezhnev for his telegram of congratulations, Koivisto stresses that Finland will continue unhesitatingly on the foreign policy path mapped out by Paasikivi and Kekkonen. A central part of this path is the all-round development of relations between Finland and the Soviet Union, Koivisto says. Koivisto says he agrees, with feelings of deep satisfaction, with Brezhnev's statement that relations between our countries have developed successfully on the basis of the permanently valid articles of the 1948 Finnish-Soviet treaty.

ACCORD SIGNED WITH USSR ON CANAL NAVIGATION

PM031441 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 29 Jan 82 p 14

[Text] The Saimaa Canal's traffic season is to be extended. On Thursday Finnish and Soviet canal authorities signed an agreement on the extension. The object of the agreement is to lengthen the traffic season to around 10 months. For the last 2 years there have been experimental extensions of the traffic season, and the last season ended on 23 January of this year.

In order to make it possible to extend the season, ice-strengthened tonnage must be increased and a number of measures must be adopted at locks and on the rest of the canal to combat ice. According to the new agreement, icebreaker assistance will be arranged so that Soviet icebreakers will assist ships at least from Gogland in the Gulf of Finland to the canal's southern exit. Finnish icebreakers will assist vessels in the canal and on Lake Saimaa. Canal traffic will be directed along the normal traffic channels in the Gulf of Finland and Vyborg Bay. It will also be possible to use the coastal route between Verderlax [as published] and Vyborg Bay if the ice situation requires and if icebreakers can be used. In connection with the lengthening of the season, information on the Finnish side about icebreaker assistance will be relayed to the Board of Shipping's icebreaking service and the Marine Research Institute's ice reporting service.

The agreement will run for 3 years. The two sides are prepared to amend it if experience in winter traffic makes this necessary.

COMMUNISTS TO HOLD SPECIAL PARTY CONGRESS IN MAY

LD071632 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 7 Feb 82

[Text] The Finnish Communist Party [SKP] will hold a special party congress in mid-May. The unanimous decision on the convocation of the party congress was reached at the SKP Central Committee meeting today. The task of the party congress is to improve party unity. It is believed that the congress will decide on a change in party leadership and on changes in the Central Committee and Political Bureau. Thus the 2-day meeting has postponed discussion of the worst disagreements within the party until the spring.

SKP Chairman Aarne Saarinen says the danger of a party split is diminishing. According to Deputy Chairman Taisto Sinisalo, there is a certain hopefulness that the SKP will go through the party congress without splitting. The SKP Political Bureau will set up a working group to prepare for the party congress. Persons elected for the 19th congress will be delegates at the special congress.

SOCIALIST INTERNATIONAL GROUP BEGINS MOSCOW TALKS

PM051117 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 3 Feb 82 p 6

[FINSKA NOTISBYRAN report]

[Text] Moscow -- The delegation from the Socialist International's disarmament committee visiting Moscow under the leadership of Finnish Social Democratic Party Chairman Kalevi Sorsa began its talks with the Soviet leaders Tuesday. The delegation, which is in Moscow to discuss disarmament questions, met the Soviet delegation, which consists of members of the Central Committee's international section. The leader of the Soviet delegation is Central Central Committee Secretary Boris Ponomarev, and the delegation includes Central Committee international information section chief Leonid Zamyatin and Prof Georgiy Arbatov, chief of the Institute for U.S. and Canadian studies. The Socialist International delegation is very small, however, since the majority of West European parties decided to boycott the visit because of the situation in Poland. The French, Netherlands, British and West German delegates, among others, decided to stay home.

Monday evening the Netherlands Labor Party justified its decision by saying that the situation in Poland is now such that there is no possibility of fruitful discussions with the CPSU. A spokesman for the Socialist international delegation in Moscow said Tuesday afternoon that during the talks the delegation had given an account of the reasons for the boycott.

For the Socialist International the point of departure for the talks is the report published last September by a working group, which was also led by Sorsa, after visits to both the United States and the Soviet Union. In the report an appeal is made to these countries to resume the SALT talks. The Socialist International also calls for the banning of chemical and biological weapons and the neutron bomb. The organization further appeals for balanced reductions in the number of medium-range missiles in Europe and advocates a decision at the Madrid CSCE conference for a European disarmament conference. The report has already been presented to the U.S. Government.

After Tuesday's talks the negotiations will continue in the next few days with expert-level contacts. Sorsa is expected to meet President Leonid Brezhnev in the Kremlin Wednesday. The visit to Moscow will end Thursday.

[Text] Stockholm, 4 Feb (AFP) -- The Swedish Government today approved emergency aid to Poland of 10 million kroners (1.7 million dollars), in the form of food aid to be distributed by the Lutheran aid organisation. The food will go mainly to families hit by recent severe flooding in Poland's Slask Province.

NEW MEASURES AGAINST USSR, POLAND ANNOUNCED

LD051446 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1418 GMT 5 Feb 82

[By diplomatic correspondent Tom McMullan]

[Text] Britain today announced a package of measures against Poland and the Soviet Union intended to reflect Western opposition to martial law in Poland. Mr Humphrey Atkins, deputy foreign secretary, announced the measures in a written Commons answer. At the same time, the Polish and Soviet ambassadors were called to the Foreign Office to be given details of the measures in separate meetings with Lord Trefgarne, a junior minister.

The Soviet ambassador, Mr Victor Popov, according to a Foreign Office spokesman, "rehearsed the familiar Soviet position of Poland." The Polish ambassador, Mr Stefan Stamizewski, did not offer any immediate response.

The measures which include restrictions on travel of Polish and Soviet diplomats and restrictions on credits are part of a NATO effort to show that the Western alliance is united in condemning martial law in Poland and the Soviet role in the Polish crisis. Reports from Washington today said the American administration would examine the West European measures to see if they represented a credible package of sanctions. Otherwise, the United States itself might decide to introduce unilateral sanctions. Other West European countries are now in the process of preparing their own package of measures.

Mr Atkins said travel restrictions had been imposed on Polish diplomats and certain other official representatives in London and Glasgow. When martial law was imposed in Poland, British and other Western diplomats were restricted to Warsaw. Restrictions already exist on travel by Soviet officials in Britain and today's announcement said that these have been tightened. Mr Atkins said the measures would ensure that Britain's relations with the military regime in Poland "reflect the abnormal nature of the present situation. Britain had increased its BBC broadcasts in the Polish language to Poland, he said, and Britain would give financial or other assistance to help to co-ordinate the efforts of those voluntary and church agencies in Britain which were providing humanitarian aid to Poland.

Britain had agreed with other Western official creditors "that the question of rescheduling of Poland's 1982 official debt should for the time being be held in suspense." The government had placed in abeyance existing officially guaranteed credits to Poland subject to safeguarding the interests of British firms having legally binding contractual obligations. For the present, Britain would not make available any new credits for Poland.

The government had agreed with its Common Market partners that there should be no further sale of EEC food at special prices to Poland. Funds that would have been made available for this purpose would now be diverted to the provision of humanitarian aid through the voluntary agencies and church agencies. Mr Atkins said there was some 19 million pounds available for this purpose. The Common Market commission was putting forward a proposal for the early allocation of 4,500,000 pounds.

Mr Atkins said measures relating directly to the Soviet Union would mean Britain would reduce the level of activity under four Anglo-Soviet technical co-operation agreements in the fields of medicine and public health, environmental protection, agricultural research and atomic energy. The government had introduced a licensing system which covered Soviet factory ships, transit shipping fish caught in British waters and had given notice that it intended to re-negotiate the terms of the Anglo-Soviet treaty on merchant navigation.

The government was now exploring with its EEC partners the possibility of re-classifying the Soviet Union within the export credit concensus within the Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development.

THATCHER INTERVIEWED ON MIDDLE EAST POLICY

NC051550 Cairo MENA in English 1515 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Text] London, 5 Feb (MENA) -- British Prime Minister Mrs Margaret Thatcher underlined here today that she is greatly looking forward to seeing President and Mrs Mubarak in Britain. The prime minister hailed Egyptian-British relations underscoring that under President Mubarak Britain's relationship with Egypt is as strong as ever, and pledged "we shall continue to work closely with the Egyptian Government on efforts to find a lasting peace in the Middle East." In an exclusive interview with the MIDDLE EAST NEWS AGENCY correspondent here on the eve of the visit of President Mubarak to the United Kingdom tomorrow, Mrs Thatcher spelt out "that our offer of a British contingent for the multinational force has been made in this spirit."

Here is the full text of the interview:

Question: On the eve of the Egyptian President Mubarak's visit to the UK I would like to ask you how do you look at relations between UK and Egypt at the moment?

Answer: I am greatly looking forward to seeing President and Mrs Mubarak in Britain. This is not the first time they have visited us. I saw Mr Mubarak when he came as vice president in 1980. Now we welcomed him as president. The event naturally reminds us of the tragic loss of President as-Sadat, who came to London with Mrs as-Sadat only last August and whom we remember with affection and respect. But under President Mubarak Britain's relationship with Egypt is as strong as ever. We shall continue to work closely with the Egyptian Government on efforts to find a lasting peace in the Middle East. Our offer of a British contingent for the multinational force has been made in this spirit.

Question: When are you going to visit Egypt?

Answer: I would very much like to visit Egypt again soon but there are no firm dates in prospect at the moment.

Question: What subjects, do you think, will focus prominently in the talks you will hold with President Mubarak?

Answer: Egypt and Israel are to be congratulated on achieving peace. Now we need to consider ways in which the Middle East peace process can develop. President Mubarak is coming from Washington, where he will have had important talks with Mr Reagan and Mr Haig. We shall be interested to know how those went. We shall also be keen to hear the president's views on other developments in the Middle East and his thoughts on important issues elsewhere in the world. There are no bilateral problems between us but we shall naturally wish to discuss ways in which our relationship should develop, particularly in the economic field.

Question: Your government has stated that it would [do] everything possible to support Egypt's stability and continuity at the present situation. What steps are you contemplating in this direction?

Answer: We were all shocked and distressed by the tragic death last October of President as-Sadat. We admire the smooth way in which President Mubarak has taken over and ensured stability and continuity. Britain has reaffirmed, both bilaterally and with our European partners, her political support for Egypt and will play a small role in facilitating the arrangements for the return of Sinai, through our contribution to the multinational force. We have for some years given aid to Egypt and we have been involved in a number of important projects aimed at improving Egypt's infrastructure. In the course of our normal trading links British firms have made a considerable contribution to Egypt's industrial growth.

Question: Britain held the presidency of the EEC for the last six months. What is your opinion on possible EEC future initiatives to help achieve a comprehensive solution to the Middle East question in the light of statements by some European leaders that we have already bypassed the Venice declaration on the Middle East?

Answer: We in Europe have a direct interest in comprehensive peace settlement. We have a long and valued association with the countries of the Middle East and remain ready to contribute to the peace process in any way we can. The principles we set out at Venice remain valid, but there is a limit to what we can do from the outside. The important thing is for Israel and the Palestinians to accept each other's legitimate rights; only then can a peace process involving all parties begin.

Question: How would you assess the situation in the Middle East following the last phase of Israeli withdrawal from Sinai next April, and what possible moves could be taken to settle the Palestinian question?

Answer: The return of the last part of the Sinai to Egypt will mark the successful completion of the dramatic achievement of peace between Egypt and Israel. This peace must become the starting point for a wider peace process involving all the parties, and with the United States playing a central role. As a step towards this we hope that Egypt's relations with the rest of the Arab world will improve after April and that the Arabs together will show that they are ready to make peace with Israel while providing for the future of the Palestinians. The Palestinians must be enabled to determine what their own future should be as part of a peace settlement, but they must also show that they are ready to live with Israel in peace and security. That is where the key to future progress lies.

Question: When Britain announced its intention to contribute to the Sinai Multinational Force [MFO], your government underlined the intention to help the return of Sinai to Egypt. How do you qualify Britain's and the EEC's contribution to the MFO?

Answer: The MFO, whose operations will begin after Israel's withdrawal, has a vital role to play in preserving the peace between Egypt and Israel. Our support for the treaty has always been wholehearted and we see our contribution to a strong, international peace-keeping force as a practical expression of this support. We are delighted to be able to help in this way and glad that Egypt has given [as received] our contribution.

EGYPT'S MUBARAK ARRIVES FOR TALKS ON MIDEAST

Al-Baz Comments

NC061817 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1700 GMT 6 Feb 82

[Excerpts] London, 6 Feb (MENA) -- The official talks between President Husni Mubarak and British Prime Minister Mrs Margaret Thatcher, which lasted 90 minutes, concluded this afternoon in Chequers. Foreign Ministry First Under Secretary Dr Usamah al-Baz stated afterward that President Husni Mubarak briefed Mrs Thatcher on the talks he had with President Ronald Reagan and his advisers in Washington. In a statement to MENA, Dr al-Baz added that the talks also included the Egyptian views on how to achieve progress in the coming months toward solving the Palestine question and a review of some regional and international situations of interest to the two countries.

Dr al-Baz affirmed that it was evident that the British Government shares Egypt's interest in settling the Palestine question on the basis this is a necessary condition for stability and peace in the area. Dr al-Baz noted that that it was also evident that the British agree with Egypt on the need for speeding up the transfer of power from the Israeli military government and its civil administration to the Palestinian people. Dr al-Baz said that the president invited Mrs Thatcher to visit Cairo. The invitation was accepted and a date will be set later.

The Egyptian delegation included Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan Ali, Foreign Minister First Under Secretary Dr Usamah al-Baz and Egyptian Ambassador in London Hasan Abu sa'Dah. On the British side the talks were attended by Lord Privy Seal Humphrey Atkins, the deputy foreign secretary acting for Lord Carrington, minister of state at the Foreign Office Douglas Hurd and British ambassador in Cairo, Michael Weir. Prime Minister Thatcher hosted President Husni Mubarak at a luncheon attended by members of both delegations.

Meanwhile, the British ambassador in Cairo has told MENA that the British side expressed its complete satisfaction with the splendid and cordial atmosphere that prevailed during the talks. He added that this atmosphere reflects the strong friendly relations between Egypt and Britain, which are growing rapidly. He concluded his statement by expressing the British Government's appreciation of President Mubarak's policy.

'Ali Statement on Talks

NC062237 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 2112 GMT 6 Feb 82

[Text of statement by Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali to a Cairo radio team in London on 6 February -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] This morning, talks were held between the president and British Prime Minister Mrs Thatcher. In the statement released from 10 Downing Street, the official spokesman said that the talks dealt with the Arab-Israeli conflict, international problems such as those of Iraq, Iran and the Sudan, bilateral relations and the role which the European Community, led by Britain, should play in relation to the Middle East question in general and the Palestine question in particular. Can you possibly throw light on these points that were dealt with in the talks?

[Answer] In fact, as we know these talks follow the continuous consultations between Egypt and the European Community members collectively and individually in light of bilateral relations. The talks dealt with all subjects relating to the Middle East and the situation in the area, foremost of which is the Palestine question and the Arab-Israeli conflict. Naturally, as we know, there are currently talks being held between Egypt, Israel and the United States. These talks are continuing, as we know. The subjects discussed included Egypt's views on these talks and the need for continuing them to boost the peace process, and the Palestinian and the European stances on the peace question in general and the states in the area as a whole.

There is no doubt that exchanging views is very useful in formulating an opinion, whether at the bileteral level or at the collective level. In light of these consultations, all views will become clear and opinions can be exchanged in detail between Egypt and these states. Consultations were held within this framework on the Middle East question between the president and Mrs Thatcher and the two delegations. Concerning the European role, there is no doubt that Britain's participation within the group of four European states in the peacekeeping force constitutes a cornerstone of the support by these states to the peace efforts and to the implementation of the Egyptian-Israeli treaty, the implementation of which will be completed in April, God willing.

Naturally, the president thanked Britain for participating as one of the four states of the Sinai force, because the participation of the United Kingdom will encourage other states to join. The significance of all this is that there is an international unanimity to boost the peace efforts and to bless and apply the Egyptian-Israeli treaty.

Views were also exchanged on international problems in general within the framework of the relations between Egypt and the EEC, including Britain. The situation regarding other international problems was also reviewed, including the situation between Iran and Iraq and the African situation.

On bilateral relations, we know that Britain is third in trade relations with Egypt, following the United States and France. There is no doubt that economic and cultural relations, cooperation in the military field and many other matters of interest to the two countries were also dealt with in the talks.

Mubarak Press Conference

NC071111 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 1013 GMT 7 Feb 82

[Press conference given by Egyptian President Muhammad Husni Mubarak prior to departing Heathrow Airport on 7 February for the FRG -- recorded], questions and answers are in English, with translation from superimposed Arabic translation]

[Text] [President Mubarak] I am delighted to visit your country, the United Kingdom, with which we enjoy a strong relationship and strong ties. I met with Mrs Margaret Thatcher, the prime minister, and some other officials. We discussed relations between the United Kingdom and the Arab Republic of Egypt. With regard to international issues, we discussed what is going on now in the world. Naturally, we discussed the Middle East problem and the autonomy discussions. I talked with Mrs Thatcher about the multinational force which will take up positions on the border between Egypt and Israel in Sinai on 25 April. This force will supervise the withdrawal of Israel from Sinai on 25 April. I am ready to answer any questions which you might like to ask.

[Question] How do you assess your visit to the United Kingdom?

[Answer] As I said, we exchanged views and we talked about the autonomy negotiations, bilateral relations, and the aid extended to us. We achieved very good results.

[Question] Do you mean differences in views in connection with the multinational force or in connection with what?

[Answer] We dealt with the autonomy talks. I explained my views in a very clear manner.

[Question] Between now and 25 April, will progress be made as far as autonomy is concerned?

[Answer] We have not erected a barrier and we have not placed a limit which we have limited by 25 April [sentence as heard]. This is not the Great Wall of China over which we cannot pass. We will continue with the discussions beyond 25 April.

[Translator] A question about the autonomy talks.

[Answer] We are committed. We committed ourselves when we began negotiating. This was within the framework of part one of the Camp David agreement. We are now dealing with the second part of the agreement; that is, the declaration of principles.

[Translator] A question connected with the Palestinian role.

[Answer] They will participate in the negotiations when we deal with the declaration of principles. This matter can be resolved among themselves -- the Palestinians. We have indeed specified this at the summit conferences. Some differences, however, exist among the Palestinians themselves.

[Question] Do you mean the PLO when you say "the Palestinians"?

[Answer] I believe that you have already asked this question. It is imperative that the United States begins negotiations and discussions with the Palestinians and that they (?stretch out their hand) in a dialogue between themselves to resolve the pending issues.

[Question] Is there anything which can be done on Begin's part which would preclude progress from being achieved in the peace process? Is there anything which Begin might do and which you will be unable to allow him to do?

[Answer] Withdrawal from Sinai is a commitment on the part of the Israeli side. When we signed the Camp David agreement, there were two parts: the first part and the second part stipulate a comprehensive solution of the issue. In accordance with the Camp David agreements, we held negotiations and we achieved the Egyptian-Israeli agreement. In regard to the second part, the agreement between us is an agreement between two states, not between two persons. Therefore, we are committed as we also see that Prime Minister Begin is committed to the same thing.

[Question] Can you put forward something new? In the past, you welcomed the Venice declaration. Can Europe do something else now?

[Answer] I believe that it is incumbent upon Europe to play a major role in this respect. The Europeans have strong contacts with the United States and they have deep friendships with the Israelis. I believe that such power can be effective and can play a major role in promoting the peace process.

[Question] Do you want pressure to be put on Israel?

[Answer] I am not speaking of applying pressure. I am talking about understanding; I am speaking of what Europe and the United States can do with Israel to achieve a comprehensive solution. I will visit Israel; we have diplomatic relations with Israel. There is nothing which precludes my visit to Israel.

[Question] When will you visit Israel?

[Answer] I am not going to tell you. [laughter]

[Question] Some people are speaking about the return of Nasirism to Egypt through your policy.

[Answer] It is nobody's business to speak of my policy in Egypt. The reason is that my policy in Egypt only concerns those of us in Egypt.

[Question] How do you differ from your predecessor?

[Answer] I am Husni Mubarak. That is all.

INDIAN MILITARY PLANE FIRED ON OVER TURKISH AREA

NC051416 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Text] It was announced today that an Indian military plane -- an Antonov 12 -- was shot at from Turkish posts in the Louroujina area the day before yesterday. The Indian plane was heading for Larnaca airport for refueling. An official statement says Foreign Minister Rolandhis reported the incident to UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, Gobbi. He also instructed Mr Mavrommatis, permanent delegate to the United Nations, to report the incident to the secretary general and to brief the UN members with an official document.

UN SPOKESMAN ON SECRETARY GENERAL'S INTERVIEW

NC051100 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 5 Feb 82 p 1

[Text] UN press spokesman Keith Beavan stressed yesterday that the Waldheim evaluation was accepted at the negotiation table as the method, not as the basis for the talks. Mr Beavan was answering questions by our reporter in connection with an interview UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar gave to the Turkish paper HURRIYET. Specifically the UN spokesman was requested to clarify passages in Perez de Cuellar's interview. The answers were supplied following Mr Beavan's contacts with the UN Secretariat in New York, which gave the precise spirit and letter of the passages in Perez de Cuellar's statement that required clarification.

In his statement Perez de Cuellar reportedly described the evaluation to HURRIYET as an "important basis" for a new start and then as a "method for discussion." Requested to clarify this statement, the UN spokesman stressed that the answer to the question of how the Waldheim evaluation had been accepted had been included both in the UN communiques following the intercommunal meetings and in Mr Gobbi's statements. He added: "I have been assured by New York that in his interview Mr Perez de Cuellar used the same phraseology for the evaluation as in the communiques."

In answer to a remark that Perez de Cuellar reportedly told HURRIYET that the evaluation was prepared by Mr Gobbi instead of Mr Waldheim, the spokesman said: The evaluation was prepared by Mr Waldheim with the advice of Mr Gobbi and other UN personnel in New York and Nicosia.

It should be noted that the government spokesman, who was consulted yesterday, stated that the government knows nothing about an evaluation by Gobbi.

In answer to another remark that at one point in his interview Perez de Cuellar had stated that "both sides have been making the necessary efforts in the talks" and elsewhere that "the United Nations must persuade the two sides to work with greater flexibility," the UN spokesman said: According to what was conveyed to him from New York yesterday it was clear that the main point in Perez de Cuellar's statement was that it would be easier for the two sides to negotiate and to hold discussions if they displayed the same understanding during the current talks. In connection with what Perez de Cuellar is said to have stated, that is, "If agreement is reached on one of the words 'bizonal,' 'federation,' or 'confederation,' important progress could be made toward a Cyrpus solution," Mr Beavan said: What Mr Perez de Cuellar did was to express hope that the two parties will be ready to proceed with real discussion on constitutional arrangements.

PAPER URGES GOVERNMENT TO WITHDRAW FROM NATO, EC

[From the "Radical" column: "Insolent Demand"]

[Text] During their official talks in Bonn, Chancellor Schmidt demanded from Greek Prime Minister Papandreou, with cynical rudeness, the submission of our country's interests to those of NATO. Without even observing fundamental diplomatic pretexts toward an official guest, Mr Schmidt used unacceptable language when he put forward insolent demands to his Greek counterpart. Using language reminiscent of past eras, he demanded that Greece submit to the U.S., NATO and EEC directives, align itself with the Atlantic cold war policy, and give up efforts to improve the submissive conditions of integration into the Common Market and the exercise of a fundamentally independent foreign policy. According to Mr Schmidt, the Cyprus problem and the Greek-Turkish differences must be resolved within the framework of the imperialist NATO, "guided by the interests of the alliance."

Mr Papandreou and his associates must draw the necessary lessons from the reproach by the representatives of West German capitalism. This lesson can be only the abandonment of the illusion that allegedly with "flexible actions" and with a "persuasive" presentation of the Greek views the serious national issues could be resolved within the framework of NATO and the EEC. Chancellor Schmidt's cynical statement again confirms that despite their political "shades," the West European leaders view Greece as a mere pawn on the chessboard of their imperialist plans. If the government wishes to be consistent with its own declarations on safeguarding national independence and sovereignty, the sole road to implement these is to get rid of the suffocating grip of NATO and the EEC.

SECOND U.S. AIRSPACE VIOLATION IN AREA REPORTED

NC051915 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 5 Feb 82 pp 1, 7

[A. Stavropoulos report]

[Excerpts] A second incident between U.S. F-14 fighter aircraft and a Libyan passenger plane on the Tripoli-Damascus route occurred within the Athens FIR (Flight Information Region) on the same day and at approximately the same hour as the first incident reported by AKROPOLIS yesterday. Specifically, the second incident occurred as follows:

Last Sunday at 1642 a Libyan Boeing airliner on its way from Tripoli to Damascus was intercepted southwest of the Peloponnese and within the Athens FIR by two 6th Fleet F-14 aircraft. The Libyan plane, with 50 passengers on board, had been "handed over" by the control tower at Valetta (Malta) to Ellinikon tower and was within the Athens FIR. At that moment the Libyan pilot observed two U.S. F-14 aircraft which began to bother him. The Libyan pilot immediately contacted the Greek air traffic controllers and, according to regulations, reported his "identity" his direction, his altitude and other particulars, and then added: At this moment on my left and right are two U.S. military aircraft that are making dangerous maneuvers along my course.

The Ellinikon tower instructed the Libyan aircraft to continue its flight normally. Specifically, the controller told the Libyan pilot: Remain at your altitude, continue your planned course for Damascus and await instructions.

The special service of the Air Force General Staff, which has its offices at Ellinikon airport, was immediately informed. In turn, the liaison officer informed the operations office of the Air Force General Staff about the incident. During the briefing, the U.S. pilots were still bothering the Libyan pilot.

KKE Condemnation

[Excerpts] The KKE Central Committee press bureau has issued a statement condemning the new provocative action by U.S. military aircraft against a Libyan plane within the Athens FIR [Flight Information Region]. The text of the statement by the KKE Central Committee press bureau is as follows:

The new provocative action by U.S. military aircraft against a Libyan plane within the Athens FIR constitutes a new overt terrorist action against Libya and an affront to our national independence. The government must make it clear to the U.S. imperialists that our country is not an open field for their adventurous activities and that they must proceed with the removal of their bases for the sake of the defense of our national independence and of peace in the region.

PAPANDREOU INTERVIEWED BY TURKISH NEWSPAPER

NC060002 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1900 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Text] In an interview he gave in Bonn to the correspondent of the Turkish newspaper MILLIYET, Prime Minister Papandreou referred to Greek-Turkish relations and the problems of the Aegean. Papandreou reiterated his declaration that Greece does not have any aggressive plans against Turkey, but that it also does not intend to (?sacrifice) its rights in the Aegean. Greece, the prime minister stressed, is not asking for anything that does not belong to it, and it does not intend to relinquish anything. The prime minister said peace in the Aegean should be protected by both countries because the road will thus open for very fruitful cooperation between the two countries.

Papandreou described as "astounding and incomprehensible" Turkish press reports concerning aggressive Greek plans. It is not possible even to imagine anything of the kind, stressed the prime minister. Referring to the Cyprus problem, he said it is not a Greek-Turkish problem but an international one. The problem is, he stressed, that first of all Cyprus should be demilitarized. With the withdrawal of all forces from the island, Turkish and Greek, the prime minister said, the prerequisites will be created for the (?settlement) of intercommunal differences under UN auspices. The two communities will be able to solve their problems, like the constitutional and territorial problems, only on such a basis following Cyprus' demilitarization. I believe this will take place, concluded Prime Minister Papandreou.

[Text] The KKE delegation headed by Mr Florakis returned to Athens today after a tour to the Soviet Union, Bulgaria and East Germany that lasted several days and included high-level meetings. Mr Florakis met with the secretary general of the Bulgarian Communist Party, Zhivkov, and the secretary general of the SED, Honecker.

ITALY'S FANFANI ARRIVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT

NC081124 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1100 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The president of the Italian Senate, Fanfani, arrived in Athens at noon on an official visit at the invitation of the president of the Chamber of Deputies, Alevras. After arriving at the airport, Fanfani made a statement expressing hope that the talks he will have in Athens will help the effort for progress in achieving peace in the Mediterranean. Fanfani will remain in Athens until Wednesday morning.

ARMY WINTER EXERCISE BEGINS IN EASTERN ANATOLIA

TA081056 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Excerpt] The Winter-82 exercise conducted by the 3d Army has begun in Erzurum and Sarikamis. The exercise is being held to increase the units' battle capabilities under severe climatic conditions, develop unit mobility in snow and demonstrate measures and precautions to be taken in battle. The exercise also aims at developing the units' training in logistics under various tactics and in cooperation among the groups under winter conditions. The Winter-82 exercise, one of the planned exercises for the armed forces for 1982, will last 3 days. Head of state Gen Kenan Evren will leave for Erzurum in the afternoon to observe the exercise.

STATE TO CONTROL ASSOCIATIONS' FOREIGN CONTACTS

[Summary] A statement by the office of the chief of the General Staff says that certain associations, professional organizations, trade unions and religious trusts are insisting on adopting, in contradiction to the national interests, a stand similar to the one prior to the 12 September 1980 operation. These associations have been serving as centers of negative charges against the state's domestic and foreign policies have come under the domination of ill-intentioned and extremist persons and have undertaken activities in contradiction to our country's domestic and foreign security. For example, one professional association has used the sacred right of defense in the courts as a political tool and in a way that damages Turkey's international relations and violates Turkish laws, and has tried to influence, through official or unofficial institutions, the trials being held at the martial law courts.

As a result, in order to preserve our country's domestic and foreign security, to protect its national interests and to prevent efforts to influence the independent Turkish courts, the invitation of members or delegations from official or unofficial foreign organizations and holding meetings with them in a bid to hold seminars or conferences by all associations, trade unions and religious trusts will be subject to the approval of the regional martial law command. In the case of foreign members of associations or delegations arriving in our country without an invitation, contacts and meetings with them will also be subject to approval from regional martial law commands. The printing or reproduction is prohibited of all commentaries and news concerning Turkey from radio stations abroad as well as articles appearing in press organs which, in line with these radio stations, consistently attack our country and its present administration through poisonous lies, slander and hatred.

TURKMEN TO ATTEND MEETINGS IN SPAIN, FRG

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has left for Madrid to attend the European Security and Cooperation Conference to be held there. In a statement at Yesilkoy airport, Turkmen said that at the conference Turkey will pursue a basic policy aimed at the meticulous observance of the Helsinki decisions. Noting that there has been a regression in West-East relations since 1977, Turkmen said the Afghan and Polish issues were among the major developments. Turkmen added that due to this regression in East-West relations, the NATO countries attach great importance to the meeting in Madrid.

Turkmen added that after attending the meeting in Madrid he will attend a meeting in the FRG in which the ministers and deputy ministers of NATO countries will participate. He said political and military issues will be discussed at the meeting.

POLISH DELEGATION ARRIVES FOR CSCE TALKS

LD072238 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 7 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Delegations are continuing to arrive in Madrid for the reopening of the CSCE on Tuesday. Here is Hector Arenas at Barajas Airport:

Amid understandable curiosity and a somewhat dramatic atmosphere the Polish delegation arrived here at Barajas this evening. The situation in their country may be the subject of confrontation between the two major powers at the Madrid conference, the second part of which begins on Tuesday. The head of the group, Deputy Foreign Minister Jozef Wiejacz, began by saying that the government headed by General Jaruzelski will accept no interference in or condemnation of the Polish situation, and then added that his country is living through a dramatic time. When the highly-placed Warsaw official was asked whether his delegation will withdraw from the Madrid conference if the question of Poland is raised, he replied:

[Begin Wiejacz recording, in Polish fading into Spanish translation] I do not think that is the attitude we are going to take. It is very early yet to make predictions or to know what we are going to do. We shall have to see what happens at the conference and what is raised by the different delegates. [end recording]

GENSCHER SAYS CSCE AGREEMENTS TESTED ON POLAND

LD081128 Hamburg DPA in German 1055 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 8 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher on Monday reaffirmed the plan of Western foreign ministers to "insist" at the CSCE follow-up conference in Madrid on the observance of the CSCE Helsinki Final Acts "for Poland and toward Poland." At a session of the FDP Presidium in Bonn, Genscher said that now the CSCE agreements have to prove themselves and all participating states through their behavior have to strengthen confidence in the CSCE process. For the Polish leadership and for the Soviet Union this means that the path of reform and renewal in Poland should be followed once again. On Monday afternoon Genscher is to travel to the Spanish capital to take part in the CSCE follow-up conference, which is due to begin on Tuesday. Before it begins the foreign ministers of NATO countries want to discuss joint strategy at the conference. Genscher already intends to meet U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig on Monday.

TASS CRITICISM OF TV PROGRAM DIRECTOR REJECTED

[Text] On Thursday Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr sharply reacted to the criticism by the official Soviet news agency TASS of the Austrian Radio and Television Service [ORF] and of Program Director Wolf in der Maur. As is known, TASS had criticized the ORF for refusing to air a 20-part [as published] Soviet TV series. Above all the charge of "mocking the memory of millions of victims of fascism" is an extremely unqualified attack on an Austrian institution established by federal law, and an insult to the people working there which he must emphatically reject, Pahr said. Attempts from abroad to influence the program selection of the ORF, whose independence is guaranteed by the Austrian Constitution, cannot be accepted in principle, the foreign minister declared.

MUBARAK TRANSITS VIENNA, HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE

[Excerpts] Vienna, 8 Feb (MENA) -- President Muhammad Husni Mubarak met Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky at the Vienna Airport lounge at 1800 today for talks that lasted well over an hour. Mubarak was on his way back to Cairo from Bonn. Following his talks with the Austrian chancellor, Mubarak made a statement to journalists, saying: "I am very happy with my meeting with Chancellor Kreisky, who is an old friend of mine. I am used to meeting with him. I exchange views with him because of his great experience in international issues. I wish him good health and hope to meet with him in Cairo when his circumstances permit, God willing." After that, President Mubarak answered newsmen's questions:

[Question] Mr President, are you satisfied with the results of your talks with President Reagan in the United States? Do you believe that there is a possibility that the United States will agree to the PLO's participation in the negotiations to achieve a peaceful settlement in the Middle East?

[Answer] I have held good discussions in the United States, exchanged views with U.S. officials, declared our position clearly and discussed the autonomy talks with the President and the U.S. administration. The discussions were lengthy. I also held talks with the Senate and House foreign relations committees. I hope that with the continuation of the negotiations and the participation of the United States as a full partner, we will be able to reach an agreement regarding a declaration of principles to encourage the Palestinians to participate in the negotiations in the forthcoming stage.

[Question] Are you convinced of this?

[Answer] I defined my position and conveyed it to them. I believe that they should begin a dialogue with the Palestinians, because without this it would be difficult to continue with the whole process.

[Question] In the past 15 years, every Arab leader has stressed that it is up to the Palestinians themselves to decide [on their future]. Now in light of your statement, will you urge the United States to think that such a process could be possible through the PLO?

[Answer] The Palestinians still have disagreements among themselves. These disagreements will naturally make it difficult to start talks with them. The PLO or others.

[Question] There is speculation about an Israeli military operation against the PLO in southern Lebanon. How would Egypt react to this?

[Answer] We discussed this subject with the United States and with Israeli Government officials. The Israelis must not overreact to any simple measure to spark off a war between Israel and southern Lebanon. I hope they will not reach this point. If, however, this occurs, we will define our position clearly.

[Question] Mr President, what is the problem of the Israeli settlements in the Sinai? Can you tackle it and could it constitute a problem to you or to Israel?

[Answer] Both countries signed a treaty. We honor our word and they honor theirs. If there is a problem with certain settlers, it is Israel's problem [words indistinct].

[Question] Mr President, is Egypt now closer to the Arab camp, specifically Saudi Arabia, than it was during President as-Sadat's era?

[Answer] Have you heard anything in the information media? [Words indistinct] give me the answer and it will answer your question.

SCHMIDT, MUBARAK HOLD JOINT PRESS CONFERENCE

NC081349 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 1203 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Joint press conference held by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Egyptian President Husni Mubarak at the Chancellery in Bonn -- live]

[Text] [Schmidt in German with Arabic translation] Ladies and gentlemen: I have had a friendly discussion, based on confidence, with President Husni Mubarak. At the beginning, the discussions were confined to both of us alone. This is a tradition not only between the Arab Republic of Egypt and the Federal Republic of Germany but also a tradition that involves the friendly relations that are based on the personal relations between us.

This is the sixth meeting I have had with President Husni Mubarak, but this is his first visit to our country as president of the Arab Republic of Egypt. Naturally, we broached the subject of the Middle East conflict -- the subject which constituted the basis of the discussions we have had. However, we also dealt with other international issues, both economic and political. I feel very pleased with the detailed presentation of the situation made by President Mubarak, especially his affirmation that he adheres to the peaceful policy begun by his predecessor, President Anwar as-Sadat. Following the assassination of President as-Sadat, we sensed balance and strength in the Egyptian leadership under President Mubarak. We also felt a remarkable political continuity. Naturally, we expected this.

The discussions we had today confirmed our expectations. We have expressed our mutual will on the necessity of finding a comprehensive, just, and lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, provided the two sides concerned recognize the right of every state, including Israel, to live in peace and security, and the Palestinian people's right to self-determination is respected. I have emphasized to President Mubarak our readiness, according to our economic capabilities, to present aid to Egypt in the future as well. We will also try to make endeavors on the political level in relation to the existing crisis in the Middle East region.

I thank President Mubarak for the breifing he gave me on the discussions he had held in the capitals [he visited]. Finally, I would like to say that we in Bonn are following with great interest all the attempts that are made by the Arab states with regard to achieving peace. We regard these attempts as encouraging indications. We respect and very much appreciate the peaceful policy which the Egyptian Government is pursuing under the leadership of President Mubarak.

[Mubarak in English] Ladies and Gentlemen: I am very happy to meet again with our friend Chancellor Schmidt. He is a statesman of great wisdom and vision and I always value his opinions and his advice. Today, we had an opportunity to discuss a wide range of international and regional topics. Our views were identical and we agreed on the necessity of strengthening the structure of world peace and security. We support the intensification of negotiations for the purpose of limiting strategic arms. We are for lessening tension in all regions of the world. We discussed the Middle East problem in detail.

I told the chancellor that we are determined to pursue our peace efforts until a comprehensive settlement is reached. The key to the comprehensive settlement is the Palestinian question, and we believe that the establishment of a self-governing authority in the West Bank and Gaza in accordance with the Camp David accord is a useful first step. A final settlement should be based on the exercise of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination.

We are pleased with the Federal Republic's support for our proposal on mutual recognition between Israel and the Palestinians. We are also gratified by the constructive role of the Federal Republic in the European Community. An active European role would be an important contribution to peace. Europe can promote moderation on both sides. It can also promote a meaningful dialogue between Israel and the Palestinians. This is the spirit of a negotiated settlement.

Our bilateral relations are excellent. The cooperation that exists between our peoples is a model for creating interaction among nations. We are proud of your friendship, Mr Chancellor, and your people. President as-Sadat gave priority to Egyptian-German cooperation. In so doing, we are expressing the will of all Egyptians. We will continue to strengthen the bonds of friendship with the German people. We agreed to intensify our contacts and consultations i the months ahead. I extend an invitation to Chancellor Schmidt to visit Egypt in the near future. We are looking forward to seeing him in Cairo. Thank you very much.

[Question to Schmidt] Mr Chancellor: We understood from your statement that you support an active role by the Arab states with regard to the presentation of positive Arab proposals for peace. We have also understood from the statements of the Egyptian president and Your Excellency's statements that you encourage the European states to play a more active role in the coming phase. Does this mean that Your Excellency, personally, and the European states will encourage an Arab-Israeli dialogue and a Palestinian-Israeli dialogue, and what will the European group's role be in the coming phase?

[Schmidt in German with Arabic translation] The European group declared a long time ago, especially in the Venice declaration, their stand on the Arab-Israeli conflict. I do not wish to exaggerate in defining the European role with regard to the finding of a comprehensive peace formula. However, with regard to the security forces which will be stationed in the Sinai, the European Community has adopted an approving stand. Indeed, some of these European states will participate in these forces.

We are convinced in this regard. We shall underscore and emphasize this conviction on all occasions in the future also. We believe that no reasonable option exists in the Middle East with regard to the policy of security. Therefore, we believe that a solution that is based on negotiations, one leading to agreement in relation to the Arab-Israeli conflict, is the best solution. However, I would like to reaffirm that this requires a recognition of the right of all states to live in security and peace, including Israel. This also requires a recognition of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. We believe that every transitional solution, including the present autonomy talks -- and this is a mutual view between us -- must produce an agreement on full application of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. This view must be presented in a convincing manner to the Palestinian people to win them over and to have them participate in the negotiations process. The negotiations process must not be complicated by creating faits accompli and confirming the results and events. In the European Community, we have decided not to approve of such steps that are taken unilaterally.

[Question, in English to Mubarak] Mr President, has it become more difficult for you to continue the policy of reconciliation toward Israel after the majority of the United Nations has voted for further isolation of Israel?

[Mubarak, in Arabic] I do not believe that the UN resolution on the question of the Golan should halt the negotiations on Palestinian autonomy. If we decide to halt these negotiations, we believe that we would be committing a very gross mistake with regard to the Palestinian cause. I do not believe that it [the UN resolution] would constitute an obstacle. We must continue with the negotiations on autonomy to achieve the declaration of principles which we hope to achieve and which should be reasonable and acceptable in order to encourage other parties to join the negotiations. Nothing should hinder us with regard to these negotiations.

[Question, in Arabic to Schmidt] Can we expect in the coming phase a flourishing in (?Egyptian-German) relations in the various fields?

[Schmidt, in German with Arabic translation] I expect so, and I am confident of this. I would like to refer to the excellent bilateral relations and economic relations that really exist. This is nothing new. We shall continue to strengthen this good cooperation in the future as well, both in the political and economic fields.

[Question to Mubarak in German, with Arabic translation] Mr President: Recently, you spoke much about the possibilities of rapprochement between Egypt and the Arab world. What are your expectations with regard to rapprochement between Egypt and the rest of the Arab states?

[Mubarak, in Arabic] It is clear that Egypt is proceeding with the peace process. We shall continue with this process. I have often declared and since my election as president of the republic, have continued to declare, that I will not reply to any press, Arab or otherwise, that attacks Egypt. We have been adhering to calm since then. I stated then that Egypt's doors are open to any Arab state and that the Arab League building is still standing for the Arab league. We have not abolished it. I also declared that we will find another place for the [Arab and Islamic] Peoples' League which has been set up. However, I do not want to impose myself on any of my Arab brothers, and I do not wish to embarrass any of them. The door is left open for them. When they find that the time is suitable, Egypt would welcome them.

Mubarak Departs for Vienna

NC081425 Cairo MENA in English 1405 GMT 8 Feb 82

PRESIDENT OF TOGO BEGINS 2-DAY VISIT TO BONN

LD081412 Hamburg DPA in German 1119 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 8 Feb (DPA) -- At the start of his 2-day working visit to Bonn, the president of the West African Republic of Togo, Gnassingbe Eyadema, met Federal President Karl Carstens on Monday. Prior to this Eyadema was welcomed with military honors at the Villa Hammerschmidt. The talks will be followed by a luncheon given by Carstens. On Tuesday the African politician's schedule includes meetings with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Minister of Economic Cooperation, Rainer Offergeld. The talks will probably center on the situation in Africa and economic cooperation between the two countries. Togo, a former German colony, is one of the focuses of Bonn's development policy in Africa. To date, the FRG has given the country financial and technical aid worth over DM430 million.

OPPOSITION URGES COUNTERS TO EASTERN ESPIONAGE

[Text] Bonn, 8 Feb (DPA) -- The CDU/CSU has called on the government to devote more attention to spies in Eastern embassies in Bonn. In a parliamentary question published in Bonn today, they also asked what the counterespionage service had done so far in this area. The opposition apparently assumes that, apart from its normal duties, the security authorities do not have "sufficient personnel" to stay on the track of spies in the so-called "legal residences", such as embassies, consulates, trade missions, military missions, airline offices, travel agencies, etc. It concludes this from the fact that in other Western states, "official spies" from the East are again and again exposed and expelled. "One almost never hears of such things happening here," the domestic affairs spokesman for the opposition, Carl-Dieter Spranger, said.

Since one could not assume that the security authorities were groping around completely in the dark, one had to assume that the government did not wish to know anything of these spies because of their policy of detente. According to Spranger, more than 3,000 spies from the GDR were working in the FRG alone, in addition to the spies in the embassies.

A report issued by the federal office responsible for defending the constitution in 1980 stated that a considerable proportion of the espionage threat emanated from the "legal residences." The Soviet military missions based in Buende (Westphalia), Baden-Baden and Frankfurt played a dominant role in acquring military information and knowledge in the fields of the armaments industry, communications and energy supplies. At the end of 1980, 22 officers and 28 auxiliaries were employed at these missions. In 1980 the security authorities of the Federal Republic identified the GDR as having the most active intelligence service in the East. They were the major representatives of espionage activities among communist states by virtue of the fact that they accounted for 71 percent of known recruitments and recruitment attempts and 79 percent of detected missions.

'ALLY'S FEARLESSNESS' PERMITS PEACE POLICY

[Commentary signed R.H.: "Arming Oneself"]

[Text] The Reagan administration has presented a defense budget based on facts. No concern was shown for the feelings of European peace movement followers or the anxieties of politicians who must reckon with them. The aim is to make deterrence complete again, not only nuclear deterrence against the threat to West Europe and the United States, but also with regard to non-nuclear forces in case of Soviet attack intentions everywhere in the world.

The development of the navy, for instance, could indicate a future fleet for the Indian Ocean. The development of the air transport capacity could be seen in a similar light. The Soviets have demonstrated an amazing ability in this respect. Their intention must be curtailed to simply fly according to geopolitical considerations troops and heavy equipment over other countries to remote areas. Particularly in regard to such imperialist enterprises, the planned military budget expressed skepticism regarding Moscow's preparedness to such insight. The possibility that in the post-Brezhnev era younger military leaders who want to prove their worth could come to power seems to be taken into consideration. The wide scale of armament projects reflects the realization of having been fooled by the Soviets in a decade of strategic arms control and detente in Europe through the SS-20 and the action in Africa and Asia.

Due to the feeling of their military power, the Soviets have adopted a doubtful arrogance which is, unfortunately, only seldom demonstrated to the public in such a way as during the Bonn press conference with Zamyatin. The attitude of the United States to arm itself despite economic difficulties is, therefore, the only effectove basis to negotiate with the Soviets on arms control or even disarmament. Only the fearlessness of the great ally permits pursuing a "German peace policy." Only this imperturbability in the background permits the pleasant impression that the Germans could act as an interpreter or even as an agent.

DEFENSE MINISTER OUTLINES DETERRENCE STRATEGY

PM081017 Paris LE FIGARO in French 30-31 Jan 82 p 6

[Article by Defense Minister Charles Hernu]

[Text] I think the time has come to outline the military effort in which we are involved to ensure that any attack on France and its vital interests is deterred. Indeed, since 10 May 1981 clear directions have been set as regards our deterrence strategy, as is shown by the statements made by the top state authorities; precise financial commitments have been made for 1982 and 1983; the means vital to our nuclear deterrent in order to counter present and future threats have been defined, and the first corresponding programs have been launched following a defense council session.

1 -- A Clear Doctrine

Our country has a comprehensive doctrine: The defense minister is, therefore, far from being the only person to contribute to guaranteeing France's area of freedom. In a dangerous and unpredictable world, however, the possession of a military tool remains the ultimate guarantee, the ultimate bastion of our national independence. The armed forces form a coherent whole: the field forces, the rapid assistance forces, and the nuclear force, through their specific missions, all contribute to maintaining the deterrent in time of peace -- which is still an unstable and hence an armed peace -- or of crisis. In this system the strategic nuclear force is the ultimate ratio whose role has been accurately defined by President Francois Mitterrand on several occasions:

-- France is developing its own deterrence strategy because when the time comes to make decisive choices a great country is alone;

-- France's security depends on its capacity to defend itself and on the quality and rapidity of its alliances, to which it has reaffirmed its loyalty;

-- The national territory will be defended by all available means, which are not those of the graduated response;

-- Since it has its own deterrence strategy and has nuclear forces which are credible but are out of proportion to those of the superpowers, France categorically refuses to negotiate about its nuclear arms, which, moreover, nobody is asking it to do;

-- The balance of forces between the United States and the Soviet Union is essential to peace: it is on this notion that the armament-negotiation debate should be based. In this connection France has proposed that Paris might be the place for the superpowers and other countries to discuss disarmament and collective security.

This general outline of the French position shows that it is adapted to our country's specific needs. It also has the merit of being clear and only an insincere person could fail to bow to the facts. Moreover, and this is the important point, it is understood by public opinion. As evidence of this I need only mention the very limited support which a certain kind of irrational pacifism is encountering in our country and the welcome which the nation's elected representatives gave to the budgetary effort requested for 1982. Finally, although opinion polls are indicators which should be handled with care, I note that 63 percent of French people questioned recently thought that France could not ensure its defense wihout the deterrent force and 62 percent of them thought that the force is fairly effective (note 1) (IFDP opinion poll dated 8 September 1981).

2 -- The Financial Conditions

The 1982 defense budget will increase by 17.63 percent, taking the franc at its present value, or around 4 percent in real terms, reaching around 3.89 percent of GDP. According to the government pledges, that proportion will increase to 3.94 percent in 1983, which will presuppose another substantial increase in the budget. I would like to add that if you compare our budget with that of our alliance partners, three points emerge:

-- In 1982 France will be the only major European country to clearly exceed a 3-percent growth in its military budget, although it has not given any pledge to do so, unlike the countries which are members of the NATO integrated system;

-- The French military budget has a greater absolute value than that of all other European NATO member countries;

-- As regards the percentage of the GNP, using the budgetary categories used by our allies, the only major European country in the alliance to outstrip France is the United Kingdom -- whose economic base is, however, markedly narrower -- and France is ahead of the FRG (note 2) (forecast for 1982: United Kingdom 5.2 percent; France 4.12 percent; and FRG 3.5 percent).

This sustained effort is forced on the nation by external threats. Only by strengthening international security through negotiated and balanced disarmament will it be possible to envisage detente in this sphere; and it is clear that the government led by Pierre Mauroy would like to be able to lead the superpowers onto this path. Meanwhile, we must provide ourselves with the means to ensure our defense and security.

3 -- Facing the Threats

France has acquired a deterrent through a patient process which was started nearly 30 years ago; in other words it has crossed the threshold before which our means and will might be doubted.

Since all the forces contribute to that deterrent, adequate planning is necessary to ensure their harmonious development. That will be the objective of the 5-year military plan which will be submitted to parliament some time in 1983. Without waiting until then, a number of decisions were taken recently regarding the future of the nuclear forces so as to counter possible threats in the coming years. I would like to mention in particular:

-- The increase in the rate of availability of the missile-launching nuclear submarines. At the present time a minimum of two such submarines is constantly on patrol; there are already sometimes three on patrol, the aim being to increase the submarines' actual patrol time. In addition to that, as planned, the sixth submarine will enter service in 1985 and will be equipped with MIRV'ed M4 missiles, which will make it possible to counter progress made in antimissile defenses;

-- The entry into service in 1994 of a seventh submarine of a new generation;

-- The launching of the strategic surface-to-surface mobile ballistic missile program. This system, whose vulnerability will be limited owing to its mobility and its dispersal, is the logical product of developments in the accuracy of modern devices;

-- Tactical nuclear weapons, which must be capable of dealing a militarily significant blow -- the last signal before the use of strategic forces -- will be modernized. In addition, the medium-range air-to-surface missile whose development was already underway -- which can be armed with diversified nuclear charges -- and a new mobile surface-to-surface system with a range of over 250 km will replace the Pluton missiles. In addition, research will continue on the enhanced radiation weapon;

-- Hardening the communications network. This is a particularly important point to which the United States and the USSR also attach special significance. Indeed, the value of nuclear weapons is dependent on the ability to communicate the political authority's orders at the right time and in all circumstances. It is necessary to counter what the experts call the electromagnetic pulse caused by the explosion of nuclear weapons at altitude, which has the effect of seriously disrupting modern electric and electronic networks.

In less than 12 months of office the French authorities have clarified the doctrine and defined the means whereby the credibility of our national deterrence strategy can be maintained in a difficult period characterized by a deterioration in the balance between the superpowers. It is by a vigorous national effort that our capability can be preserved in a dangerous environment. It is also thanks to the credibility and autonomy of its deterrent that France can be heeded in the world, especially in order to promote peace and disarmament with security and balance.

FIRST OF TEN PATROL BOATS DELIVERED TO LIBYANS

NC081947 Paris AFP in English 1925 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] Lorient, France, 8 Feb (AFP) -- The first of ten fast patrol boats constructed by France for Libya has been handed over to its Libyan crew here, maritime sources said today.

The vessels, constructed by the naval shipyards in Cherbourg, Northern France, underwent sea trials off this Brittany port. It was delivered to its Libyan crew on Saturday, the sources said. Informed sources said that the craft would leave Lorient shortly for Libya.

The ten vessels, similar to ships already delivered to or ordered by Iran, Israel, Greece, Nigeria and Argentina, are 49 meters long, displace 70 tons and are powered by four 4,500 horsepower diesel engines. They have a speed of about 40 knots (nautical miles per hour) and are equipped with four Otomat missiles, one 76 mm cannon and twin 40 mm automatic weapons.

PM031401 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 24 Jan 82 pp 1, 20

[Report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer's 23 January speech in Milan]

[Excerpt] "We were born 61 years ago in Leghorn. Was it wrong to give life to the Communist Party? Our answer is a strong and resounding 'No'." This was what Comrade Enrico Berlinguer said in the opening remarks of his speech yesterday in Milan's sports pavilion, which was filled with workers and citizens carrying red banners.

The maor rallies being held throughout Italy on this anniversary of the PCI's founding, Berlinguer said, are taking place in the midst of a debate on the events in Poland and on the international situation -- a debate which, by virtue of its breadth and commitment, would be unimaginable in other parties whose leaders nevertheless presume to pose as our judges and to lecture us. At the moment, in recent weeks, the Italian Communists are again proving to be a political group which -- in contrast to the narrowmindedness and pettiness that often characterize the life of other parties -- still has the ability and the strength to set itself major ideological questions and to ask itself about the future of the country and of the entire world, and all as part of a mass debate, out in the open.

So it was right for the Communist Party to be born. We do not deny our origins, Berlinguer said. We are not cutting our roots. We say this because, although it is a distant event that should provide material for historians rather than for political discussions, which should center on very different matters, some people still maintain that it would be better if the PCI had never been born. In fact an attempt is being made to confuse two aspects of the issue, the need for the PCI to be formed and the way in which it took place. With regard to the latter, the PCI's founders themselves deliberated on this for a long time and criticized it above all because the party had a minority character and initially took on a sectarian cast -- so much so that Togliatti rightly said that the PCI's real birth took place in 1926 at the Lyons congress, when Bordiga-type [Bordighiano] splittism was transcended and the foundations were laid with Gramsci, for a strategy of Italian revolution based on a system of alliances of the working class. It would however, be superficial and careless not to consider two points in this connection:

The first is that the minority in 1921 that created the Communist Party of Italy expressed and interpreted the feelings and attitudes of what was, admittedly, only one sector of the working class, but its most militant and advanced sector, which had had enough of the PSI's ineffective and opportunist conduct in the turbulent crisis of the post-World War I period and with respect to the bourgeoise state's impotence and the advance of fascism. It was natural under such conditions for that sector of the working class to regard the revolution of the Soviets and the victory of the Bolsheviks as an example to be followed. It also explains why the words that sprang spontaneously from the workers' hearts were: Do the same as in Russia. Such an objective -- which, after the terrible World War I, inspired workers and peasant in so many European countries -- was in fact impossible to achieve. But if that vanguard -- so full of confidence and vigor and driven by a resolute will to struggle -- had not been embraced in a new political organization, the PCI, it would have become fragmented and demoralized. The fact that instead it organized itself into a united, disciplined and heroic group was the first requirement for it later to be able to provide continuous resistance to fascism, while all the other political groups, however numerous and sizeable and despite respectable traditions, were swept away by the dictatorship or submitted to the extent of conspiring with it -- except for isolated individual combatants such as Sandro Pertini, for instance.

The second point to consider, and on which our critics are unable to provide an explanation, is this: How do they explain the fact that the same party formed in Leghorn on such narrow foundations and with undeniable defects and limitations of outlook and strategy later proved to be the most vital of the workers and people's parties, to the extent of becoming what the PCI is now, with its organizational strength, its political weight, its electoral influence and its international prestige?

Could all this have stemmed from a complete error, Berlinguer asked. Had it been a complete error, how long would we have been dead? In fact, however, Berlinguer said, it is precisely because our party originated from pressure on a real need, not an artificial one, that it managed to withstand all these ordeals and later managed to make the largest contribution to the defeat of fascism, to the victory of the liberation war, to the unity of the workers and people, to the founding of the democratic state and to the training of a new ruling class. It was also, and still is, the party that has introduced the greatest innovations, developments and critical modernizations into the workers movement's strategy and conduct, its struggle to surmount capitalist exploitation and its advance to socialism.

Next Berlinguer asked: What point have we now reached? Referring to the Directorate's 30 December document and to the conclusions of the latest Central Committee session, the PCI secretary general pointed out that by carrying out a thorough critical and self-critical appraisal and analyzing the present conditions in the world, Europe and Italy, the Communists have asserted the necessity and possibility of boldly and resolutely pursuing a "new path," in the knowledge that in the surmounting of capitalism in the West the thrusts stemming first from the Social Democratic attempts and experiences and later from the October Revolution and from the countries that based their order on the type established in the USSR have become exhausted.

Berlinguer confirmed that the Italian Communists' verdict on the vast significance of the October Revolution -- an event in modern history comparable only to the French Revolution in terms of the international influence for change exerted by their ideas, which reached the broad oppressed masses throughout the world more after 1917 than after 1789. So the Italian Communists confirm that they are well aware of the role played by the USSR in altering the world balance of forces to the detriment of imperialism, as well as its decisive influence in the victory against Nazism. Its world role is still important, as a counterweight to U.S. imperialism, but different from in the past both because other major revolutionary forces now emerged and oppose imperialism with their own inspiration and autonomy and because the USSR's international conduct includes stances and forms of behavior suited to power politics, which do not assist the liberation of oppressed classes and peoples and, indeed, often conflict with it. Be that as it may, Berlinguer explained, the fact remains that in foreign policy it would be mistaken and suicidal for a party such as ours to adopt a position of alignment with the USSR's foreign policy, which must rather be judged on how far its general or particular stances and individual actions reflect, or do not reflect, the interests of detente and the peoples' independence.

Blow to the Idea of Socialism

Referring next to the domestic order of the USSR and of the other East European countries, Berlinguer said it is a fact that they cannot be taken as models for a socialist society for countries such as those of Western Europe, because the objective and subjective conditions and traditions are profoundly different. Moreover, those countries have for some time been revealing increasing elements of crisis and even regression (in the economic, political and ideological fields), culminating in the Polish tragedy. All this constitutes a further blow to the image and idea of socialism; and we feel its effect, just as we felt the effect of other vicissitudes in the socialist countries and in the relations among them in recent decades, which have shaken the minds of comrades and workers.

The political and ideological effects of these negative and painful events, however, cannot be attenuated by ignoring or diluting the reality, Berlinguer continued, explaining that the reality must rather be revealed and analyzed completely so as to learn all the necessary lessons from it and above all to seek the means and objectives of a road to socialism capable of reviving the impetus, hopes and conviction of the workers, young people, women and all those who aspire to free themselves here from capitalist exploitation and from the evils of our society. They need to know and to see that this can be done, but only if we are able to depend on our own strength and ideas.

The truth must be perceived and told. Indeed how could one close one's eyes to the fact that in Poland there has been a reaction against the political power which stemmed, as is known, precisely from the working class, which should have been the mainstay of that power? Moreover, Berlinguer added, this reaction was expressed in forms that understandably did not always please many Italian workers, but this too must make us deliberate on the profundity of the gulf that had opened up between the workers masses and the party. On the other hand, as Communists and democrats we cannot accept the use of repressive measures instead of political solutions in connection with statements and demonstrations by the workers. We have stated clearly, Berlinguer continued, that our assessments are consistent with all our battles and deliberations and do not weaken, but strengthen and reinvigorate the struggle to transcend capitalism in our own country.

Berlinguer acknowledged the broad repercussions caused by the PCI's latest stances, though some commentators have sometimes seemed to misunderstand them. Some have said, "I am pleased, but now you must anandon the Marxist-Leninist framework." I doubt, Comrade Berlinguer said, whether they have ever read any Marx or Lenin. Furthermore they do not know that Marx said on several occasions that he was not a Marxist, by which he meant to reject any dogmatic approach to his works and thoughts.

As for Leninism, it was not created by Lenin but codified by Stalin. Indeed, like Marx, Lenin was an antidogmatic thinker par excellence. Moreover Lenin, perhaps even more than Marx, was a revolutionary leader who always worked and wrote in relations to specific truths or to prepare "recipes" for the future, but setting himself the aim, as Marx put it, of "resolving the problems in front of our noses." So it is absurd to talk -- as some people do -- about a "Leninist framework" and ridiculous to say that all the evils of the USSR, of the world and even of the PCI stemmed from that framework. Next, referring to an interview he granted over a year ago, Berlinguer explained what aspects of Lenin's thinking the Italian Communists consider valid and which obsolete.

Lenin discovered the need for alliances of the working class, and this has been a valuable lesson for us, Comrade Berlinguer said: Lenin fought to surmount syndicalism, corporativism and worker aristocracies, and this lesson of Lenin's is still -- indeed, now more than ever -- very topical for us. Lenin exalted voluntary action, the "subjective" aspect of the party's action, its inventive and innovative role, which transcends and transforms the facts of the present, and did not trust in a "natural" reformist evolutionism. In this respect too we have learned much from Lenin, though our party, when it became Togliatti's new party, assumed its own characteristics in its internal life.

Party Not the State

Nevertheless, Berlinguer continued, at one point Lenin identified the party with the state -- in practice, not in theory. We totally reject this identification. Moreover, Lenin always maintained that the dictatorship of the proletariat was a necessary phase in the revolutionary process. We reject this thesis, which has not been ours for a long time.

Last, Lenin maintained that revolution has two clearly separate phases: a bourgeois-democratic phase and then a socialist phase. In our opinion, however, democratic gains are the result not only of bourgeois revolutions but also in some cases particularly of the proletarian struggle -- a combination of gains the working class defends and extends. Therefore as far as we are concerned democracy is a universal value that must be guaranteed in beginning and building a socialist society. One newspaper, Berlinguer continued, commented on the proceedings of our latest Central Committee session under the following headline: "Berlinguer Criticizes USSR but Is Tough on Capitalism."

That "but" shows that the paper not only misunderstood, but understood nothing. Our criticism of the USSR does not in the least attenuate our criticism of capitalism, and indeed our very autonomy of assessment, which is now clear to everyone, strengthens our commitment to build a socialist society along an original path. It is now clear to all workers that on this path we are truly free from any outside influence, from any alleged constraints, from any mental restraints and from any ideological encumbrances.

On the other hand, Berlinguer said, we have not moved an inch away from -- and indeed are more than ever committed in our hearts and minds to -- our political and human ideals; the ideals of freedom and democracy, the workers' emancipation from exploitation and the freedom from need for every human being on earth. It is from these ideals that we proceed in gradually pursuing and formulating what we call the "third way."

AUTHORITIES MAKING GAINS IN TERRORISM PROBE

[Text] Rome, 9 Feb (ANSA) -- Italian magistrates have identified all the members of the Red Brigades cadre who mounted an armed attack against a Rome office of the Christian Democrat Party nearly three years ago in which two police agents were killed, informed sources close to the investigations reported in the evening. The reconstruction of the terrorist act, which occurred May 3, 1979, and the identification of those allegedly responsible for it was made possible through the confession given by terrorist suspect Loris Scricciolo, arrested earlier this month.

According to one source, Scricciolo also told investigating magistrates that he had taken part in the attempted kidnapping of the deputy chief of the DIGOS anti-terrorist police in Rome, Nicola Simone, on January 6 this year, in which the policeman was seriously injured. Scricciolo is a cousin of Luigi Scricciolo, the head of the international office of the UIL, the smallest of Italy's big three trade union federations. Luigi Scricciolo and his wife, Paola, were arrested in Florence on February 4 and charged with terrorist-related crimes.

On another anti-terrorist front, investigating magistrates are busy questioning 36-year-old Ivo de Rossi, arrested late last week and thought to have been the logistics chief for the "Ludmann-Cecilia" Red Brigades cadre responsible for the kidnapping of American Army General James Lee Dozier. Magistrate Guido Papalia yesterday closed his files on the first phase of investigations into the abduction of the brigadier-general in Verona on December 17. Dozier was freed by Italian special agents in a lightning raid in Padua on January 28. He was in his captors' hands for 42 days.

PAPANDREOU MESSAGE REAFFIRMS GREECE-CYPRUS TIES

NC081233 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] The following official statement was released today: Owing to various reports and comment which appear from time to time on Athens-Nicosia relations, Greek Prime Minister Papandreou conveyed, through Greek Ambassador Zakharakis, the following message to President Kiprianou and the Cypriot people:

Cyprus' most important national issue demands particularly the unity of Cypriot Hellenism, irrespective of any political affiliations and differences. I express my assurance that so far my cooperation as Greek prime minister with Mr Kiprianou -- for whom I have the highest personal respect -- and the Cyprus Government is constructive and no problem has arisen between us. I wish to stress once again that the unity of Greek Hellenism during these critical moments is a necessary prerequisite for the success of our joint goals, as is the total and unwavering coordination between the two governments.

INTERCOMMUNAL MEETING VIEWS HUMAN RIGHTS ISSUES

NC081804 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] A new meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel this afternoon. A UN communique on the meeting states that discussion of the question of basic rights and freedoms was continued during the meeting. The next meeting was scheduled for Thursday, 18 February. In a statement prior to the meeting, the UN secretary general's envoy in Cyprus, Gobbi, said a very good exchange of views is being made during the discussion of this issue. Answering a question, Gobbi said no specific subjects are being discussed and that he expected the general discussion of human rights within the framework of the constitution to be concluded at today's meeting.

The representative of the Greek Cypriot side, Ioannidhis, answering a question on whether the previous meeting saw any points of agreement, replied that the question of human rights must be dealt with as a whole. Ioannidhis added that it could be possible to start discussion of basic freedoms of movement, settlement and property at today's meeting if examination of basic human rights and freedoms were first complete. Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Onan, answering a question, said a convergence of views on many aspects of the question of basic rights and freedoms was established. He also stated that the Turkish Cypriot side accepts in principle the basic rights and freedoms and has submitted its views in its proposals, every point of which will be discussed sequentially.

INTERPARTY GOVERNMENT SEEN CAUSE OF INSTABILITY

NC090837 Nicosia O FILELVTHEROS in Greek 9 Feb 82 p 1

[Text] Having been requested to comment on interlocutor Ioannidhis' statement on the need for the formation of an interparty government, the government spokesman said the president of the republic's position on the issue is well known. Repeatedly, the spokesman added, the president has made appeals for unity. However, the president believes a political government composed of party representatives would be essentially in danger of dissolution every time differences arise among its members. The president, continued the spokesman, doubts seriously the reason for such a government, which instead of contributing to unity and stability, which is so much desired by everyone, could possibly have precisely the opposite result.

TURKISH TORPEDO BOAT VIOLATES LESVOS WATERS

FOREIGN POLICY TRENDS PRIOR TO U.S. TALKS NOTED

NC081433 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 7 Feb 82 p 1

[Text] The Greek Government is planning the next steps in its foreign policy, having at least 3 months at its disposal to arrive at final decisions. From Prime Minister Papandreou's visit to Bonn to the scheduled meetings with Secretary of State Haig on 8 May in Brussels and with President Reagan on 10 June in Paris, there is a time interval in which to make a final assessment of foreign issues and decide on the general lines of negotiation tactics. There are of course many pending issues, but most of these are closely related since all of them come under one "agenda" to be discussed during the Greek-U.S. talks in May and June.

In its relations with NATO, the Greek Government has stated very explicitly that the Rogers plan is suspended and that Greece's relations with the alliance remain uncertain because there is no effective guarantee of the eastern borders. Since NATO cannot honor these guarantees and since Turkey has the right to veto all decisions, it is reasonable to ask guarantees from the United States. On the other hand, in adopting a clear wait-and-see stand toward the Greek Government, the U.S. administration seems to perceive that the guarantees issue will perhaps be the most substantive one to be raised by Mr Papandreou even before the talks on the bases begin. Certain preliminary indications do not preclude the possibility that these guarantees ultimately may be given and actually in a relatively more "concrete" statement than in "Kissinger's letter."

According to the same indications, it is possible that the substantive exchanges for which the Greek Government will ask (principally in the field of arms for the Greek armed forces, with materiel to be chosen by the government) will be accepted by the U.S. side, given the fact that this will cost much less than the transfer to another country of the bases in Greece. It is very probable that the U.S. administration in return will ask for some sort of "alignment" of Greek foreign policy with that of the other NATO countries, knowing, however, that this cannot be a full alignment or cover all issues.

Prime Minister Papandreou's visit to Bonn and his talks with Chancellor Schmidt perhaps have given an example of the international climate toward Greece. These talks may enable the government to detect the more general line on which the "bigger" and "smaller" allies will move in the immediate future. The talks also allow an opportunity to ascertain that the foreign policy followed by the government so far, a policy of "overtures" on various issues, has produced certain positive results, since the outstanding issues under negotiation in the immediate past have increased more than ever before.

ALBANIAN ELECTRICITY AGREEMENT -- Within the framework of promoting Greek-Albanian cooperation in the electricity sector, an agreement was signed today on construction of a new powerline to connect the electric grids of the two countries through the high-voltage substations at Elbasan and Kardhia in the Ptolemais area. The new electricity connection, which is expected to become operative in the first half of 1984, will facilitate the parallel functioning of the networks of the two countries and will make it possible to increase the purchase or sale of electric energy between Greece and Albania. GENSCHER SAYS FRG COMMITTED TO SAVING CSCE

[Text] Bonn, 8 Feb (AFP) -- The German Government is committed to saving the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), which opens in Madrid tomorrow, "despite Poland and because it is the only East-West forum in existence," sources close to the government said here.

Polish Deputy Foreign Minister Josef Wiejacz, in a statement reported Saturday by the Soviet news agency TASS quoting the Polish agency PAP, threatened to boycott the so-called detente forum if Poland comes under fire as the "accused" in a trial of its martial law regime. The United States, supported by Britain and Canada, already forsees the CSCE adjourning following the debate on Poland, West German sources said here, while West Germany, The Hague, Denmark and Iceland are opposed to suspending the CSCE and Italy and Belgium favor a compromise.

West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher will meet today in Madrid with American Secretary of State Alexander Haig on the need to keep the CSCE functioning, the sources said.

The 35-member CSCE includes all the European nations except Albania, plus the United States and Canada. Mr Genscher said on West German television yesterday that this CSCE meeting was particularly important since it would "get underway" the project for a European disarmament conference which calls for confidence-building measures in military matters to be implemented on Soviet territory.

Chancellor Helmut Schmidt expressed (?concern) yesterday when he told a Niederrhein Social Democratic Party congress that there was a danger of "a return to the cold war." Bonn is counting in Madrid on the support of neutral and non-aligned countries to keep the CSCE alive, the government source said. "Once broken, dialogue will be extremely difficult to resume and it is undispensable to pursue the policy of the Atlantic alliance, as expressed in the Harmel Report in 1967 which calls for both military vigilance and ongoing political dialogue," the source said.

A summary of the West German arguments for keeping the CSCE in session, as expressed by a senior West German official who asked not to be identified, were:

1 -- "As long as the CSCE is in session, Moscow can not withdraw from the Polish controversy. If this process, the only current East-West forum, is stopped by the West, Moscow can withdraw from the debate by claiming that Washington favours confrontation."

2 -- The European Disarmament Conference, to be promoted by the CSCE, is "no gift to Moscow."

3 -- "By breaking off or suspending the CSCE, neither Poland nor other Eastern countries which wish to maintain dialogue would be helped... Europeans must work together in Madrid for moderation even if it is necessary to talk in hard terms of the Polish situation, as French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy urged during his visit to Bonn."

WIEJACZ RULES OUT CSCE DEBATE ON POLISH CRISIS

LD082128 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] Polish Deputy Foreign Minister Jozef Wiejacz told Spanish Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca today that his country does not wish to be put in the dock at the Madrid conference.

The events in Poland, the deputy minister said, may be very serious but they concern only the Poles. He explained that what the Polish Government has done in the country is what is believed to be appropriate in view of the serious situation confronting it.

AUSTRIA'S PAHR OPPOSES ADJOURNMENT OF CSCE

[Report previewing reopening of Madrid meeting, statements by Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr -- date and place not specified]

[Excerpts] While most foreign ministers of the Western countries will arrive in Madrid as early as Monday in order to speak at the first plenary session of the [CSCE follow-up] meeting on Tuesday and to express criticism of the restriction of human rights in Poland, Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr will go to Madrid a few days later. At the second plenary session on Friday of next week he will draw attention with particular emphasis to the current serious situation and the resulting extreme dangers to Europe and to world peace. Pahr declared that naturally he would also take a stance on Poland, but that it was necessary, "especially in view of the present tense situation which is obviously heading for a confrontation, to propose necessary, positive steps leading to cooperation and to coexistence."

Commenting on the U.S. proposal to adjourn the Madrid consultations, Pahr declared that he regarded such a step as "unsuitable." "Obviously," Pahr said, "instead of curing the patient they want to wait until his illness gets even worse. It is necessary to find ways to achieve a better implementation of the [Helsinki] final act, also regarding Poland. For that reason alone an adjournment would be a wrong solution. However, we would not oppose a general wish of the conference to have a recess."

The foreign minister drew attention to the concluding document -- submitted by the neutral and nonaligned states in December -- which, he said, contained "positive elements" which could be implemented to make progress toward the aim of detente and disarmament in Europe. Europe is an area of intensive armament and thus a great source of danger for military conflicts with unforeseeable consequences, Pahr said.

TENSION OVER POLISH CRISIS MARS CSCE SESSION

LD091128 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1100 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Text] Amid great tension, a new plenary session of debates in the Conference on Security and Cooperation has opened in Madrid, this time with the attendance of most of the Western foreign ministers. The first speech was by the Hungarian delegate, who defended the need to maintain the process of dialogue initiated in Helsinki and stressed the danger posed by the West's alleged interference in the internal affairs of other countries.

The second to speak was Canadian Foreign Minister MacGuigan, who said the draft drawn up as the final document of the Madrid conference is no longer valid. It is necessary to revise it and adopt a much tougher document in the section on human rights. He did not ask for the adjournment of the conference, but he very firmly accused the USSR of provoking the military coup in Poland. MacGuigan will shortly give a press conference. Given that the speeches are being made behind closed doors, the German, French and U.S. ministers, and the Polish ambassador chairing the session, are also due to speak to journalists.

Haig Accuses USSR

LD091238 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Felipe Sahagun report from the 9 February session of the CSCE at the Madrid Palace of Congresses and Exhibitions]

[Text] At the moment U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig is speaking -- he accused the USSR and Poland of violating the Helsinki agreements on human rights. With the military coup in Poland, he said, the principles of these negotiations have been wrecked. He asked for the lifting of martial law in Poland and the release of all political prisoners. Only if these conditions are fulfilled, he said, will the United States return to a dialogue at the CSCE.

Prior to Haig there were speeches from the Polish, Belgian, Canadian and Hungarian ministers. The Polish minister defended his country's decision to impose martial law as a necessity supported by the Polish people. He denied that acts of violence were committed in his country. Madrid, he said, is not a court and this conference should be discussing detente and not speaking about accused and accusers. With 2 hours of the conference gone by, it is clear that the standpoints could not be further apart. The Belgian was much tougher than expected and he also reached the point of suggesting the possibility of breaking off the conference. Western diplomatic sources assured us that today's plenary session will adjourn at 1330 or 1400.

Spanish Minister Bids for Time

[Text] Toughness is being shown in the debates at the CSCE, which reopened in Madrid this morning. A report on this from Pedro Galindo:

At the moment Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca is addressing the plenum of the CSCE which is taking place at the Palace of Congresses and Exhibitions in Madrid. Perez-Llorca has said that instead of asking for the break-up of the conference Spain has applied for time so that tensions may be reduced and dialogue resumed under more suitable conditions. Unlike the United States, which makes the continuation of the conference conditional on the Polish situation, Perez-Llorca said; We are not among those who think that time alone heals wounds, but we do believe the passage of time could help to bring some moderation and realism to those who by their actions have contributed so much to the European peoples' once again feeling threatened.

Perez-Llorca said the Spanish Government always believed that, more than a mere instrument of negotiation, CSCE should be a forum for discussion and analysis and, in principle, should continue as such, but only if certain basic requirements are upheld. Among these basic requirements Perez-Llorca mentioned fulfillment of the text of the Helsinki final act, such as nonviolation of human rights, noninterference in the internal affairs of other countries or in the territorial integrity of states. Perez-Llorca also said dialogue and detente have to be built on facts, and an especially relevant fact became evident on 13 December 1981, the date on which the Polish authorities declared a state of war in Poland and proceeded to adopt a series of measures which severely restricted the freedom of the Spanish [as heard] people. From that date on, the Spanish minister of foreign affairs added, Poland has known the sad privilege of being the center of attention of a good part of mankind. He put a question to all those attending the plenary session: Are the Polish authorities the only ones responsible for what is now happening in Poland? It is clear to Perez-Llorca that the Soviet Union cannot be excluded from responsibility.

Pole Attempts Adjournment

[Report on 9 February CSCE session at the Madrid Palace of Congresses and Exhibitions]

[Text] Since about 1500 the Madrid CSCE has been paralyzed by a debate on procedure brought up by the West. When Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs Perez-Llorca ended his address, the chairman of the session, the Polish ambassador, said that today's session was convened as a morning session and, therefore, debates should be adjourned until Friday, when the new session begins under the chairmanship of Portugal. The Spanish minister and (?other Western representatives) replied to the Pole, saying that his interpretation of the regulations was very free. Perez-Llorca told him to let all the ministers who had come to Madrid speak, if only out of courtesy. Poles and other Eastern representatives insisted that this could not happen and, since any decision has to be unanimous, at 1600 the ministers and other delegates are still involved in a tough battle on procedure which has, if possible, worsened the climate of the conference -- already very tense because of the tough speeches made by both sides this morning. If this csce continues beyond today it will do so under very adverse conditions.

U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig is now giving a news conference. No sooner had he begun than he accused the Polish delegation of preventing some of the delegates from getting the opportunity to speak and he reiterated what he had said in his speech this morning. He said that the United States will not continue negotiating as though nothing has happened while the present situation in Poland continues. Shortly before this the Spanish minister said that the best thing would not be to break up the conference, but to let some time pass until present tensions are reduced.

Polish Chairmanship 'Appalling'

LD092228 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Text] The future of the CSCE hangs in the air. Tomorrow could see it adjourned until Friday because of Polish obstruction of the discussion. The third part of today's session of the conference lasted 30 minutes, from 2100 to 2130. Here is what Javier Ruperez, head of the Spanish delegation, had to say when he was interviewed at the Madrid Palace of Congresses: [Begin Reperez recording] Well, today's session is over. It ended badly, in a shameful fashion because it was conducted in a shameful fashion. The way the Poles chaired the session was quite appalling. The attitude of the Soviet Union, which of course was giving minute instructions to its Polish satellite, was equally appalling. We were treated to a shameful spectacle of boycott and censorship exactly like that which the Polish people are unfortunately suffering at this moment in their own country. [end recording]

Cheysson Expresses 'Outrage'

LD092302 Paris Domestic Service in French 2100 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Things are going badly in Madrid between the Western countries and the East block countries. The madrid CSCE has the objective of making an assessment of the Helsinki accords, accords which are the fruit of detente and which prescribe a certain amount of international rules on human rights. Not all the foreign ministers gathered there were even allowed to speak. The problem, of course, is Poland. Moscow did not want it discussed, and the Western countries insist on that above all else.

The French minister of external relations was thus one of those who was not allowed to speak. He was not able to outline France's position, and he is outraged and saddened by the turn of events. Listen to Claude Cheysson:

[Begin Cheysson recording] We came to discuss security, disarmament, freedom, human rights -- in fact, everything for which Helsinki was designed. Of course we spoke about Poland first because it is there that the violations have taken on the most upsetting, tragic characteristics. Indeed, this morning both sides were able to talk: The East bloc countries expressed their views and these are not the same as ours; the Western countries demonstrated their reprobation, their condemnation, their analysis of the situation in East Europe.

Then, using an intellectual mechanism which I have difficulty in understanding, the East bloc countries decided to block the second half of the session. That is, the speeches by the others. This thus represented discrimination among the countries since half of them were able to speak out but not the other half. This is a curious concept of freedom of expression in this place which, in principle, is supposed to permit dialogue.

LF101220 Hamburg DPA in German 1133 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn 10 Feb (DPA) -- According to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the question of breaking off the CSCE conference in Madrid in the sense of totally ending the meeting is not under discussion. It is the view of all Western delegations that the CSCE process must be kept alive in order to achieve East-West stabilization, said Genscher in a Deutschlandfunk interview today.

How things are to proceed in Madrid is still, however, an open question. The federal foreign minister announced that on Friday the Western allies will discuss how and in what form the conference could be continued. Genscher drew attention to a "number of voices" which, out of concern for the CSCE process, are appealing for a break in the conference to prevent the increasing buildup of a climate of confrontation. These arguments should also be taken seriously, he said in the interview, the text of which was published by the Foreign Office.

A continuation of the CSCE process would be assured if it were decided to interrupt the conference "for a certain period of time but with a fixed date determined for continuing it." It cannot be said at the moment, however, that the trend is running in this direction, said Genscher. This depends substantially on the attitude of the Eastern states at the conference "and yesterday's order of agenda tricks were really not very encouraging."

Conference Could Be Postponed

LD101354 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1300 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] According to information received by this news program from reliable diplomatic sources, the impression at the moment in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe is that it could be postponed in 3 or 4 weeks because work has come to a standstill and there has been little progress in the East-West dialogue. The postponement of the Madrid conference would be the only way of avoiding a definitive break in the dialogue, we have been told. If this were to happen, the meeting of the 35 signatory countries of the Helsinki Act could reopen after the summer, possibly on 5 September.

SIGNING OF USSR POWER AGREEMENT SET FOR MARCH

[Summary] Vienna -- After 2 years of negotiations, a treaty on the exchange of electirc power between Austria and the USSR will be signed in Moscow, presumably in March. This was stated by Director General Fremuth of the Austrian Federal Power Company on Friday after the signing of a protocol on these negotiations by him and Nikolay Lopatin, USSR deputy minister of power and electrification. Lopatin had come to Vienna as head of an experts delegation to attend the first session of the Joint Work Group for Energetics. The main topic of the talks was the power exchange between the two countries, and agreement was reached in principle on this exchange. According to Fremuth, an annual power exchange of 550 megawatts is envisaged as of 1985, with Austrian summer power to be exchanged for Soviet winter night-power, taking advantage of the time difference.

The technical prerequisities for this exchange will be the construction of a 750 kilovolt transmission line from the Ukraine to Budapest, and of a two-system 380 kilovolt transmission line from Budapest to the Vienna-Oberlaa transformer station, as well as a direct-current coupling plant in Duernrohr, Lower Austria. This will require Hungarian investments of 1 billion schillings. Since some details are still unresolved, final talks are to be held in Moscow in March, and a long-term treaty with a running period of between 20 and 25 years is to be concluded. Both sides are taking a positive view on expanding the bilateral power exchange to a multilateral one to include Italy and Switzerland, and regard it as realizable.

TRADE DEFICIT WITH USSR DOUBLES IN 1981

AU041334 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 4 Feb 82 p 8

[Summary] In 1981 Austria's deficit in trade with the Soviet Union reached about 13.6 billion schillings. That is twice as much as a year ago. Although exports went up 30 percent to 7.5 billion schillings, imports rose 21.2 billion schillings. According to the Austrian trade delegate in the USSR, Draszczyk, 90 percent of Austria's imports from the USSR were energy deliveries and another 6 percent were raw materials, semi-finished goods as well as machinery and vehicles. The structure of Austrian exports to the USSR continued to deteriorate in 1981, as the trend toward increased delivery of semi-finished goods continued. While the share of these products substantially increased and for the first time reached 60 percent of Austria's total exports to the USSR, the share of machinery and vehicles declined to 14 percent and that of chemical products and consumer goods was 10 percent.

ARAB ENVOYS 'UNDERSTAND' NEED FOR CONTROLS

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "Ekoe"]

[Excerpt] Vienna -- The Arab ambassadors accredited in Vienna have full understanding for the intensified control of all Arabs living in Austria, the watching of Arab associations, strict entry regulations and other security measures by the Austrian government. This assurance was given to Chancellor Kreisky on Thursday by Tunisian Ambassador Ahmed Ghezal, doyen of his Arab colleagues. Kreisky had asked the diplomats to the Chancellery to discuss the planned measures with them. The immediate cause of this diplomatic "security summit," on which a news blackout was imposed, was the latest threats by the al-'Asifah terrorist organization against members of the Austrian Government.

LUXEMBOURG FOREIGN MINISTER VISITS VIENNA

AU091249 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1100 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Text] Luxembourg Foreign Minister Mrs Colette Flesch arrived at noon today for an official visit to Vienna. Madame Flesch, who at the same time is also deputy prime minister and heads the Departments of Foreign Commerce, Economics and Middle Classes and of Justice, will have talks with President Kirchschlaeger, Chancellor Kreisky and Foreign Minister Pahr. Since there are no serious problems whatever between Austria and Luxembourg, the talks will presumably center on European questions and problems of economic integration.

AGRICULTURE MINISTER ACQUIRES ARAB CONTRACTS

AU091508 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 9 Feb 82 p 9

[Summary] Vienna -- During his recent Middle East trip Minister of Agriculture Haiden obtained a number of orders for Austrian companies. Under the sponsorship of the Ministry of Agriculture, Austrian firms will construct in the United Arab Emirates an agricultural complex with irrigation installations, machinery and breeding cattle. Austria is to build in Saudi Arabia a complete stud farm with riding halls and stables as well as other recreation facilities. Moreover, seed processing plants worth 150 million schillings will be delivered to Saudi Arabia by the Stockerau Heid machine factory and the Linz Saatbau Company.

The Steyr-Daimler-Puch Corporation has obtained Saudi Orders for a tractor assembling plant in Riyadh. In addition, the company will supply 1,000 to 1,500 Steyr tractors to Saudi Arabia, and several hundred trucks to the United Arab Emirates.

ENERGY CONSUMPTION DECREASES -- In 1981, Austrians consumed 4.5 percent less energy than in 1980. Electric power consumption did not increase in 1981, oil consumption declined 8 percent and that of natural gas 5.5 percent. The consumption of coal went up 5 percent and that of heat supplied by central heating stations by 12.5 percent. At a Vienna press conference, Trade Minister Staribacher declared that Austria's energy supply for this winter was ensured. Poland is punctually delivering the newly agreed reduced coal quotas, he said, and supplementary coal deliveries from France and the FRG have been contracted. POLISH MINISTER'S PRESS CONFERENCE UNCONVINCING

["J.A." report: "Mr Czyrek's Nuances"]

[Text] It is not easy to be convincing when you have to keep repeating yourself. Polish Foreign Minister Czyrek experienced that on Thursday afternoon when he met with journalists to vaunt the merits of what he obstinately calls the "renewal of socialism" in Poland. The only piece of real news from that interview -- and it still has to be verified -- relates to the possible lifting of the "measures stemming from martial law" at the end of February. "We will make every effort to do that," Mr Czyrek said, although he added that martial law itself would remain in force. As can be seen, the nuance is subtle. That is particularly so since the minister did not deny that opposition to the regime could increase among young Polish people oversensitive to "U.S. propaganda...."

In addition Mr Czyrek reiterated General Jaruzelski's proposal to Western governments to hand over detainees who might ask to leave the country. Nonetheless he used the unemployment in the West to justify the fact that most Poles who are not interned are forbidden to leave Poland. However, that ban should be gradually relaxed; for instance, group tourism might be allowed again in April and individual tourism a month later.

Aside from that, the Polish foreign minister hid behind artistic vagueness: No details of the fate awaiting the detainess and of the tension in the Polish Politburo (of which he is nonetheless a member); wishful thinking on a dialogue with the church: and a rather convincing condemnation of Western interference in Polish affairs (interference which apparently contrasts with the Soviet attitude). Mr Czyrek, who refused to say whether or not he had been given prior warning of the 13 December "coup," did place great emphasis, however, on the inconvenience of the U.S. sanctions. He admitted that a sharp drop in living standards had to be expected following the "painful" price increases just introduced and compared martial law to "an umbrella in whose shade it will be possible to implement the reforms."

With regard to his brief meeting with Mr Cheysson on Wednesday, the minister disputed the fact that it lasted only 35 minutes. "Perhaps watches in Warsaw and Paris are not on the same time," he suggested. He also denied describing Mr Walesa as an "extremist," as the Quai d'Orsay nonetheless continues to assert. A little later in the conversation, Mr Czyrek, forgetting his denial, again criticized the Solidarity leader. In conclusion, the minister reiterated General Jaruzelski's argument that the coup was the "lesser evil."

"People are trying to play on certain aspects of East-West relations with the help of the Polish map at our expense," he said. "We want none of that. Poland has paid a very high price on many occasions for such a role, and we want to spare our people such a fate."

DELORS CONCLUDES FINANCIAL AGREEMENTS WITH BRAZIL

PY060314 Brasilia Domestic Service in Portuguese 2200 GMT 5 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Planning Minister Delfim Neto today concluded financial agreements in Paris which will make it possible to build hydroelectric plants. Overall investments contracted in France for the hydroelectric projects amount to $1,234,000,000 or nearly 168 billion cruzeiros. The agreements provide for the purchase by Brazil of four freighters designed to transport petrochemical products, hospital equipment and railway material, for loans earmarked for improving the subway systems and for the sewer system in Sao Paulo.

After a meeting today by Minister Neto and French Economy and Finance Minister Jacques Delors, a joint communique was issued to announce the conclusion of the talks and the French Government's decision to participate in two more packages of Brazilian projects: the radar program and the financing of a satellite, and the minihydroelectric plants in Mato Grosso and Mato Grosso do Sul.

BERLINGUER BARI SPEECH REBUTS KOMMUNIST ARTICLE

PM081651 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 1 Feb 82 pp 1-2

[Ugo Baduel report]

[Excerpts] Bari -- Problems of terrorism following the Italian police's success in freeing General Dozier and terrorism's relation to the entirely political aspect of the morality issue; the Italian parties' and forces' reactions to the stances recently adopted by the PCI and to the proposals it is putting forward; outside reactions, especially Soviet ones, to the PCI's appraisals and deliberations in connection with events in Poland -- these were the current issues dealt with by Comrade Berlinguer in his speech yesterday morning here at the Petruzzeli Theater which ended the 2-day conference of Communist women, administrators and leaders on the problems of southern Italy.

Comrade Berlinguer discussed the reactions prompted by the PCI's stances on events in Poland and on the problems of socialism, in Italy and abroad. It must be noted first of all, he said, that there is a certain degree of provincialism in the comments by various Italian political representatives and certain press organs. Provincialism because they immediately hastened to discuss how far our stances would influence balances in the government and within the parties. Some of them went as far as to offer, as a gracious gift, to consider us worthy of supporting some new kind of government from outside. All these thoughts concerning immediate Italian political affairs were completely divorced from the problems -- of such vast importance for the history and future of the workers movement -- behind our deliberations and decisions.

Some commentators, moreover, believed they could argue that our latest stances were made possible thanks to the other parties, which guaranteed Italy's freedom and democracy. However, Berlinguer said energetically, I wonder whether anybody could deny that the PCI itself made a very major, if not exclusive, contribution to the restoration of a democratic system in Italy and that, thanks to its strong and extensive ties with the working class and working people, subsequently defended it against the attacks of all kinds that were due basically to the DC (as in 1953 with the swindle law [legge truffa] or in 1960 with the Tambroni affair) whereas nobody can cite a single act by our party that conflicted with the democratic and constitutional rules.

As for our international autonomy, which is allegedly recognizeable only now, the PCI secretary general contined, it seems to me that it is embarrassing for some of our critics to remember that even under Togliatti and Longo on several occasions and on significant matters (ranging from the Yalta memorandum to the invasion of Czechoslovakia) the Communist Party was able to issue free and autonomous verdicts, critical appraisals, which of course have been developed both in recent years and now on the basis of new factors that have prompted us to adopt new postures. For some time, however, we have been waiting for the DC, the Social Democratic Party, the PRI and the Liberal Party leaders to show toward Washington some kind of spirit of criticism and independence even remotely comparable to the kind that we have shown toward everyone. And this demand now concerns the PSI too.

Then, Berlinguer said, continuing with his list, there are those who say "it is not enough" and who are certainly not lacking and who will never be lacking. They are the ones who say: Very well, the PCI has been good, but it is not enough because it should declare that the October Revolution was an error, that the PCI should not have been born, that Marx should be set aside, that Lenin should be discarded, that socialism does not exist and will never exist; and last that the Communists should organize into splinter groups like the other parties, to be recognized as truly democratic and truly Western -- in short, that it would be best if the Communists were no longer communists.

We have replied clearly and fully to all these issues concerning the origins, history, ideological heritage and characteristics, of our party, Berlinguer said -- of a party that naturally does not repudiate itself and that at the same time is able to sharpen its critical approach and to update and modernize itself. But let it also be clear that nobody must assume that we Communists will cease to be communists in the special way in which we Italian Communists have grown up and developed.

Having reasserted these necessary replies, Berlinguer said that the Communists would, however, be making a major error if they failed to consider the significance of the two positive repercussions of their latest stances. First the fact that it has now become impossible for any responsible political group or politician to continue saying that there is still a valid preclusion against the PCI. This means that, albeit belatedly, there is acknowledgement in principle of the possibility of alternation in the country's political leadership involving the PCI, thus putting an end to the lame democracy, the limited democracy, that is, that democracy that is incomplete on the left, that has caused so much damage to society and to the state and to the development of the republic that stemmed from the constitution and the resistance.

The possibility of an alternative does not yet mean that it is easy to achieve, but the innovation -- which we must succeed in recognizing, Berlinguer said -- is that the other parties can no longer resort to excuses, false pretexts and ideological diversion tactics. If, however, despite everything, they still persist, even more light will be thrown on the real reasons -- hitherto concealed or unacknowledged -- for the resistance to a democratic alternative -- reasons, as we have long been saying, connected with the defense of social privileges and positions of power, which harm the nation. But this will make it less difficult to combat and defeat them. The fact is, Berlinguer said, that now "the emperor has no clothes". This means that all political parties and groups will be forced increasingly to come to terms no longer with false problems but with Italy's real problems and with how to govern, reform and regenerate Italy.

So people must not expect us to start begging and pleading for admittance to government on any terms. That is not our task: our task is to work, struggle and develop our initiatives to put an end to the era of governments that do not govern and to create conditions and convergences for a change of course, that is, for a government alternative comprising the PCI too.

The other positive factor that must be recognized, Berlinguer continued, is the repercussion that our stances have had in a broad sector of democratic public opinion, especially among young people. One can observe several signs of recognition of the consistency, courage and calm with which we have shouldered all our responsibilities toward the Italian people and the world workers movement. And, Berlinguer said, I believe I can state that the defense of the PCI and of its positive national role from unfair and arrogant attacks aimed at weakening and splitting it is a defense that many Italians, including some very distant from us, consider a national duty, because the PCI, as it is, is one of Italy's assets.

Next the PCI secretary general replied to the accusations -- following PRAVDA's -- now leveled at the Italian Communists by the CPSU ideological journal KOMMUNIST. Berlinguer confirmed that the KOMMUNIST article, a lengthy text, will be published in full in RINASCITA, just as L'UNITA published the PRAVDA article. We state at once, he added, that this polemic is not taking place on equal bases. Indeed, whereas readers of the Italian Communist newspapers are fully acquainted with the Soviet arguments, Soviet readers still know nothing of what the Italian Communists actually believe and say. They are not acquainted with the 30 December Directorate document, the Central Committee debate or the L'UNITA articles in reply to PRAVDA.

According to KOMMUNIST, Berlinguer continued, we have an "abstract" and "hazy" idea of socialism. We believe not. Our ideas about socialism include the following very specific and clear one:

Socialism must guarantee the utmost acquaintance with the facts, the maximum information, as a precondition for summoning the broad masses to participate actively in political life and its leadership, but whereas we acquaint our comrades with the real facts, with the versions of them provided by all sides (as we have done, and are still doing, with regard to Poland) and acquaint them with the documents involved in the CPSU's polemic with the PCI, Soviet communists and citizens have known, and still know, nothing about our stances and arguments. Our comrades and Italian citizens can therefore issue an informed verdict, express their own opinions of either agreement or disagreement, whereas Soviet citizens, whether party members or not, cannot do so.

Next Berlinguer discussed the substance of the polemic, proceeding from the following assertion: It is the facts that are most important. It is from them, he added, that we must proceed when making any general appraisal. So it is abstract for people to ignore the facts and to set dogma above them. And it is still, and always, the facts we wish to discuss and to come to terms with. For that matter, what other criterion should communists, Marxists, have, if not this: To proceed from reality? We have been answered with insults and accusations. "Sacrilege." Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta was right when he said that here we are no longer in the realm of reason but in the realm of theology. Moreover, Berlinguer asked, who among the communists should be the depository of what is sacred, the real interpreter of this new theology that passes judgment on sinners, heretics and schismatics? So it is on the facts that we await replies. Such replies have not yet been forthcoming.

And Berlinguer did indeed go on to discuss the facts. What is the reason for the Polish crisis; he asked. What are the real causes of the collapse of confidence in its leaders, who have been governing for over 30 years? Why the military solution instead of a democratic and socialist one? But the Italian Communists have put other questions to the Soviet leaders too. Why was there external intervention in 1968 in Czechoslovakia to cut short a new development in that country, which was decided on and led by the Communist Party Central Committee and backed by the workers and intellectual forces? Why was there military intervention in 1980 in Afghanistan -- a neutral and friendly country -- violating fundamental principles of independence and sovereignty?

All this, Berlinguer said, reveals a tendency to deal with real contradictions with force rather than by using democratic and socialist potentials, the consensus, initiative and involvement of the masses. You cannot attribute all the blame to the class adversaries or go as far as to include among the class adversaries us, the Italian Communists, men and women of a party that has combated, and every day stands up to, the enemies of the working class, of democracy and socialism. KOMMUNIST says we have gone over "to the alignment of forces combating socialism." Let our comrades say whether this is so, Berlinguer exclaimed -- the comrades who on so many occasions, answering the party's appeal, have been the protagonists of so many struggles against the imperialists, colonialists and warmongers: of the struggles for the liberation and independence of the peoples of Algeria, Vietnam, Cuba, Angola, Mozambique and El Salvador.

Addressing his very attentive audience, Berlinguer added: You say -- you protagonists of the broad European and world movement for disarmament, peace cooperation among the peoples, you who are committed to the unceasing defense of the interests and aspirations of the workers and unemployed, laborers and peasants, pensioners and women -- you say whether you consider yourselves on the side of imperialism and capitalism or whether you consider yourselves loyal to the ideals of peace and socialism.

The Soviet comrades, Berlinguer continued, accuse the PCI of "wanting to impose their own model of socialism on others." Exactly the opposite is true; we want respect and appreciation for all the ideas of democracy and socialism which are emerging in such great numbers among men and women throughout the world; and above all we want respect for every people's right to choose their own path, without impositions from anyone.

We believed that the times of anathemas had passed. Instead we are hearing again the expressions of people who consider themselves responsible for protecting dogma and who believe that they can pass sentences, considering themselves some kind of supreme tribunal. Let us remember that too many errors and too much damage have been caused by such methods in the past. Let us remember in particular that in 1949 the Yugoslav communists were condemned in a tone and even in words unfortunately similar to the ones now being used against us.

The main charge, Berlinguer said, leveled at that party, which led an extraordinary national, people's and antifascist revolution and which wanted to pursue its own path to socialism, was in fact the charge of having "gone over to the enemy camp." At the time we Italian Communists too supported that charge and shared responsibility for it. There was Stalin and there was the Cominform. There was a different situation within the communist movement. But later, following the 20th CPSU Congress in 1956, the error was recognized and corrected. Khrushchev took the well-known demarches, apologized and restored relations. The full right to the diversity of roads to socialism was recognized. And Togliatti too carried out a self-criticism for that error and the part played in it by the Italian Communists, and even spoke in terms of a "felicitious misdeed" on the Yugoslavs' part, because by rejecting imposition, not only did they not go over to the imperialist camp, but they stood firm and pursued, albeit amid major difficulties, their own original path to socialism and here among the founders of the great world movement of nonaligned countries, which has played and still plays an essential role in the struggle for peace and cooperation.

In 1956, Berlinguer continued, following our shared self-criticism for the 1948 errors, all the communist parties undertook not to repeat such errors. We Italian Communists have honored that commitment, for instance by rejecting the "excommunication" of China, despite our disagreements -- including profound ones -- with it. Now, however, we have the impression that the intention is to repeat with the Italians the serious error of 1948. This worries us -- not for our own sake, Berlinguer said, but because a return to those methods would be a regression that would harm all communist and workers parties and all liberation and progressive movements. And we believe it would harm the CPSU too.

Our outlook is very different from this, the PCI secretary general said -- no anathemas, but free debates; no leading parties but equal-based relations. We talk in terms of a new kind of internationalism. This means proceeding from the major contradictions of a world now living under the threat of nuclear disaster, the threat to peace, survival and the balance of life on earth. It means a commitment to surmounting the gulf between rich and poor, between those with too much and those dying of starvation, between those who possess resources, information and technology and those who do not. There must be a commitment to the disarmament, equality and sovereignty of all nations and to international cooperation. It is for these objectives that we communist and progressive parties and peace-loving and liberation forces throughout the world must debate and work.

RED BRIGADES TAKE WEAPONS IN ARMY BARRACKS RAID

AU091533 Rome ANSA in English 1545 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Naples, 9 Feb (ANSA) -- Four Red Brigades urban guerrillas raided an Italian Army barracks near here last night, immobilized the eighteen soldiers stationed there, and got away with a large assortment of arms, police sources confirmed today. The barracks was at Santa Maria Capua Vetere just forty kilometers south of Naples. According to the police, the arms included two mortars, two bazookas, four heavy machine-guns and 44 automatic rifles. A police reconstruction said the four urban guerrillas scales the buildings outside wall and immobilized the four soldiers on guard and the fourteen asleep inside the building gagging them and tying them to their beds. They then went to the armory, broke in and took the arms to two vehicles waiting outside.

POPE STRESSES WORKERS' RIGHT TO JOIN TRADE UNIONS

LD091526 Vatican City in English to Central and West Europe 1445 GMT 9 Feb 82

Speaking in French, the pope expressed his gratitude for their solidarity towards his country at this moment when workers and the entire population are being subjected to severe trials. The holy father spoke about those in Poland who are suffering greatly from the official measures imposed for almost 2 months now -- those who have lost their lives, those who have been wounded, those who have been arrested and imprisoned, those who have been tried and severely punished and those who have lost their jobs because of their convictions.

John Paul II recalled the first congress of Solidarnosc in Danzig, his meeting about a year ago with Lech Walesa and other representatives of the independent and free trade union, and he equally recalled that the head of the delegation from the Government of the People's Republic of Poland for permanent working contacts with the Holy See was present at that meeting.

The Pontiff said that on that occasion he expressed his joy in knowing that on November 10th 1980 the statute of the free trade union Solidarnosc had been approved, and therefore the legitimacy of the existence and of the specific activities of this union had been recognized. On that happy occasion, full of so many promises, the pope went on, I was able to affirm that the setting up of the free trade union was an event of great importance. It showed the ready openness of all working men in Poland to assume real responsibility on the different branches of activities so numerous for the dignity and production of work in our birthplace. It also showed that there is no contradiction beween such an autonomous social initiative taken by working men and the structure of the system, which refers to human work as a fundamental value of the life of society and the state.

It has not escaped anyone's notice that the free trade union Solidarnosc came into being at a very difficult time for Poland. The hopes which have been temporarily deluded, the pontiff said, the difficulties and the obstacles which have been created, the hard restrictions imposed not only on the members of the union but on the entire population, cannot make us forget that this trade union acquired and still possesses the character of an authentic representative of the workers, recognized and confirmed by the organs (?of power). It is and remains an autonomous and independent trade union, faithful to its initial inspiration, which rejects violence even today in the difficult situation it is living, concerned with being a constructive force for the nation. The pontiff referred to his encyclical "Laborum Exercens," and said that the church has always proclaimed the right to free association in the name of the dignity of human work.

In conclusion, John Paul II said he was living the present situation in Poland as a profoundly sad event and he was convinced that restitution of effective and complete respect for the rights of working men, and especially their right to a trade union already created and legalized, is the only way to emerge from this difficult situation.

PCI HISTORIAN DISCUSSES 'THIRD WAY' THEORY

PM090927 Rome L'ESPRESSO in Italian 31 Jan 82 pp 52, 54

[Paolo Mieli interview with Paolo Spriano, director of the PCI's Gramsci Institute]

[Text] Question: Professor, as a communist and a historian of the PCI, what do you think of the "third way?" For one thing, does the "third way" exist or not?

Answer: The fact that this concept still has some indistinct aspects requiring further examination does not mean it does not exist.

Question: So let us see what it consists of. A path should lead from one point to another in a particular area. So let us say that since your party still calls itself "communist," the third way should lead from Existing State Square to Self-management by the Producers Square. And by a different route (this is why you call it the "third" way) from Social Democracy Avenue.

Answer: Yes. Whoever is working for real progress beyond capitalism proceeds from an observation of the seriousness of the present crisis of capitalism and from the idea that is is possible to open up a new phase leading to socialism. Back in 1944-47 too the European communist movement talked about new and different roads (different from the classic October road) for transcending capitalism. But at that time the path adopted by the Eastern bloc countries was portrayed rhapsodically; indeed, it was claimed that precisely because that path had led those countries to victory it was possible for every communist party to find a new one that took into account the complexity and diversity of the national situation in which it worked.

Question: Now, however, the PCI has reversed this verdict and says the path opened up by the October Revolution led down a blind alley.

Answer: Now an essential part of the third way (or third phase) concept is the critique of the inherent flaws and limitations of the Soviet model -- a critique that challenges the very nature of Eastern-bloc societies, with their contradictions and constrictions in both the political and economic fields. Those models of centralized planning, managed in a bureaucratic and authoritarian manner, can in no way constitute a transition of passage toward self-management by the producers, that is, a higher phase of socialism.

Question: Many people do not feel that such a tragic assessment should be made of the social democratic experience.

Answer: We can no longer talk in general and peremptory terms of a single social democratic experience, because the Western workers movement is full of very varied and changing experiences of this kind. For instance, you cannot define as social democracy everything represented by the French PS, which does not have behind it a trade union that embraces the entire working class (as do the British or German socialist parties) and has a Jacobin tradition and a teleological [finalistica] drive that prompt it to work on structural reforms very different from the more modest ambitions of classic forms of social democracy. One could continue enumerating national differences, the impulses to socialist change, and even the dialectic that exists within the Socialist International and within the "eurocommunist" parties.

Question: But 2 weeks ago in L'ESPRESSO Guido Carli [former governor of the Bank of Italy] analyzed the PCI's economic program in considerable detail and reached the conclusion that it "falls within the guidelines of Scandinavian-type social democracy." So the third way is simply a variant of the social democratic path....

Answer: No. Especially in Europe there are socialist, social democratic, progressive and cultural forces which, just like us, aspire to a new driving role for our continent and aim, like us, at resumption of the detente process. All those who issue a severe verdict on the West's present crisis of values and governability and who have in mind the aim of a superior kind of civilization and of a real change in production relations, not simply an improvement of the welfare state, can identify with the third way (or, if you prefer, the originality and necessity of a new phase).

Question: But nobody has explained how to achieve this "higher form of civilization."

Answer: We are living in such a dangerous situation that our plans would not be realistic unless they embraced the belief in the gradual nature of a process. We cannot ignore the existence in the West of another social and political front headed by Reagan, which is working for the restoration of capitalism's traditional scope and for a reduction of the role of the workers movement's autonomous forces and which has on its side the British conservatives, the French right and the Christian Democratic international. This front does not envisage a new policy toward the Third World.

Question: What can the PCI contribute to the third way front?

Answer: First the ability to integrate its own mass experience, albeit within the awareness of being a minority force. The convergence with other forces can stem partly from a shared stance -- I am thinking here of the German social democrats -- toward "real socialism." In other words, the belief that there is a profound and insuperable historical gulf with the Eastern bloc's experience and at the same time that it is still necessary to fight for every real possibility of reformability of the Eastern bloc countries, to create a new opportunity for detente and to lower the height of the barrier between the opposing blocs.

Peace depends partly on this too. Even more so, any socialist progress. That means, among other things, seeking and accepting as interlocutors in the Eastern bloc all the forces and intellectual energies of dissidence, of internal dialectic, all the tendencies to real forms of autonomy, that cannot fail to continue manifesting themselves precisely because the crisis in the Soviet power and government system exists and the need for change created by the most profound thrusts in the Eastern bloc societies cannot be suppressed with tanks.

CENTER DEMOCRATIC UNION LOSES SENATE MAJORITY

NC092235 Paris AFP in English 2210 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Text] Madrid, 9 Feb (AFP) -- The Spanish ruling Center Democratic Union (CDU) today lost the absolute majority which it had held since March 1979 in the Senate, upper house of the Spanish Parliament. The change occurred when Senator Luis Ramallo announced that he was leaving the CDU and joining a mixed opposition grouping which now holds 109 seats against the CDU's 108.

The CDU, which held 120 seats in 1979, can still count on support from other groups, observers said. The CDU holds 151 out of 349 seats in the lower house.

HAIG AGREES TO 'SPEED-UP' OF TREATY TALKS

LD081736 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca and U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig held an important meeting at the Santa Cruz Palace this afternoon. They spent 1 hour and 10 minutes reviewing bilateral affairs and the international political situation, with attention centered on the security conference. Haig, who favors an early adjournment of the conference, set out for Minister Perez-Llorca his reasons for believing in the need for a stiff line against Moscow because, Haig said, what happened in Poland has led to a serious breakdown in detente to which the West cannot close its eyes.

Perez-Llorca reiterated the Spanish attitude, in view of its position as host country, of seeking to avoid slanging matches and thus to align itself with the Western countries who wish to see the East-West dialogue continued at the Madrid conference.

Perez-Llorca and Haig additionally agreed that the talks for renewal of the Spanish-U.S. treaty must be speeded up, as the extension to the treaty expires on 20 May this year.

CALVO-SOTELO, CHEYSSON DISCUSS BILATERAL ISSUES

LD091052 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Pedro Fernandez Cespedes report from Moncloa Palace]

[Text] Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo has held a 45-minute meeting with the French Minister of External Affairs, Claude Cheysson. The French minister wished to make no statement and left the Moncloa Palace in a hurry because he was due to meet with U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig before the start of the CSCE.

Mr Cheysson informed Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo of the Polish delegation's intention -- expressed this morning -- of adjourning the CSCE at 1330. Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo was also informed of France's position at the conference -- a position of compromise half-way between its definitive postponement, as advocated by the U.S. secretary of state and its indefinite continuation without results.

Current outstanding bilateral issues were also discussed at the meeting between Cheysson and the prime minister, but, as noted, Mr Cheysson wished to make no statements, though he did say that he would speak to journalists here in Madrid during the course of the day.

DENMARK

JORGENSEN ATTACKS U.S. POLICY ON EL SALVADOR

NC100729 Paris AFP in English 0715 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] Copenhagen, 10 Feb (AFP) -- Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen launched a strong attack on U.S. foreign policy Tuesday night, calling on the Reagan administration to be as critical of the governments of El Salvador and Turkey as it is of Poland and the Soviet Union.

The criticism in a television interview was Mr Jorgensen's second attack on U.S. policy in two nights. On Monday he described President Ronald Reagan's policy on El Salvador as unreasonable, extremely dangerous and harmful to cooperation between the United States and Europe.

The head of the Social-Democratic minority government in Denmark, a country which is a NATO ally of the United States, told his television interviewer his government had informed Washington of its views on U.S. policy. After the interview, Conservative opposition leader Poul Schlueter said that Mr Jorgensen's "impulsively anti-American statements" would certainly be used by the Soviet Union.

NORWAY

FOREIGN MINISTER 'EXPANDS CONTACTS' WITH EEC

PM041323 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 29 Jan 82 p 13

[Paal Nordenborg report]

[Text] Yesterday evening Foreign Minister Svenn Stray raised the question of Norway and the foreign and security policy decisions made by the EEC nations with the EEC Council of Ministers chairman. For a time the Foreign Ministry has been working on a program of action for Norway's relationship with the foreign policy cooperation among the EEC countries. This cooperation takes place outside the framework of the economic cooperation established in the treaties between the EEC countries.

The EEC Council of Ministers chairman coordinates foreign policy cooperation. In the current 6-month period the chairmanship is held by Belgian Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans.

Foreign Ministry Under Secretary Eivinn Berg told ARBEIDERBLADET that the agenda for Foreign Minister Stray's talks with the EEC chairman this time covered how Norway would best be able to protect its interests through the best possible contact before the EEC makes its decisions. Berg said that the Foreign Ministry is also planning a meeting in Brussels on 28 and 29 June for talks between Foreign Minister Stray and the EEC commission vice president. This will be a so-called high-level meeting, at which we will look at our bilateral contacts with the EEC in other fields -- first and foremost the economic -- covered by the EEC's treaties, Under Secretary Berg said. "This is the sort of high-level meeting for which former Prime Minister Odvar Nordli took the initiative on the Norwegian side," Berg said. According to the under secretary, yesterday's meeting and those in June with the EEC commission accord with the present government's objective of establishing and expanding contacts and cooperation arrangements with the EEC. "I would stress that none of this has anything to do with Norwegian membership. So much has happened both within the EEC and in Norway that the idea of Norwegian membership is completely behind us," Under Secretary Berg said.

He pointed out that the EEC has developed in a way completely different from that first envisaged. Conditions are now completely different, he asserted, and he had noted with interest the idea put forward by Labor Party Deputy Chairman Einar Forde at a recent Oslo Labor Association meeting for a conference called "debate on Europe." Berg said that the Polish crisis, more than any other circumstance, has obvious repercussions for the political cooperation among the EEC countries, as well as an effect on East-West relations. The need for consultations on joint reactions to the crisis has accelerated the cooperation process.

The U.S. move on sanctions just before Christmass underlined this need, and the agreement reached then had an important effect on Federal Chancellor Schmidt's later talks with President Reagan. The fact that the EEC reached a joint approach to the sanctions question made similar work at the NATO Council of Ministers 11 January meeting much easier, Berg said. He stressed that on the Polish question Norway has followed the EEC's line, as it did in the cases of Afghanistan and the hostage affair in Iran.

As far as NATO's treatment of the Polish situation is concerned, he said: "The fact that the European NATO nations have not yet implemented "punitive economic measures" against the Soviet Union, as the United States has done, is a result of the NATO decision that each individual member nation is free to draw up its own sanctions in accord with its own situation. Also, the U.S. economic sanctions are very limited." Nor does Berg see any conflict between the strengthening of Norwegian contacts with European political cooperation and cooperation spanning the Atlantic: "NATO will continue to be the major forum for consultations on foreign and security policy questions for us and for the other members of the alliance. Consultations within the EEC do not necessarily mean complications for consultations within NATO. If anything, the Polish situation has demonstrated the opposite."

WILLOCH DUPED INTO TELEVISION APPEARANCE

PM091133 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 3 Feb 82 p 4

[Editorial: "Willoch"]

[Text] Prime Minister Kaare Willoch has appeared in a U.S. television program alongside the Turkish military regime chief, General Evren, among others. They both expressed their deep concern over the repression of human rights in Poland. According to our information, our own prime minister did not know beforehand that General Evren would be appearing in the same program. There is every reason therefore to rebuke the Americans for not making this clear in advance. However, we cannot see that this in any way excuses our own prime minister. He ought to know that it was not only love of their fellow man which led the U.S. authorities to make such a program.

ARMS EXPORTS FALL DRAMATICALLY IN LAST YEAR

PM091359 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 20 Jan 82 p 6

[Olle Ekstrom dispatch]

[Excerpts] Stockholm -- Swedish arms exports fell markedly in 1981 after several years of dramatic increase. Exports fell from 2,078 million kronor in 1980 to just over 1,500 million in 1981. Arms exports increased sharply in the latter half of the seventies, chiefly as a result of Bofors' success in seelling the 70 missile, the Swedish army's most modern antiaircraft missile, to almost 10 countries. The names of these countries have not been made public.

USSR SEAMEN UNAFFECTED BY TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS

PM081517 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 8 Feb 82 p 5

[Naval correspondent Desmond Wettern Article]

[Text] Some 1,000 Russians, among them KGB men and naval officers, are free to travel each week anywhere they want in Britain. The new Foreign Office travel ban on Soviet diplomats will not affect them.

Crews of Soviet ships, who need carry only an international merchant seaman's card, can travel anywhere they wish once ashore, and there is no real means even of telling if they return before their ship sails. Every week some 30 Russian merchant ships visit British ports, and this is far more than can be economically justified by the level of trade between the two countries. The weekly average number of British ships in Russian ports is three.

More Than 50 Ports

Under the new Foreign Office ban Russian diplomats must not travel more than 25 miles from central London. This replaces a 35-miles limit and is part of Britain's response to events in Poland. The new ban, which also applies for the first time to Polish diplomats and to Russian journalists and staff of the airline Aeroflot in London, was announced in the Commons on Friday and takes immediate effect.

In the course of a year Russian ships call at more than 50 ports in Britain, and before their departure it is up to their captains to tell the authorities if any crew are missing. Nor is there necessarily any way in which port authorities can know if the men returning to a ship are the same as those who stepped ashore, since at many smaller ports there are no restrictions on people entering and leaving the docks.

Britons Restricted

Under Russian rules any ship visiting a foreign port has to have a political officer or commissar of the KGB on board, and often naval officers serve in Russian merchant ships for training and intelligence purposes. Harbourmasters and customs and immigration officers at many British ports have for years been voicing their concern to Ministry of Defence officers about the lack of restrictions on visiting Russian and Warsaw Pact seamen.

British sailors in Russian ports cannot travel outside the port area without a visa provided by the Russian Embassy. But the Defence Ministry has no power to change the rules concerning Russian ship visits. That is something that only the Home Office on Foreign Office recommendation, could enforce in retaliation for the restrictions placed on British sailors in Russia.

The Defence Ministry has also been pressing for years, with the support of the Americans, for NATO to set up a monitoring system to keep track of the movement of Russian merchant ships in Western waters. But according to the Supreme Allied Commander, Atlantic, Adm Harry Train, an American, the other NATO countries have consistently rejected such proposals on the grounds that they might upset trade relations with the Soviet Union and its satellites.

AMBASSADOR TO PROTEST U.S. HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT

NC101208 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has instructed the Cyprus ambassador in Washington to make the necessary representation at the State Department over its inaccurate presentation of the human rights situation in Cyprus. An official statement says the Foreign Ministry studied the part of the U.S. State Department report to the Congress connected with Cyprus. It has instructed the ambassador especially to stress the unacceptability of the continuing violation of human rights in Cyprus by the Turkish occupation troops as well as the continuing violation of the Cyprus Republic's sovereign rights by Turkey.

In the U.S. Government report it is mentioned that in light of the military intervention and continuing presence of Turkish armed forces in northern Cyprus, Turkey is playing a role in the human rights situation in Cyprus. The report claims that the dispute over human rights in Cyprus stems basically from the different interpretations each community gives to the reasons and causes of the Cyprus problem, the communal differences and to everything each side claims should be done in order to find a solution.

Daily Scores Report

NC101044 Nicosia I DHILINI in Greek 10 Feb 82 p 3

[From the "Our Opinion" column: "A Double Standard"]

[Text] In a report on human rights, the Reagan administration claims that the United States was the first country in the world whose constitution guaranteed the protection of human rights and that it is undertaking an initiative to combat a double standard in the examination of human rights violations. Yet the same report claims that the dispute on human rights in Cyprus allegedly stems from the different interpretation each community gives to the reasons and causes of the Cyprus problem. This means a double standard, which the United States has undertaken to suppress.

As the whole world knows, human rights in Cyprus are being trampled by the Turkish invasion troops and by nobody else. There are no two sides; there is only a victim and a victimizer. The victimizer is the Turkish Attila, who invaded Cyprus, killed, raped and evicted thousands of Greeks from their ancestral homes and who are now living as refugees in their own country. There is the indigenous population and there are the Turkish invaders and settlers, who are usurping the indigenous population's property and trampling on its human rights, and this is being tolerated by the world's great powers and the United States itself which, if indeed it has undertaken a campaign to combat a double standard in human rights, can prove this in practice by starting with Cyprus.

SPOKESMAN ON DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH ISRAEL

NC100931 Nicosia O KIRIKAS in Greek 10 Feb 82 p 8

[Text] Answering a question, the government spokesman stated yesterday that he was not aware of any country which had demanded that Cyprus sever its diplomatic relations with Israel. The question was raised because of the positive vote Cyprus cast for the UN Genral Assembly resolution that called on all UN members immediately to sever diplomatic, economic, trade and other relations with Israel.

BRIEFS

ARAB GULF RELATIONS -- Cyprus has secured loans amounting to $20 million from the World Bank and the Kuwait Development Bank. The money will be used to finance the island's third highway development project. The loans were neogtiated by the minister of communications and works, Mr Katzikostas, during a visit to Kuwait. Mr Katzikostas also signed an air agreement with Oman. [Text] [Nicosia Domestic Service in English 1200 GMT 9 Feb 82 NC]

KKE-INTERIOR APPRAISES PASOK RULE, POLICIES

NC081508 Athens I AVYI in Greek 7 Feb 82 p 6

[KKE-Interior Central Committee resolution issued 6 February]

[Excerpts] The victory of the democratic forces in the October elections, the simultaneous defeat of the right and the election of the democratic-progressive PASOK government undoubtedly constituted a significant milestone -- the start of a new period for our country -- and the first 100 days have now ended.

1. International Conditions

Our people's struggle for change is being waged under conditions of intensifying economic crisis and international tension in which the international situation is tending to deteriorate. For this reason the struggle for detente remains our principal duty. The many-months-old military dictatorship, imposed in Poland after pressure by the Soviet Union and other countries of the Warsaw Pact, has shaken communists and progressive people throughout the world. It constitutes a new element of aggravation, international tension and new difficulties for the Polish people and their forces of renewal. It exposes the problem of a crisis in the Soviet model of "existent socialism" in Eastern Europe and of the methods for its imposition. At the same time, it negatively influences the promotion and splendor of socialism, especially in Europe.

The United States is taking advantage of the Polish tragedy and the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan in order to promote, by endeavoring to impose sanctions against the Soviet Union and Poland, its own imperialist policy and cold war goals, especially in relations between East and West, on the issues of the Euromissiles and disarmament, the Middle East and Middle Asia [as published]. The United States is thus arresting Western Europe's tendency for a different and self-sustained position in international problems. At the same time it is supporting Evren's military dictatorship and crimes as well as the blood-soaked juntas of Latin America, and it is doing everything to avoid the imposition of sanctions against them. Within this framework, by using the increasing Turkish provocations as a basic lever, the United States is intensifying its pressure on our country so it will make concessions on the issues of NATO, the bases, Ankara's demands in the Aegean and Cyprus, where the Turkish occupation is continuing.

Events in Poland have led the international workers' movement to a new qualitative situation. A significant number of communist parties, especially in advanced capitalist countries, have denounced the military regime in Poland and the negative role the Soviet leadership has played in every effort for renewal. The recent undisguised CPSU attack against the CPI, and Eurocommunism in general, proved that the CPSU leadership is incapable of participating in a dialogue, preferring the old method of airing unfounded slanderous denunciations and leading to a new rift among communist parties, having drawn no lessons from previous similar events (China, Yugoslavia).

An increasing number of communist parties in Europe and other areas of the world are declaring their position in favor of a new road, different from that of social democracy and "existent socialism," in a new phase of renovative and revolutionary procedures aiming at socialism with democracy. All these things constitute a new milestone for the European workers' movement and dictates initiatives for immediate consultations among communist parties and other leftist and progressive forces which, struggling for socialism with democracy and freedom, consider their struggle separate from the struggle for detente and peace, for a new international economic and political order, for new equal relations between North and South, between developed and developing countries in the Third World. Thus, currently, the struggle for an independent pacifist Europe facing the two superpowers coincides with the struggle for the Europe of the working people.

These developments shed light in a new way and vindicate the Greek Communists' struggle for renewal, against dogmatism and dependence, which started in 1968, for the renewal of our country's communist movement for an independent, democratic and militant road toward socialism.

2. General Assessments on the First Postelection Period

Following the October elections a new situation has existed in our country. Its basic characteristics are: A democratic progressive government has been elected which declares change as its program and with socialism as its goal. The new government has broad popular support and is afforded a margin of comfort by the people on condition that it advances. At the same time, however, an incipient but clear displeasure and disappointment is being noted among the popular masses because of the concessions, inconsistencies and vagueness of government policy. Nevertheless, popular support could possibly continue and even expand if the government's daily practice can convince public opinion and all progressive forces that it can lead the country on the road of substantive change. In addition, the crisis in New Democracy after its defeat in the elections and its policy, so far at least, have not permitted it to place serious obstacles in the way of the government's task.

These facts constitute basic and favorable prerequisites for dealing with multilateral difficulties, such as: the problems being created by the deteriorating international tension and the deepening crisis, the deterioration of the economic crisis in the country, which manifests itself through continuing inflation, the deterioration in the balance of payments, the continuing stagnation in production and investments, increasing unemployment, which is approaching 150 billion drachmas, the pressure by capitalists and foreigners for the essential retention of New Democracy's policy in critical sectors, the right's counter-attack now in the offing which, regardless of its current situation, will try to exploit any popular displeasure and -- from an entirely different aspect -- the policy itself of the doctrinaire Communist Party, which is inspired by petty party considerations in the internal field and by a tendency to serve the goals of the Warsaw Pact in the foreign field.

Starting with our positions on the country's problems and the necessary solutions, but taking into consideration PASOK's declarations, we appreciate that the government work developed thus far within the above framework is summarily described by the following characteristics: The work has presented positive steps in certain sectors, although often haphazardly, within the framework of a generally progressive direction which creates possibilities for democracy's expansion and a broader popular militant intervention.

Principally, however, the government work during this period -- thanks to a number of contradictions, inhibitions, delays and negative manifestations -- finally summarized a policy of reforms of a democratic nature to a limited extent which do not fall within the broader prospect for substantive deep changes, planned and mature, indispensable for overcoming the crisis, consolidating change and advancing the country with greater democracy toward the direction of a socialism with freedom, pluralism, independence and self-management.

The justified manifestations of displeasure and disappointment which are being expressed by some sectors of public opinion spring from this fact. The pertinent facts, supporting our general assessment of the government's work thus far, are:

Our party has positively confronted certain government positions and measures, for instance the disavowal of neoliberalism as a direction for overcoming the crisis. The effort for strengthening the public sector and state intervention. The announcement of the establishment of certain mechanisms for controlling capital, certain aspects of the income policy which, however, as a whole left the workers unsatisfied and which in any case have not been completed; in the field of democratization the declaration of the recognition of national resistance. Certain changes in the administration pyramid and of persons in senior posts, especially in the security corps, which was the basic support of the rightest state, the first measures for strengthening local government, a new and more independent tone in the management of foreign policy problems and certain steps for broadening the country's foreign relations. The more persistent defense of Greek interests within the EEC.

On the other hand, however, we annotate to the government's debit the fact that its central choice for dealing with the crisis and for development in 1982 has been reliance on private capital. That it has not started nationalization in sectors of the economy that are mature and necessary for contributing to a new qualitative development, and although announcements on the whole are delayed, that in the field of incomes policy undisguised and serious backpedaling has been noted.

PASOK agricultural policy remains unclear without any substantive measure on the serious issues of unaccountability of intermediaries, the strengthening of cooperative societies and so forth. In the field of democratization there has been delay in processing laws that were announced (for instance, national resistance, political refugees). No essential change has been noted in the democratization of the armed forces, the most critical sector of the state machine. Old provisions and regulations continue to be valid in this sector. The armed forces information service is being retained as an army channel. A dangerous tendency is being manifested for factionalizing the administration and for making trade unions and other social organizations dependent on the government. At the same time a tendency has been noted in PASOK to weaken mass struggle through the argument that currently the government of change is in power.

The result of these tendencies is: The intensely factionalized composition of the provisional Greek General Confederation of Labor [GSEE] leadership, which from the start damaged the effort to purge the country's most significant mass representative. These tendencies are very dangerous and, if not abandoned, the administration will fail. The democratic laws and institutions which will be established by the government will be falsified, the mass movement, which is the principal force of change, will be damaged. Furthermore, backpedaling on critical democracy problems of a genuine but simple proportional election system and the absence of pluralism in television, mainly at the expense of the smaller parties, serve the chance of perpetuating the current bipartisan system but damage democracy's cause.

The government does not have clear foreign policy goals concerning the country's withdrawal from the NATO military wing, the removal of the bases and its entire stance toward the EEC. The promotion of a Balkan policy is being delayed. We consider the vote for Spain's accession to NATO and the essential acceptance of the Pershing and cruise missiles in Europe a mistake, together with the cultivation of a vagueness toward the entire problem of the EEC. The maneuvers of expediency and the unclear positions toward the Polish military dictatorship and the Soviet pressures. The above contradict a consistent new foreign policy of independence, detente and peace.

The inadequacies and contradictions we have noted express the response of the PASOK government to the pressures that are being exerted on it by capital, the foreigners and more generally reaction, pressures that had begun before the elections. If concessions to the pressures continue and the extent and depth of change is restricted to reforms which are painless for the establishment, it will not be possible to confront the manifold crisis the country is facing.

The life of the working people will not change basically with all the dangers that will accrue from a stagnation, from the continuation of the crisis and the disappointment of the people.

The Intervention of the Working People Is a Condition for Change

On the basis of these assessments of PASOK's policy and taking into consideration the more general political situation with its difficulties and the new possibilities it contains, we believe that the development and independent intervention of the workers' mass movement as well as the cooperation and militant rallying of democratic political and social forces currently is a much more necessary prerequisite for decisive steps on the road to change.

In connection with this, the Central Committee stresses the following fundamental problems:

-- It is of primary significance to build a democratic, politically pluralistic, effective administration which will be near the people and capable of dealing with their problems with a new modern organization and a methodology into which the public administration people themselves will contribute. The problem of the separation between party and state has been noted. However, government practice so far indicates that strong, deeply rooted morbid [nosiros] tendencies in this field must be overcome. For this reason, as much as it is necessary for the administration and the state machine to cease being in their composition and structure a state of the right, it is equally necessary for them not to turn into a PASOK state.

-- Substantive institutional measures must be taken to create a favorable framework for the development of all mass movements, new and old. Furthermore, mass movements should control strictly the stance of the parties and the government toward their independence. What happened to the GSEE and similar things being attempted in other sectors of the mass movement are examples "to be avoided."

-- The problem of the institution of an increasingly greater participation by the working people in the decisionmaking centers of the state, public business (in the majority of the boards of directors) and private businesses and for their more substantive democratic control is absolutely connected with the above. From within such practices it is necessary to promote forms of economic and social self-management that will befit Greek conditions. The supervisory councils that have been established are a weak measure which falls short of needs and possibilities and should not be described as socializations. However, as a rudimentary form of control this institution should be utilized and should acquire a more substantive nature. Finally, the elected representatives of the working people should be in the majority in the administration of the organizations which deal with labor problems (insurance funds, workers' homes, and so forth).

SED-KKE JOINT COMMUNIQUE ON FLORAKIS' VISIT

NC081916 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 8 Feb 82 pp 1, 6

[By Thanasis Yeoryiou]

[Text] Berlin, 6 [as published] -- The following joint communique was issued on the visit of the KKE delegation to the GDR and the talks the delegation had with the SED:

The secretary general of the Central Committee of the SED, Erich Honecker and the secretary general of the Central Committee of the KKE, Kharilaos Florakis, concluded during their talk on 4 February that the policy of arms superiority and confrontation followed by the aggressive circles of imperialism headed by the U.S. administration is exacerbating the international situation and increases the danger of a calamitous nuclear war.

The supporters of material and ideological preparation for war have set as their illusory goal the acquiring of military and strategic superiority over the Soviet Union, over the defensive strength of the Warsaw Pact, and thus the change of the international balance of power in favor of imperialism. Particularly dangerous to peace is the planned stationing of U.S. medium-range missiles in Western Europe which is aimed at creating prerequisites for gaining the advantage for delivering the first nuclear blow.

This policy is in striking contrast to the efforts of the peoples to live in peace and security. The impressive activities of the peace movement, transcending frontiers, unrelated to political affiliations and religious "credos," express the desire of millions of people for detente and disarmament, against the madness of armaments and the missiles of death. Under the current situation, there is nothing more important for the communists than to protect peace, and on this they agree with all people of goodwill.

It is for this reason that the two parties, emphasized E. Honecker and Kh. Florakis, will intensify their efforts to join forces with all those who are willing to defend peace as the most valuable human asset. More than at any other time it is required that all peace-loving people make increased efforts toward frustration of the threatening plans of the imperialists and enforcement of effective measures toward arms limitation and toward disarmament.

The two interlocutors expressed their full support for the peace program of the 26th CPSU congress and of the proposals of CPSU Secretary General L.I. Brezhnev which show the peoples of Europe and the whole world the road toward a lasting peace. The SED and the KKE received with satisfaction the start of the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles in Europe between the USSR and the United States. The Soviet proposals created a favorable climate for these talks. It is now the U.S. turn to prove its desire for the achievement of specific results.

The two parties support a continued SALT effort and preservation of what has already been achieved in this sector. They expect the constructive continuation of the Madrid conference and the speedy signing of an agreement for the convocation of a conference on military detente and disarmament in Europe. The two parties support the idea of establishment of a nuclear-free zone in the Balkans and conversion of the Mediterranean into a zone of peace, free of nuclear weapons.

Specifically, under the current international situation continuation of the East-West dialogue, meetings of responsible state leaders are more than ever before necessary and useful to contribute to the preservation of what has been achieved through detente and to new steps toward fulfillment of the principles of peaceful coexistence.

The SED and the KKE reaffirm their unshakable solidarity with the Polish people, with all the unshakable communists and true patriots of Poland in their struggle for smoothing the situation, for strengthening socialism and with it of peace and security in Europe. They decisively condemn the policy of threats and sanctions of the Reagan administration as well as the practice of crude interventions in the domestic affairs of the Polish People's Republic being implemented by the majority of the governments of NATO states under U.S. pressure.

All these constitute a stark violation of the basic rules of international law and the principles of the Helsinki Final Act and at the same time are aimed at diverting the attention of the peoples of the capitalist countries from the struggle for peace and against the destructive policy of the monopolies. Within the exacerbated international class conflict there is increased responsibility for the communist and workers' parties in the struggle for peace, democracy and socialism.

The SED and the KKE agree that, faced with the broad anticommunist and anti-Soviet hysterical campaign by imperialism, there is particular urgency to strengthening unity of action within the communist movement. They will continue their cooperation toward this end.

The two parties will determinedly oppose all future efforts aimed at undermining the international communist movement and the common action of the main revolutionary forces of our times.

The two parties stand in solidarity by the side of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America in their struggle for liberty, democracy, political and economic independence and upward progress. They support the struggle of the peoples of the Arab World against the aggressive policy of annexation practiced by Israel with U.S. support. The annexation of the Syrian Golan Heights by Israel is a stark violation of international law and further increases tension in the area to a dangerous degree. A permanent peaceful settlement in the Middle East is not possible without or against the PLO.

The two parties support the proposal for convocation of an international conference under UN auspices for solution of the Cyprus problem, for withdrawal of all foreign troops, for demilitarization, for guaranteeing the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Cyprus as a nonaligned state. They firmly stand by the side of the peoples of Central and South America in their struggle for liberty and national independence, which is so full of sacrifices. The barbarous murder of thousands of patriots and violation of the most elemental human rights by the blood-soaked military juntas of El Salvador, Chile, Guatemala and other countries that are maintained with U.S. support demonstrate the inhuman and false face of imperialism.

Erich Honecker appreciated the conscientious struggle of the KKE in protecting the vital rights of the working class and other workers of the country. Today the KKE is an important social force which, thanks to the Marxist-Leninist policy of the party, thanks to its close ties with the people and its long years of militant experience, is strengthening and expanding its ranks and continually increasing its political influence in the country.

The secretary general of the Central Committee of the SED gave a briefing on the duties arising for the party and the people of the GDR in the further implementation of the resolutions of the 10th SED Congress. The GDR workers demonstrate with their work, with the further increase of socialist competition, their full confidence in the tried policy of the party, which is aimed at guaranteeing peace and prosperity for the people. This is where one finds the force, stressed the secretary general, which will make it possible in the future to successfully implement the strategy of the ever-evolving, developed, socialist society as resolved by the 10th congress, even under the complicated conditions of the decade of the eighties. The never-ending alliance with the USSR and the firm absorption of the GDR in the socialist community comprise the credible foundation for further progress in the GDR.

Kharilaos Florakis explained the duties of the struggle of the Greek communists. Understanding the political, economic and social development of the country, he emphasized that the parliamentary election of 18 October revealed the unshaken will of the greatest majority of the Greek people for radical antimonopolistic and anti-imperialist changes.

The KKE, which managed to increase its influence with the masses and to strengthen its position in the Chamber of Deputies, is developing further activities for promoting the goals of change, for guaranteeing the country's national independence, for the withdrawal of nuclear weapons from its territory, for the dissolution of foreign military bases and for withdrawal from NATO, for fundamental democratization and for the economic development of the country for the people's benefit.

The secretary general of the Central Committee of the KKE expressed his high appreciation for the achievements of the GDR workers, who, under the tested leadership of the SED, are successfully constructing a socialist society. Regardless of all the attacks and slander by the class enemy, developments in the GDR prove the vital force of existential socialism.

Since the days of the Great October Revolution it has been proved that only socialism is in a position to solve the vital issues of social development to the interests of the people. The leading representatives of the SED and the KKE expressed appreciation at the firm ties and long years of brotherly cooperation between the two parties, which are inspired by the tested principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. They agreed on measures for the further development of relations between the two parties. 5 February 1982.

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS VIOLATION BY TURKISH VESSEL

NC092039 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Text] The Greek Ambassador in Ankara today handed a protest note to a Turkish Foreign Ministry representative concerning the violation of Greek territorial waters by a Turkish torpedo boat that approached within 2 nautical miles of Lesvos' shoreline. It is recalled that, according to the statement by the government spokesman, the Turkish torpedo boat chased six small Greek fishing boats in the area between Lesvos and the Turkish coast. The small fishing boats managed to sail to a harbor in Lesvos.

PAPANDREOU, AVEROF COMMENT ON NATO, U.S. BASES

NC092200 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The socialist government of Greece is not going to implement foreign models and will follow a purely Greek road. This was stressed by Prime Minister Papandreou in an interview carried by Italian television. In connection with Greece's relations with NATO, Mr Papandreou reiterated that our country's problem is whether the Atlantic alliance guarantees our territorial integrity and national security. He referred to relations with Turkey and to Ankara's threats against Greece and stressed: The continuous increase in Turkey's military might is taking on such dimensions that soon the balance of power in the region will no longer exist. Ankara's support from the United States and partly from West Germany are contributing to the Turks' arms supremacy.

Answering questions, Mr Papandreou said that in March the talks will begin regarding the future of U.S. bases in Greece. He said: In any case, the government will not allow these bases to be used for operations against countries with which we have good relations, such as the Arab countries. Moreover, we will not allow any activities that would entail the leaking of strategic information. The prospects for a special relationship between Greece and the EEC are encouraging. Developments in this direction will be completed in the spring, he said.

New Democracy Chairman Averof also answered questions during the same program. Mr Averof maintained that Mr Papandreou does not want to belong to any alliance, but to secure a position for Greece in the Third World. However, he expressed the belief that in the end Mr Papandreou will stay in the Western camp, both from the economic and the defense points of view, although with many reservations. He also predicted that the PASOK government will face serious economic problems. In conclusion, he said the Greek armed forces will remain devoted to the democratic ideals.

300 'PROGRESSIVE' OFFICERS, NCO'S SAID ARRESTED

TA091012 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Excerpt] It is reported that arrests are being made in the army. Reliable sources said the wave of arrests of progressive and patriotic elements in Turkey has spread to the army as well. Some 300 officers and NCO's have been arrested for no valid reason. No announcements are being made about their fate, the tortures they are being subjected to or where they are. The arrest of the 300 officers and NCO's has prompted reactions among the patriots in the army ranks. The French Communist Party paper L'HUMANITE DIMANCHE confirmed these arrests in a report over the weekend.

TRIAL OF SOVIET SHIP CAPTAINS STARTS IN ISTANBUL

TA091651 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The trial of the captains of the two Soviet freighters that collided near Vanikoy in the Bosporus on 4 February has begun at the Uskudar third criminal court in Istanbul. The indictment demanded prison terms of up to 30 months for both captains. The trial judges decided to release the captains on bail, to be paid in foreign currency in view of the fact that the suspects are foreign citizens.

U.S. TRIES TO WIDEN COUNTRY'S ROLE IN NATO

TA091812 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 3 Feb 82 p 3

[Commentary by Ali Sirmen: "Unacceptable Wish"]

[Excerpts] A strange article published last week in the New York TIMES, one of the two most influential dailies in the United States and reproduced in CUMHURIYET on 1 February shows that even that serious paper yields from time to time to advocating the impossible. What disturbs us in the New York TIMES article is that it reflects efforts by at least some sectors of the Pentagon to add new meaning and functions to Turkey's membership in NATO and, what is more, it appears to share this view. The article claims Turkey is a deterrent force against any Soviet aid to an Arab coalition to be formed against Israel.

It is this point that is difficult to comprehend. This is impossible even from the viewpoint of Turkey's duties within NATO. Israel falls outside NATO's area of responsibility. Turkey views NATO as a defense organization established in accordance with the UN charter and is a member in order to strengthening its own defense. However, it must never be overlooked that this membership is bound by the provisions of the pact of 4 April 1949 and by its area of responsibility. Under successive governments Turkey has realized the dangers of being a focal point of the cold war and has followed a multilateral foreign policy based on national interests in a bid to avert these dangers.

While implementing this policy, Ankara has not forgotten its duties in NATO, nor has forgotten its responsibilities to regional countries -- with which it has improved relations -- or other Third World countries. Ankara has announced to the world the goal of its membership in NATO and the limits of its duties. Israel, which constitutes the biggest obstacle to peace in the Middle East, is not included within these responsibilities or limits. Similarly, Turkey's relations with the United States does not require Ankara to become a pawn of Washington's Israel policy.

IRANIAN COMMUNICATIONS MINISTER ENDS VISIT

FRG, GDR EXPERTS MEET, DISCUSS DISARMAMENT STEPS

LD081838 Hamburg DPA in German 1603 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] Geneva, 8 Feb (DPA) -- Talks took place here today between the FRG and GDR on the possibilities of disarmament steps in the United Nations. Henning Wegener, the new chief delegate of the Federal Republic on the International Disarmament Commission, met Ambassador Gerhard Herder, chief of the GDR mission at the international organizations in Geneva, and paid his introductory visit at the same time at the premises of the GDR mission. No details of the visit have been released.

The meeting was brought about by an exchange of letters between the foreign ministers of both sides, which Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher had initiated. GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer gave a positive response in January.

According to reports, Genscher would like both sides to commit to paper those principles that should be served by measures for disarmament and armament control. Bonn intends to be guided by four basic principles in this: Openness on disarmament measures between East and West, for example by publishing military budgets; verifiable disarmament measures; balance and parity; and confidence-building measures.

'CONCERN' FELT OVER DIPLOMATS' SAFETY IN TEHRAN

LD091306 Hamburg DPA in German 1221 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 9 Feb (DPA) -- Following the armed attack on Jens Petersen, Bonn's Ambassador in Tehran, the Federal Government today officially expressed its concern to the Iranian Government regarding the security of German Embassy staff and their families in Iran. The Iranian ambassador in Bonn, Mehdi Navab, was called to the Foreign Ministry this morning for this reason.

According to the Foreign Ministry, Navab expressed his great regret over the incident. He has requested the Foreign Ministry in Tehran to take the necessary measures to ensure the security of German diplomats.

NETHERLANDS

CP WILL NOT SEEK ANTI-MOSCOW BLOC ON POLAND

PM081513 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 28 Jan 82 p 3

[Text] Amsterdam, 28 Jan -- The Communist Party of the Netherlands [CPN] sees no advantage in the formation of blocs within the international communist movement. For this reason, the party has not yet reacted to the violent debate between the Italian Communist Party and the CPSU over the military takeover in Poland. According to CPN Executive Committee Member Frans van Liempt, the CPN will not take any initiatives which could lead to the adoption of a common position by like-minded parties, since this could disturb the dialogue with the CPSU.

Moreover the Netherlands communists attach such great importance to their own autonomy that they do not want to jeopardize it through an informal alliance with the PCI and other communist parties which have condemned the military takeover in Poland. At the PCF congress, which will take place next week, CPN representatives Elli Izeboud, party deputy chairman, and Jan de Boo, Executive Committee member, will not seek formal contacts with the PCI, although the CPN has said it sympathizes with the PCI position. Nor has DE WAARHEID published any comment on the conflict between the PCI and the CPSU. The paper's editorial staff has made do with detailed reports in which the emphasis has been placed on the PCI's response to the allegations in PRAVDA.

According to DE WAARHEID's new chief editor, Bart Schmidt, the Russian criticism of the Italian Communists could also apply in part to the CPN and the Polish reports in DE WAARHEID. Last fall an article appeared in the Russian paper NOVOYE VREMYA attacking DE WAARHEID. However, this criticism has not been repeated or intensified. "But," Schmidt said, "the PCI is of course more important to the Soviet Union than is the CPN."

Immediately after the military takeover in Poland the CPN spoke out against it. According to the communists, it proved "the PZPR's bankruptcy" and the "failure of an actual one-party system." Since then there has been a bitter debate over this pronouncement in DE WAARHEID's columns of readers' letters.

GOVERNMENT CALLS SOVIET EMBASSY REMARKS 'ODD'

LD081328 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Text] The Portuguese Government said this morning that it regards the Soviet Embassy utterances on the Socialist Party and on the person of Dr Mario Soares as odd. A Foreign Ministry spokesman added that the statements issued by the Soviet Embassy are being analysed. The government views the statements, both as regards language and substance, as totally alien to the normal functions of an embassy.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES MEETING WITH UNITA LEADER

LD100010 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The Foreign Ministry in Lisbon has denied a London-datelined report that on 17 January Portuguese Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Leonardo Mathias had a meeting with UNITA [National Union for the Total Independence of Angola] leader Jonas Savimbi in the Moroccan capital and delivered a message from the Luanda government. The Luanda government message is reported to have been handed to the Portuguese Government by the Angolan interior minister on 14 January.

Whatever the case, all signs are that Portugal is playing the role of an intermediary between Washington and Luanda. And perhaps it is not by mere chance that Lt Col Vitor Alves is visiting Luanda mere hours before tomorrow's arrival of U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig in Lisbon.

GENSCHER: WESTERN STAND AT CSCE 'WELCOME'

LD101640 Hamburg DPA in German 1539 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (FDP) today briefed the Federal Cabinet on the course of the CSCE follow-up conference after his return from Madrid. According to Government Spokesman Kurt Becker, Genscher particularly welcomed the fact that the Western states had adopted a common stand at the conference.

SPD politician Egon Bahr spoke out strongly today in favor of continuing the conference in Madrid because this lay in the West's interests. In an interview for North German Radio, published by the SPD in Bonn, Bahr says that he hopes the other European states, like the Federal Government, will exert influence to this end on the United States. The instrument of conference, the instrument of permanent dialogue is needed so that "conflicts do not dominate us, but vice-versa."

Swiss Calls for Suspension

LD101734 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] The Swiss delegate this afternoon called for the immediate suspension of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe being held in Madrid because of the tension between East and West following the imposition of martial law in Poland. The majority of the 35 representatives at the conference have now left Madrid. The U.S. secretary of state, Alexander Haig, who is in Lisbon, has admitted his disappointment at yesterday's session. France, for its part, maintains that the interruption of the conference sessions constitutes an abuse.

Turkmen Addresses Conference

TA101920 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1900 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that Turkey sincerely wants the Polish people to solve their problems through conciliaton and an atmosphere of dialogue and that the process of reform and renewal in the country continue. Turkmen today addressed the unofficial meeting of the European Security and Cooperation Review Conference in which the Polish issue was discussed. Turkmen said that the world arms race increased and expanded tension and instability. He added that Europe, through cooperation, can make important contributions to the solution of these problems which stem from this atmosphere. Referring to Poland, Turkmen noted that traditional and historic ties exist between Turkey and Poland. He added that any outside interference in Poland and the sacrifice of the Polish people's wishes were incompatible with the Helsinki principles.

Noting that Turkey is determined to contribute to establishing an atmosphere of trust in East-West relations, Turkmen said that Turkey will continue to support every effort made to achieve successful results at the Madrid meeting.

Conference 'Mechanism' Endorsed

NC110005 Paris AFP in English 2259 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] Madrid, 10 Feb (AFP) -- One of the key figures in the deadlocked conference here on security and cooperation in Europe, Austrian Ambassador Franz Ceska, believes that despite the current rift over Poland "the conference mechanism will survive."

In an interview with AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE, the ambassador, his country's chief delegate and one of the leaders of the influential group of neutral and non-aligned nations, predicted "considerable procedural problems," but suggested there was no reason to dramatize the situation. None of the Europeans, he said, shared the American view that the Soviet Union could be "punished" by being deprived of "its" conference. The fact was, he said, that Madrid followed upon Helsinki and Helsinki had originally been a Soviet project. Once Moscow had signed the Helsinki agreements, however, breaking off the talks within the Helsinki framework would amount to "letting the Soviet Union out from under the responsibilities" it took on by signing the accords.

The ambassador said that Helsniki finally ended with a Western victory because it embodied "pluralistic Western values in its code of behavior." He recalled that the accords, while establishing the principle of the inviolability of borders, envisioned for the first time modifications of frontiers by peaceful means. "Despite the bitter experience in Poland," said the ambassador, it was worth pursuing the talks "following a suitable period of reflection."

He said it was particularly well worth salvaging the working document evolved by the neutrals and non-aligned countries in the conference, including Sweden, Switzerland and Yugoslavia alongside Austria. The document, known as "RM 39," proposes one ambitious project, a European disarmament conference, and such minor steps as joint fighting of terrorism, easier visas for newsmen, a common protection of the environment, increased freedom to practise religions, and stepped-up exchanges of programs between radio and television networks.

Mr Ceska said the point about the proposals was that they formed a package arrived at through a lot of give-and-take. A collapse of the negotiating process would necessitate a renegotiation, he warned, where everybody would announce new demands, which would immediately lead to counterdemands. "At stake today are results we would be sorry to see abandoned," Mr Ceska said.

'Stuck Between Grindstones'

DW111029 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 11 Feb 82 p 4

[Commentary signed SCHR.: "Not Worthless Paper"]

[Text] The Madrid conference table has become stuck between the grindstones of the blocs. The foreign ministers of the Western signatory states had to assume this would happen when they decided to personally criticize developments in Poland at the first session this year. The CSCE cannot survive as an institution outside the blocs if confrontation between the blocs is reactivated. Therefore, the final act and the CSCE negotiation process, which will last for a long time, must be handled carefully. The act permits the sanction of moral condemnation, but no legal actions are possible on the basis of its articles. Yet it is by no means "worthless paper," as maintained by Secretary of State Haig, who wants to link the detente process with the lifting of martial law in Poland. It will become worthless paper only if miracles are demanded of it and if it is thrown into the trash can when no miracles have taken place. The violations of the final act in Poland are a danger for peace and the detente process. Yet it will help no one if this process is declared ended and if the Helsinki agreement is discarded. The attempt must at least be made to use the remains of the detente process to reduce the dangers coming from Poland. If no success is achieved -- and this is the fear at the moment -- the Soviet Union must not be released from its responsibility in this connection. The West should not take the first step toward discontinuing the conference nor should it give Moscow a pretext for doing so.

The suggestion of the Swiss foreign minister to adjourn the conference for a limited period must, therefore, be taken into consideration. A continuation of the conference in a climate of mutual provocation only contains the danger that the final act could eventually be torn to pieces. That would not help Poland.

Wiejacz: CSCE 'Necessary'

LD111232 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Correspondent's report from the Madrid Palace of Congresses and Exhibitions]

[Text] For Poland, the continuation of the conference is necessary, Polish Deputy Foreign Minister Wiejacz said at a press conference which is still taking place. Wiejacz also said that martial law in Poland will be lifted [se levantara] at the end of the month and had been imposed in accordance with the constitution. It is a question of an action aimed at defending the country's economic interests, which had been jeopardized by the attitude of the trade unions. The deputy foreign minister is opposed to the Western theses and says that it is his country's internal affair and at no time should it influence the development of the Madrid conference.

FRG Says Wait and See

LD111300 Hamburg DPA in German 1151 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 11 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Government believes that before a decision is taken on the further fate of the CSCE follow-up conference, which is being overshadowed by the East-West dispute over Poland, it is necessary to await developments in tomorrow's negotiations in Madrid. After this, the Western states must then, in the coming week, reach agreement about whether the meeting should be broken off, a Foreign Ministry spokesman said today in reply to an inquiry.

The spokesman reaffirmed the Federal Government's attitude that there must not be a complete breaking off of the conference but that the CSCE process must at all events be continued. According to the Federal Government, this would also be the case if the conference was interrupted for a specific period with a firm date set for its resumption. Moreover, it was demonstrated in Madrid that Bonn was right in voting, against the opinion of other Western states, against interrupting the conference before Christmas on account of Poland. The forum in Madrid has given the Western countries, as for example with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher's speech on Tuesday, the opportunity to express their concern at the effects of martial law in Poland and at Soviet "pressure" on Warsaw.

The chairman of the SPD parliamentary group, Herbert Wehner, today spoke in favor of continuing the CSCE follow-up conference in any event. In an interview on Deutschlandfunk, Wehner said that detente remains a necessary task for the safeguarding of peace. In both East and West there are forces striving for the preservation of peace.

BALTIC CITIZENS ASK INCLUSION IN N-FREE ZONE

LD101030 Stockholm International Service in Swedish 1000 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] In an open letter to the Soviet Government and the governments of the Nordic countries a number of Baltic citizens ask that Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania be included in a North-European nuclear-free zone. The letter, which has reached the Baltic Cooperation Committee in Stockholm, is signed by persons who were formerly persecuted and imprisoned by the Soviet authorities in the Baltic states. The signatories are now running the risk of new persecution, despite the fact that they are supporting a cause which has the Soviet government's official support. The letter also says that the shortage of foodstuffs in the Baltic states is becoming increasingly noticeable.

THOROUGH SCREENING OF ARAB CITIZENS PLANNED

AU101124 Vienna KURIER in German 10 Feb 82 p 5

[Erich Grolig report: "Thus Austria Is Protecting Itself Against the New al-'Asifah Threat"]

[Summary] A secret "security summit meeting" held in Vienna has decided to adopt rigorous control measures affecting some 4,800 Arabs, as well as special protective measures for government members. The most important decision of this meeting was to thoroughly check the 4,800 citizens of Arab countries regarding potential connections with Middle East terrorist groups. This had been done superficially once before, after last year's attack on the Vienna synagogue, but at that time police did not have enough personnel for a more thorough check. This time, according to a decision of all participants in the security meeting, all personnel resources will be fully used in the investigation.

"This screening will be concentrated primarily on Arab citizens who:

-- come from the Palestinian region;

-- are believed to be engaged in nationalist activities, or who;

-- have already been noticed by security authorities because of nationalist activities.

"Moreover, the screening will be focused on:

-- Arab groups and circles that have been formed at universities or privately;

-- students who have been enrolled at Austrian universities for a noticeably long period without having completed their studies;

-- Arabs who frequently visit their home country or countries where terrorist organizations have their headquarters (Syria, Iraq, Libya), or who;

-- repeatedly visit communist countries, primarily the CSSR, Hungary, Bulgaria and the GDR."

Special attention will be paid to the Arab scene in Salzburg because security authorities believe that there is a command center of Arab terrorists there where not only the assassination of [Vienna city councilman] Nittel and the attack on the Vienna synagogue were organized, but which might also be used to issue orders for future terrorist attacks. "Since the suspicion of a close collaboration between Palestinian and West German RAF [Red Army Faction] terrorists has been increasingly substantiated lately, FRG students at Salzburg higher schools are also to be screened regarding their potential connections with left or right extremist groups in the FRG."

The aim of all these measures is that anyone who is not above suspicion will have to leave Austria because his residence permit will not be extended. According to a high-ranking state security police official, the aim of Austrian authorities is to reduce the security risks as far as possible and to the extent that is necessary from a security point of view. In addition -- as had been announced earlier by Interior Minister Lanc -- Arabs entering Austria are to be subjected to a thorough screening at the borders, so as to prevent any infiltration of potential terrorists. Moreover, the security meeting decided to once more remind prominent Austrian political and business figures, who are regarded as being potentially threatened, of the security precautions recommended to them earlier, and to intensify the guarding of government members and of threatened buildings. Understandably, no details have been revealed on a number of further antiterror measures that were also adopted at the security meeting.

MITTERRAND PLANS VISIT TO ITALY, VATICAN

NC101139 Paris AFP in English 1134 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 10 Feb (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand will pay an official working visit to Italy on February 26 and 27, during which he will also meet Pope John Paul II at the Vatican, it was announced here today. Mr Mitterrand would have talks with Italian President Alessandro Pertini and Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini, the announcement said.

PS, MRG CONCUR ON SUPPORT FOR POLICY CHANGES

PM101123 Paris LE MONDE in French 27 Jan 82 p 8

[Text] Two delegations representing the PS and the Left Radical Movement [MRG], headed by PS First Secretary Lionel Jospin and MRG Chairman Roger-Gerard Schwartzenberg, met at MRG headquarters on Monday. Following the discussions the delegations issued a joint communique in which they reaffirm "their support for the policy of change being positively pursued by the government" and confirm their agreement with the foreign policy pursued by the president of the republic and the government. The PS and the MRG express a common will "to pursue their action of solidarity" with the Polish people "in their resistance to repression and in their struggle for the restoration of the civil and trade union freedoms they had won." They hope that France will propose to its European partners concerted action to counter unemployment and the crisis.

In a preliminary statement Mr Schwartzenberg had stressed from the outset the need to introduce an electoral system "guaranteeing just, proportional representation of all political currents at national and regional levels and at municipal level in big cities." The MRG chairman requested the dispatch of fact-finding missions to Poland in order "to shed light on the number and list of people arrested, on the places and conditions of their detention" and expressed doubts about the 'appropriateness' of the signing of a French-Soviet agreement on the supply of gas to our country by the USSR. The MRG thinks that such a contract 'would be likely to limit our country's energy independence unless accompanied by a strategy aimed at broadly diversifying our supplies.'"

According to Mr Jospin the MRG and PS analyses "are similar" although the two parties are inspired by "different feelings." According to MRG Deputy Chairman Jean Beranger, there are no "disagreements" but "differences of opinion" between the two parties.

MINISTERS MAY DISCUSS EXPULSION OF AMBASSADOR

LD110252 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2330 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] The prime minister will chair a meeting of the Council of Ministers tomorrow during which the announced general strike for 12 February is expected to be discussed. It is also admitted that besides legislative matters the ministers might discuss the incident involving the Soviet Embassy in Lisbon and the Socialist Party, particularly Dr Mario Soares. Insistent rumors that the Soviet ambassador to Lisbon, Arnold Kalinin, might be declared persona non grata by the Portuguese Government circulated today in several diplomatic and journalistic circles.

After many endeavors to ascertain the reliability of such reports, we were told by a ministerial source that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs neither denies nor confirms such reports although it admits that a resolution on the incident in question might be adopted tomorrow during the meeting of the Council of Ministers. We know that the Socialist Party has demanded from the Foreign Ministry that the government demand a formal apology from the Soviet Government and that the Socialist Party also wants the official responsible for the statement released by the Soviet Embassy to be expelled from Portugal.

SOARES PLANS SWING THROUGH LATIN AMERICA

PA110136 Madrid EFE in Spanish 0059 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] Lisbon, 10 Feb (EFE) -- Portuguese Socialist Party (PS) leader Mario Soares will leave on the 10th of this month for Costa Rica, invited by President-elect Luis Alberto Monge, it was learned today in Lisbon from a party source. Soares will stay in Costa Rica until the 22d and on the following day he will leave for Caracas to attend the summit meeting of the Socialist International, of which he is vice president. The former Portuguese prime minister will visit Panama on the 26th invited by President Aristides Royo and will return to Lisbon on the 27th.

In a telegram which he sent Monge today to congratulate him on his victory in the recent presidential elections in Costa Rica, Soares told the president-elect that under his mandate "Costa Rica will find new forms of development and prosperity."

U.S. TO INVEST IN LAJES AIRBASE IMPROVEMENTS

LD110206 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0100 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig has said that the Portuguese authorities have a clear perception of the problems discussed during the meetings he held in Lisbon last night and that these meetings were a reaffirmation of the relations of friendship between Portugal and the United States. Haig invited Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao to pay an official visit to the United States this year.

Meanwhile, the Portuguese news agency ANOP reported that the U.S. Government is to invest about 15 million contos in work to be carried out at the Lajes airbase in the Azores. Work there is to start next May and is aimed at extending fuel storage tanks, improving runways and installing a new and sophisticated radar system.

GONZALEZ OUTLINES PSOE PARLIAMENTARY STRATEGY

PM101255 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 4 Feb 82 p 6

[Excerpts] Madrid -- Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez yesterday delivered to the socialist groups in the Congress and the Senate a report on the PSOE's parliamentary strategy for the current session.

At the conclusion of the first part of the meeting Gonzalez told journalists that in his report he confirmed the PSOE's desire that the election not be brought forward, since this is the best thing for the democratic system. He added that although electoral expectations in the event of the dissolution of parliament seem to favor the PSOE, the party deems it more favorable for consolidating democracy that the election not be brought forward. The socialist leader added that parliamentary activity should continue seriously throughout 1982, carrying out everything resulting from the autonomy pacts between the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] and the PSOE.

Gonzalez stated that there is a question whether there will or will not be negotiations for an overall pact for the legislative term. "We have received no suggestion or offer for the legislative term from the government," he said, explaining that it could happen that the government may wish to be certain of the other groups' conduct concerning the various bills. In Gonzalez' opinion, the government feels that in order to complete the legislative term it must know what the PSOE's attitude toward the various bills will be, but at the same time it must distance itself from the socialists because we are already in a preelection stage, and "that is like squaring the circle." In this connection the socialist leader said that it is necessary to establish priorities and determine whether it is a matter of strengthening the institutions or else of entering into the preelection struggle.

Gonzalez disclosed that the parliamentary groups considered the various possibilities which could arise in the course of 1982, such as the election being brought forward to March, May or November. "In the last-mentioned instance, the budget debate would be avoided, and in the event of parliament's being dissolved in September to hold an election in November, we would be without the Cortes in the months of July, August, September and October, and the government would have television at its disposal. All these possibilities, as well as the consequences of a certain visit to Spain, have been considered," Gonzalez said, without being more specific about this issue.

He emphasized that the PSOE is currently mapping out parliamentary work until the end of the session, and that what should be aimed at is carrying out the agreements which were signed, thereby setting society's interests above electoral interests. He stated that the PSEO will continue to uphold its own political stances but will not prevent the country from being governed, "Although sometimes," he said, "this does not depend on us."

Finally, Gonzalez said that he does not see a coalition government in the distance. Concerning the "flights" from the centrist group, he said that an attempt is being made to create the impression that a UCD/popular alliance government is necessary with two intentions: "That either the day following the election the total of the two forces should be able to make possible a government of the 'broad right,' or that the entire right should run together in the election." However, he ruled out the possibility that the centrist group's vicissitudes might call into question parliament's legislative ability.

NORWAY

AWACS TO OPERATE OUT OF NORWAY BY END OF 1984

PM091659 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 4 Feb 82 p 3

[Terje Svabo report: "Better Air Surveillance in 1984"]

[Text] There is every reason to expect that toward the end of 1984 the so-called AWACS aircraft could be operating regularly from Norwegian territory, Norwegian Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad said at a seminar in Asker yesterday arranged by the Atlantic Committee. Sjaastad said that the aircraft will operate from Orland Airbase and that preparations are now in hand for extensions to the runways and for the construction of the necessary hangars. The defense minister pointed out that there was no question of these aircraft being permanently stationed at Orland. In his address on Norwegian defense policy Sjaastad said that the AWACS aircraft would give NATO greater insight into Eastern military activity and that, on the basis of Norwegian security interests and in accordance with our contributions to joint defenses, it is natural for such aircraft to operate from Norwegian territory as well. "This activity not only makes mobilization measures possible if the situation demands them, but it also tells us when we have nothing to fear in military terms. Sometimes this can be just as important, so that we avoid dramas and unintended escalation in a crisis situation," the defense minister said.

Sjaastad also told his audience that a number of preparations have already been made to receive allied aircraft in Norway in crisis situations, but that he did not want to hide the fact that there is still much to do in this field: "We need more materiel in contingency stockpiles at Norwegian airfields -- ammunition, fuel and spare parts. However, I can assure you that we are working on preparations for measures which will make it possible to receive air reinforcements and we have a well-founded hope that the situation will gradually improve," the defense minister said.

In his address the defense minister also touched on the fears among the population of the terrifying consequences of a possible future nuclear war. He said: "Fear is not the best guide to use when we are staking out our defense and security policy. On the contrary, fear often leads to apathy or to ill-considered solutions which make bad things worse. In my own view, the risk of war is no greater today than it has been in the past. In the days of the cold war there was much less contact between East and West than there is today. It is true that confidence between East and West has lessened since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the events of the last few weeks in Poland, but this is a confidence which at best was established in the 1970's, partly through the Helsinki Final Act," Sjaastad said. He added that even though there has been a deterioration in the international climate there is nothing to indicate that the danger of war between East and West has increased. "The danger of war does, however, increase if we in the West are not prepared to maintain a credible defense system. If we neglect our defenses, we run the risk of greater economic and political pressure. We must not forget that military superiority can also be used to bring about political concessions without a single shot being fired," the defense minister said.

Sjaastad commented on the discussion of nuclear versus conventional defenses. He said that today modern Soviet nuclear forces can threaten any and every target in Western Europe and North America. At the same time, the Soviet Union has also increased its superiority in conventional terms. He pointed out that some people today doubt whether NATO has any real chance of halting an attack through the use of nuclear arms. "These doubts can be countered by the assertion that within the framework of its present strategy NATO is striving for a better conventional balance with the Warsaw Pact. However, it is a fact that conventional forces are expensive both to buy and to maintain, while nuclear arms are more economical. "The question is whether Western societies are prepared to pay what it costs to raise the nucelar threshold and prevent our being dependent on nuclear arms to halt a conventional attack on NATO. "This is also a moral question, for inadequate conventional defenses could force us to be the first to use nuclear arms," Sjaastad concluded.

DENKTAS REBUTS KIPRIANOU STAND ON APPEAL TO UN

TA101722 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1300 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that Greek Cyrpiot leader Kiprianou's proposal to take the Cyprus issue to the UN General Assembly is incompatible with the ongoing peace negotiations and that it did not show good will. Replying to various allegations by Kiprianou, Denktas said: He wants to hold the UN General Assembly over our head like Damocles' sword.

Denktas pointed out that it would serve the interests of the Greek Cypriots to take the Cyprus issue to the UN General Assembly, because the assembly listened to the views not to the two concerned sides, but only of the spokesman of the Greek Cypriot administration, as the so-called Government of Cyprus. The head of state added that the Greek Cypriots have not been able to eliminate the status of the Turkish Cypriot side by means of weapons and economic pressure and they would not be able to eliminate it by means of UN resolutions. Recalling that UN resolutions envisaged the solution of the Cyprus problem through negotiations, Denktas expressed the belief that the world and the countries that understood the Cyprus problem would not authorize Kiprianou to crush the Turkish Cypriot people.

Stressing that the island became an island of peace with Turkey's return, Denktas said: For us to reach an agreement with the Greek Cypriots, a bizonal federal republic must be established and they must respect our rights and authority in our own federated state -- as envisaged by our founding partnership rights and as included in the agreement we signed with Makarios, an agreement that was confirmed at the Denktas-Kiprianou summit. These issues are being discussed at the intercommunal talks. It is not the Turkish Cypriots who are evading the talks; it is the Greek Cypriots, who do not want to solve the problem through negotiations and who want to achieve through international conferences what they could not achieve through force of arms in 1963.

COMMITTEE ON MISSING PERSONS RESUMES MEETINGS

TA101928 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1900 GMT 10 Feb 82

CLP STATES CONDITIONS FOR JOINING COALITION

TA101650 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] The executive council of the Communal Liberation Party [CLP] has decided to participate in a coalition government with the National Unity Party [NUP], provided certain conditions they were putting forward were agreed upon. The decision, which fully empowers the chairman and the executive committee and the negotiators of the party to hold consultations with the NUP, was taken at a meeting of the council last night which lasted late into the night.

Several of the conditions to be put forward by the CLP are said to be the nationalization of insurance companies, the restructuring of the public service commission, importation of basic goods by the government and the composition of the government and of the officials of the legislative assembly between the two parties.

PAPANDREOU DENIES U.S. NUCLEAR WEAPONS IN COUNTRY

NC101727 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 10 Feb 82 pp 1, 3

Given the fact that Greece belongs to NATO, Papandreou stated, and that 1 and 1/2 years ago we returned to the alliance's military wing, the obligation we have as a government is to protect the country's security. Our problem within the European framework is singular. For us, the problem is to what degree the alliance will guarantee our territorial integrity and national security. This is because we are under a threat, in a specific manner, from Turkey, which is raising claims to our territory.

If this problem is not overcome -- and it must be solved by NATO -- there is no doubt that Greece must find other ways to guarantee its territorial integrity. At the same time, the Atlantic alliance has only one goal: confrontation with the forces of the Warsaw Pact. For us this is not an urgent issue because our relations with the countries with which we have a border in the north have improved in many aspects. This problem could arise in the future if a world confrontation occurs. For us today, however, the real threat comes from Turkey. Consequently it is clear that we are interested in our defense against an enemy that truly exists.

There are no nuclear weapons on the U.S. bases on our territory. I have made it quite clear that we will not permit the installation of such weapons on our territory. Our aim is an agreement based on detente which will regulate the question of nuclear weapons.

In reference to the presence of foreign bases, I must state that their presence is contrary to our ideology and policy. At the same time, however, we do not intent to resort to unilateral actions. We have invited the United States to renegotiate the future of U.S. bases in Greece. These negotiations will start around March.

We have no desire to administer these bases because it is ridiculous to imagine that the Americans will allow such an administration to pass into the hands of others, no matter whether these others are Greeks or Italians who are their allies. We insist, however, on having full information on what is happening, for the following reasons: 1) We do not want and we will not permit the U.S. bases in Greece to be used in operations directed against countries with which we have good diplomatic relations; for example, the Arab states; 2) we will not permit any activity on these bases which will involve the leaking of strategic information which deals with our country. From the moment these restrictions become acceptable and within the framework of a temporary arrangement acceptable to both sides, we will be prepared to let these bases remain on our territory for a specific period of time.

Full accession to the European Community has had negative repercussions for us. We would prefer to have a special relationship with the EEC instead of participating as a full member. If we can have a special relationship in order to remain a member of the EEC, then the proposal will be acceptable to us. But if this bcomes impossible, we will withdraw from the EEC. We shall see about this in the spring.

AVEROF SEES KKE-BACKED THREAT TO LEGAL ORDER

NC102130 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1900 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] In a statement today Averof, chairman of New Democracy, returned to the subject of terrorism, which, he alleges, is occurring in the provinces. He also argued that there have been new complaints about violations that destroy the legal order and strike at democratic institutions.

Specifically, Averof stated that the federation of agricultural cooperatives of Thessaloniki had reported its large factories were occupied [by squatters], while this morning there was an attempt to seize the central offices of the federation. Averof said these occupations were led by an association controlled by the KKE.

Replying to these charges, the government spokesman said nobody has attempted to seize the federation's offices and emphasized that law and order are now under better control than ever before. In any case, the government spokesman observed, the leader of the official opposition ought to know that the government did not have to refer the solution of labor differences and demands to the MAT, the Units for the Restoration of Order.

KKE Response

NC102244 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2200 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] The KKE today issued a statement in connection with the statement by Mr Averof. The KKE statement says that by means of continuous and unacceptable statements, New Democracy is threatening and pressuring the government not to touch the rightwing cliques in the trade unions, the cooperatives and the state machinery and, in general, not to proceed with progressive changes. The KKE statement adds that the government must block the undermining offensive by the rightwing and must proceed -- by depending on the peoples movement -- in the direction of the people's mandate for change.

ITALY'S FANFANI CONCLUDES VISIT, DEPARTS 11 FEB

NC110946 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 0900 GMT 11 Feb 82

Shortly before his departure the president of the Italian Senate expressed full satisfaction at his talks with Chamber President Alevras and with the country's political leaders. Chamber President Alevras also expressed satisfaction.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES VIOLATION OF GREEK WATERS

TA111031 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] It has been announced that the allegation that a Turkish police patrol boat violated Greek territorial waters is unfounded. A statement by Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman says the charge d'affaires at the Greek Embassy in Ankara had informed the Foreign Ministry that a Turkish patrol boat approached within 1 mile of Greek fishing boats off Midilli [Lesvos].

The statement adds: The Greek charge d'affaires has been told that the incident was investigated by the authorities as soon as reports in connection with the incident appeared in Greek press organs and that it was learned that the Turkish patrol boat chased Greek fishing boats which in fact were fishing illegally in Turkish territorial waters. The chase ended as soon as the Greek fishing boats left Turkish waters. The statement concluded by saying that at no time were Greek territorial waters violated during this incident.

'PATRIOTIC' OFFICERS ARRESTED FOR DOUBTING JUNTA

TA101131 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0700 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Station commentary: "The Patriotic Officers Must Decide on Their Stand"]

[Text] In the wake of its takeover in Turkey, the military junta made promises on two subjects: first that it would eliminate terrorism and second that it would improve the economic situation. The men and officers of the armed forces -- which constitutes the basis on which the junta rests -- trusted the junta and believed their expectations would be met by the National Security Council through Ataturkist principles. The administration that took over on 12 September is now in its second year of rule. Let us consider what the situation is presently in our country. The communists, democrats and progressives who opposed the military junta from the very first day it assumed power feel the necessity and responsibility of pointing out some issues to those who supported the junta in the past, and warn them accordingly.

The first issue concerns the progressive and patriotic officers, who are faced by the threats, pressures and terror of the junta. We believe the main issue is the dissatisfaction felt by the officers and NCO's who are concerned with the use of the armed forces against the people. The fact that a state of war has been declared in military courts that are trying our people, workers and their democratic organizations is another development that increases their worries. Officers and NCO's are also greatly concerned over the undignified foreign policy being pursued which accelerates the process of breaking Turkey's relations with its neighbors and which turns a deaf ear to objections by the democratic European public.

The members of the armed forces are also pondering the placing of the national economy in the hands of Ozal -- an official of Demirel's Justice Party government that was toppled -- and are pondering the worsening living conditions of the people and the fact that all the burdens of the economy are being put on the shoulders of the workers and toilers. All officers and NCO's are aware of these problems and feel their responsibility toward them.

A piece of information that the junta tried to conceal from our people was published in a newspaper last week and heard all over the world. This report says 300 Turkish officers and NCO's have been arrested. Why have they been arrested? There is no need to give a person directions to a village that he can already see. The arrests only prove that all the concerns and worries listed above have spread among the officers and NCO's and that complaints have begun to be heard without efforts to hide them. No patriotic officer will remain silent in the face of the daily overtures being made to the United States and say yes to an undignified foreign policy.

The military junta, which only yesterday condemned the expansionist Israeli policies, had to retreat as a result of U.S. threats, disregarding friendship with the Arab countries. The junta is turning a deaf ear to complaints by the European democratic forces, which are in solidarity with Turkish progressive forces. Instead it is accelerating anti-Soviet propaganda. The junta has been left with only one friend: the United States. However, that country is the friend of the junta and not of the Turkish people. Meanwhile, the bargaining over the U.S. bases in Turkey is continuing. Overtures are being made by the junta for the United States to station the Rapid Deployment Force in our country. Hostility toward Greece has almost been transformed into the main tenet of Turkish foreign policy. Efforts are being made to deceive our officers through chauvinistic policies. Reports that about 300 aircraft are to be supplied by the United States are being splashed in the press in a bid to deceive the people. Those who refuse to be deceived by these tricks are being sent to prison and tortured.

The latest developments have presented a clear picture of the situation in our country. On one hand the pro-people forces are trying to reorganize and strengthen themselves and on the other the most reactionary forces are gradually being isolated. They are spreading pressures and terror as their isolation grows. The patriotic officers and NCO's cannot choose to be on the side of those opposing the people. They must make a decision.

MORE INFORMATION EFFORTS AGAINST ARMENIANS URGED

TA051631 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 31 Jan 82 p 3

[Excerpt] We keep saying that we have to change our stand in order to struggle effectively against the Armenian terror and propaganda. However, we avoid seeking a concrete answer to the question of what in fact we must do about it. Yet what is most important is what we are going to do after we decide to change our stand on this issue. Undoubtedly it is imperative that first and foremost we abandon the passive stand we have adopted so far and organize and run a dynamic and persuasive propaganda machine.

As pointed out in earlier articles, Turkey has no reason to feel guilty in the face of Armenian propaganda. Great possibilities exist to convince the world of our correctness. One such possibility is to organize the Turks abroad against the Armenian propaganda and involve them in this struggle and arm them with the necessary information so they can propagate the Turkish thesis. Another possibility is to exert efforts in a bid to attract the foreign media to our side. It is clear that in a bid to accomplish this we must first have a consistent, meaningful and topical policy in hand. Subsequently, efforts must be made to convince the mass media.

It can be claimed that presently there is already a sector among those influenced by the press ready to support the Turkish stand. These are the Jews, who know that the Palestinian terrorists are cooperating with the Armenian terrorists. A forged passport found on one of the terrorists who hurled a bomb on 3 October 1980 into the synagogue on Copernic Street has revealed this cooperation. The serial number on this passport has been found to be connected with the serial number of the passport carried by Hacik Avedisyan, the militant of the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia [asala] captured on 4 November 1981 at Orly Airport in Paris. Moreover, it has been determined that the same pistol used by an Armenian to attack a Turkish diplomat in Paris in 1981 was also used to kill the Jewish owner of a travel agency in Paris.

So, what we must do now is find out more about this cooperation and inform the Jews, who might not have been aware of it. However, we should make one point clear right here. If we do this, it should be taken neither as approval of Israeli policies against the Arabs -- particularly the Palestinians -- nor as a support for Begin's policies. These are two separate things.

EVREN OBSERVES END OF 'WINTER-82' EXERCISES

TA101240 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] The Winter-82 exercise organized by the 3d Army in Erzurum and Sarikamis ended today. Head of state Gen Kenan Evren, who is in Erzurum, went to the exercise area in Laleli and visited the logistics installations of the 29th Division. Later General Evren observed the end of the exercise, in which war games were carried out under very cold conditions and in deep snow. The exercise included ski tactics. He also observed winter training activities. The 3d Army commander, Gen Salahattin Demircioglu, said the Winter-82 maneuvers, which concluded with these exercises, had been carried out successfully.

In a speech, General Evren congratulated the units that had participated in the successful exercises. General Evren said: If they have to fight, the 3d Army units in this region would have to fight mostly under winter conditions. The Sarikamis battle of World War I, when an army corps was defeated during the winter, has been a great lesson for us. Therefore it is our main aim to ensure that our units in this region are prepared and equipped for winter conditions. General Evren noted that winter had hit the region harder than ever this year, adding: We have reached the conclusion that our soldiers and officers can fight with existing equipment even when it is 30, 35 or 36 degrees below zero Centigrade.

Mehmet Bican and Tevfik Fikret Dincer from the Turkish Radio and Television news center report that General Evren said he saw that the 3d Army units were making the necessary efforts to ensure peace and tranquillity in the country on the one hand, while standing highly prepared for the defense of the country -- their main duty -- on the other hand. General Evren added: Actually, our duty is to defend the country. However, sometimes it is necessary to defend against enemies inside the country. The armed forces will always be ready to defend the country against any threat, inside or outside. The head of state concluded by saying that the maneuvers had achieved their goal, adding: Our units can fight even under winter conditions and therefore we are leaving this region with complete satisfaction.

General Evren will return to Ankara this afternoon. National Security Council members General Ersin, General Sahinkaya, Admiral Tumer, General Celasun and the other commanders who observed the 3 days of exercises will return to Ankara with General Evren.

JURISDICTION ISSUE IN TRIAL OF IRANIANS STUDIED

NC101443 Paris AFP in English 1119 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] Istanbul, 10 Feb (AFP) -- The Istanbul civilian penal court has decided it is unauthorised to try 74 Iranian students who occupied the Iranian Consulate here last May to protest executions in Iran, judiciary sources said today. The case had first been brought before the martial law court, which sent the case to the civilian court. A higher court will now decide which court should have the case. The Iranian students were arrested by Turkish police on the basis of a complaint by Iranian Consul Sermeti Rad, and later released.

34 LEFTISTS MILITANTS FACE TRIAL IN ISTANBUL

TA081635 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1530 GMT 8 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Istanbul, 8 Feb (AA) -- Thirty-four members of a leftwing extremist group calling itself "the Partizan Path" will stand trial at a martial law court in Istanbul. The military prosecutor is charging the group with attempting to overthrow the constitutional order and to replace it with a Marxist-Leninist regime in keeping with the views of Dr Hikmet Kivilcimli.

They are also charged with exchanging fire with security forces, killing a worker by firing upon non-participants in an illegal sit-in at a Gebze factory in August 1980, and wounding two persons on other occasions.

CSCE SESSION OPENS WITH ATTACK ON USSR, POLAND

LD121244 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Felipe Sahagun report from the Palace of Congresses]

[Excerpts] French External Affairs Minister Claude Cheysson opened this morning's Madrid CSCE session with a very strong attack on the USSR and Poland, thereby continuing the offensive set in motion last Tuesday by the United States, Germany, Belgium and Spain in defense of human rights in East Europe. The freedom of Europe cannot be built on the suppression of liberties, he said. The 7 ministers and 10 ambassadors of the 35 signatory countries of the Helsinki Final Act included on today's list of speakers will be able to deliver their addresses. The Eastern countries have accepted that which they did not accept on Tuesday -- continuation of debates at an afternoon plenary session. British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington is speaking at the moment and the representatives of Norway, Czechoslovakia, Ireland and Denmark will probably be able to speak before lunch.

SOCIALIST INTERNATIONAL'S MOSCOW TALKS REVIEWED

AU091234 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 9 Feb 82

[Text] Vienna (SK) -- The most important result of the talks held in Moscow by representatives of the Socialist International [SI] is the impression that the Soviet Union does not intend to react to the deterioration of the international situation by military actions but that it continues to put its stakes on negotiations, arms control and arms reduction. The Soviet side has prepared far-reaching proposals for the Geneva negotiations. It is also reacting very calmly to the sanctions which the Reagan administration has launched and is now trying to expand with the aid of other governments. However, absolutely the most important thing is that, as opposed to Washington, no one [in Moscow] speaks about the possibility of using nuclear weapons.

In the Soviet Union they know just as well as a growing number of Europeans in the democratic countries that atom bombs do not defend anything but destroy everything. This was stated by Prof Walter Hacker, international Secretary of the Austrian Socialist Party [SPOE] on Monday after his return from Moscow, where he was received in his capacity as secretary of the SI Disarmament Advisory Committee -- together with other representatives of SI parties -- by Soviet State and Party Chief Brezhnev. He also had talks with leading Soviet functionaries, especially the head of the CPSU Central Committee's International Department, Ponomarev.

Since we found that our views on questions of disarmament and of safeguarding peace had a lot in common, I regarded it as all the more important also to speak about what is endangering detente on the Soviet side, Hacker said -- from Poland via Afghanistan to the human rights cases such as Sakharov's. The submarine incident in Sweden was not forgotten, either. I stressed that for a democratic socialist it was not possible to talk in Moscow about disarmament and detente without touching on these obstacles to detente.

The Soviet side refused to accept any responsibility whatever for the events in Poland after I spoke of its "partial responsibility" [mitverantwortung] in this respect. What happened in Poland, it was argued, were events and measures in an independent state. According to Hacker, the fact that the SI advisory committee was received in Moscow at the highest level and was able to hold its talks with higher-ranking representatives of the government policy than a few months ago in Washington might perhaps be due to the fact that the importance of the SI and its member parties in today's world is more correctly assessed in Moscow than in Washington under President Reagan.

SCHMIDT DOWNPLAYS PRESENT 'DIFFERENCES' WITH U.S.

[Text] Bonn, 11 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has warned against overemphasizing the present differences of views between Bonn and Washington. Speaking at a meeting of the German-U.S. parliamentary group in the Lower House, the chancellor said tonight that disputes had always cropped up in the past between the two governments, but they had always been able to bridge the differences because the firm foundation of common values and security interests had remained intact "and is still intact today."

Schmidt said that it was a very superficial view to assume that the question of how "vociferously or less vociferously" one should react to the Polish crisis endangered the coherence of the West. The serious economic difficulties now facing all Western countries and which might lead to "social destabilization" in individual states were much graver. Schmidt warned strongly against a return to national protectionism and in this context clearly criticized the decision of the U.S. Congress against the purchase of armaments from allied countries. While he could understand this decision he could not approve it. Schmidt strongly pleaded for intensified contacts at a broad level between the Federal Republic and the United States.

The U.S. ambassador in Bonn, Arthur Burns, said that the German-U.S. partnership must become still closer. He was profoundly disquieted by "noises" now heard in the U.S. Congress. This was due to mistakes of both governments and to misunderstandings.

BUNDESTAG WELCOMES TROOP SUPPORT AGREEMENT

[Excerpts] Bonn, 11 Feb (DPA) -- The Defense Committee today approved the planned agreement on German support for U.S. reinforcements in the event of a crisis or a war. A resolution, adopted by a majority, states that the committee sees the agreement as an important contribution to strengthening the conventional defense of the Federal Republic and Europe. According to information received by DPA, the German-U.S. agreement will probably be signed in Bonn at the beginning of March.

Greatly military and political importance is attached in Bonn to the "wartime host nation support," which provides for support for U.S. troops by the host nation in the event of war. The chairman of the Defense Committee, Werner Marx (CDU), stressed to DPA the importance of the German-American agreement. He emphasized the broad support within the committee for the project. He said that at a time when relations with Washington seem to be strained the agreement is all the more important because it substantially improves U.S. defense readiness in Germany and the German contribution. Furthermore, the U.S. promise to transfer additional divisions to the Federal Republic meets a firm German wish.

For the Social Democrats, Deputy Karl-Heinz Klejdzinski said that basically all measures and activities that strengthen the Federal Republic's defense capability are to be welcomed. The plans for strengthening the U.S. divisions will certainly serve to consolidate NATO. The agreement is a contribution to the concept of also safeguarding conventional forward defense.

On behalf of the CDU/CSU opposition, Klaus Francke urged an early signing of the agreement with the United States in the interests of forward defense.

BONN SUPPORTS U.S. CHEMICAL WEAPON DECISION

LD101716 Hamburg DPA in German 1612 GMT 10 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 Feb (DPA) -- According to Government Spokesman Kurt Becker, the Federal Government understands the decision of U.S. President Ronald Reagan to restart production of chemical weapons.

Speaking to the press in Bonn today, Becker emphasized that the United States maintained at at the same time the aim of persuading the Soviet Union to accept a "comprehensive and varifiable ban" on chemical weapons. The Federal Government hoped that the present "sovereign U.S. decision" would contribute to a change of stand in Moscow. Becker pointed out that the United States had stopped production of chemical weapons 3 years ago and that the Soviet Union had not reciprocated. Instead Moscow had meanwhile built up a considerable potential of its own, and at the same time the Warsaw Pact forces had been trained and equipped for the use of chemical weapons. Becker also pointed out that the U.S. chemical weapons were artillery ammunition and bombs for aircraft which were not in any way connected with the NATO dual decision on medium-range missiles. He further recalled that a stationing of nonconventional, that is also chemical, weapons outside the United States could only take place in agreement with the alliance and in agreement with the state concerned.

SPD disarmament expert Egon Bahr stressed in a North German Radio interview on Reagan's decision that the United States had the right to decide independently what it produced, but not on stationing. There was no U.S. declaration of intention and no steps had been taken to consult the alliance on stationing such weapons. "I would advise against it, because our answer in both cases would be no," Bahr said.

'TOUGHER' CONTROLS ON SOVIETS IMPLEMENTED

NC111152 Paris AFP in English 1108 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 11 Feb (AFP) -- West Germany has imposed stricter controls on the movement of Soviet diplomats, a reliable source said here today. The decision was part of sanctions against the Soviet Union in connection with Poland, to which members of NATO agreed at a meeting in Brussels last week, the sources said.

Although the movements of Soviet diplomats had always been controlled, "now we'll be a bit tougher in doing it," the sources said. Soviet Embassy personnel in Bonn, excepting the ambassador himself, have been ordered to give 48 hours notice to the West German Foreign Ministry of any journey they plan to make in the Federal Republic. Informed West German sources said the government of Chancellor Helmut Schmidt could decide also to drop ongoing economic negotiations with the Soviet Union regarding river navigation. Since the start of the Polish crisis, West Germany has refused to grant any further loans to Poland.

TOGO'S PRESIDENT WRAPS UP TALKS IN BONN

LD091736 Hamburg DPA in German 1611 GMT 9 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 9 Feb (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and the president of Togo, Gnassingbe Eyadema, stressed the "particularly friendly relations" between the Federal Republic and the Republic of Togo in Bonn today. In a talk with Eyadema, the Chancellor also praised Togo's moderate and stabilizing policy in its region and in the OAU. The talk in the chancellor's office marked the end of the president's 2-day working visit to Bonn. According to a government spokesman, Schmidt emphasized the need to support nonaligned countries like Togo politically and economically. They both agreed that keeping Africa out of the East-West conflict was a priority. The exchange of views, which together with a subsequent luncheon lasted for 2 and 1/2 hours, was also attended by Minister of State Hildegard Hamm-Bruecher from the Foreign Ministry and by SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski.

Eyadema had earlier received Economic Cooperation Minister Rainer Offergeld for a talk at Gymnich Castle, his Bonn residence. The talk focused on the political situation in Africa and cooperation in development policy between the Federal Republic and Togo. There was agreement that Bonn's assistance had proved very worthwhile. So far the Federal Government has allowed Togo, a former German colony, favorable credits and technical aid worth over DM430 million. Offergeld stated Bonn's basic readiness to assist a joint project between Togo and Benin to build a dam on the Molo border river for energy production. The project is intended to reduce Togo's dependence on expensive oil imports.

L'HUMANITE TEXT OF MARCHAIS PCF CONGRESS REPORT

PM101237 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 4 Feb 82 pp 3-9

[Apparent text of report by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais to the 24th PCF Congress 3 February: "Building a French Brand of Socialism" -- passages within slantlines printed in italics; first installment -- further installments will appear in subsequent DAILY REPORT's]

[Text] Comrades, the 24th PCF Congress is being held in an entirely new political situation. The responsibilities we have to shoulder are largely unprecedented. They stem from our party's original role. For ours is the party of working men and women. Ours is the party of those men and women for whom social change is a vital question. We are the party of socialism for France.

We have duties. We have the duty to do what we can to fulfill the country's expectations. We have the duty to do everything in our power to highlight the prospects now offered for creating the conditions for progress. We are determined to do that. French women and men can count on the PCF to make a wholehearted contribution to the realization of change.

Considerations and Lessons To Be Learned From the Past

The draft resolution prior to our congress expresses our position on the present and future. But before doing so, it proposes considerations and lessons to be drawn from the past. This is vital. Indeed, recent years have been characterized by an intense political and ideological battle. They ended in the new situation which I have just recalled. They also saw our party suffer a major electoral setback last spring.

A Debate on an Unprecedented Scale

A very broad debate developed in the preparatory discussion for the congress aimed at determining the causes of that setback. It was a debate on an unprecedented scale. Never before had so many of our party cells met so many times during preparations for a congress. For almost 4 months the communists together analyzed their party's past action in an earnest and ardent manner in order to understand better what happened recently and what must be done now and in the future. They did this in complete freedom, without any pressure and without complacency. To help their examination, a discussion forum, which was opened in L'HUMANITE, made it possible over a 9-month period for the essential ideas contained in the hundreds of contributions received to be expressed, circulated and compared, with a freedom of tone and opinion that even our adversaries were forced to acknowledge.

That debate naturally related to the most recent period, to the campaign for the presidential election and, more generally, to the 3 years that followed the 1977 break. That discussion confirmed that, although our activity has not been free of faults, our party and its leadership have always had one intention and one objective: To pave the way for change in the best conditions.

The Great Problem Facing Us

But above all the vast majority of communists are agreed that it is impossible to reach a just and clear view of the problems encountered, especially between 1977 and 1981, without considering the whole past historical period. And there is a fundamental reason for this which is connected with the very nature of the question facing us.

As I have just said, all our activity in the recent period has been determined by a single objective: To win as many working men and women, as many citizens as possible, over to a policy which makes it possible to steer the country out of the crisis. It was that intention that guided us in 1977, when we refused to abandon the policy of change defined jointly with the PS. It was also that intention that was the focal point of our whole campaign for the presidential election, especially in the efforts we made to publicize and win approval for the 131 proposals of our party's struggle plan.

However, we must admit that we did not attain that objective. Not only did we fail to increase the number of men and women who voted in favor of real solutions to the problems facing the people and the country, but the movement around the force bearing those solutions, around our party, shrank. As I noted at our Central Committee meeting on 25 and 26 June, the gap has widened "between the high level of the solutions which must necessarily be applied to overcome the crisis and the real level of the objectives for which it is possible to achieve broad support in the present political conditions."

That is the complex problem facing us. It is a problem our electoral setback merely revealed.

Clarity Requires a Return to the Most Basic Level

Therefore the aim is not to deny that a particular attitude in the battle we waged may have had a negative effect on the final result. But to seek the decisive causes behind the result at that level is a mistake. I will even say it is seeking cheap reassurance for yourself because it is failing to see that the causes for our setback are much deeper than that.

Moreover the results of the elections last May and June did not come like a thunderbolt in a clear sky. Instead they continued and abruptly accentuated a tendency toward the erosion of our electoral influence -- a tendency we have been observing in elections since 1973. Going back earlier than that date, they are the result of a longer evolution which began back in 1958 -- an evolution in which our party's influence experienced fluctuations and vaccilated around a level considerably lower than that of the years between 1945 and 1956.

Therefore, limiting ourselves to an examination of the recent period would be exposing ourselves to a superficial analysis without any future. As the draft resolution stresses, clarity requires us to pose the question of our strategy in its full extent and, so as to do that, "to return to the most basic level, to examine the overall course of our history in recent decades, the changes in the situation which have posed unexpected questions for us and the way in which we have answered them, in order to learn from them the essential political lessons."

When undertaking and carrying through that examination we present-day communists must in no way place responsibility on previous party leaders and members. Such an interpretation at worst stems from a malevolent questioning of intentions and at best a misunderstanding of our party's situation.

Indeed, responsibilities are collective among us communists. We all shoulder them. The effort of critical examination we have made is that of the entire party. It is a lucid and politically courageous effort inspired by the will to define ways of attaining future success. And it is a collective effort in which -- let it be said in passing -- we fear no comparison with practices in all the other political parties.

Therefore, over the past few weeks we have gone further into our consideration of our strategic lag we began 3 years ago at our 23d congress. The discussion dealt with all the questions raised and produced the broadest agreement on the ideas put forward by the draft resolution.

We are going to continue that discussion here. The delegates to the congress will be able to go over all the problems they want to discuss when they make their speeches. In this connection I would like to make a passing remark: Together with the comrades who expressed this concern in the discussion forum, I hope these 5 days of debate will be free, open, rich and useful, just like the 3 months of discussion we have just experienced together.

The Essential Point: Our Strategic Lag

Of course I cannot review all the strategic questions under discussion. I would, therefore, like to concentrate on the essential point, on which the communists have reached agreement; in other words this conclusion: Basically, the problems we have faced and are facing stem primarily from our party's lag in defining and proposing prospects for marching toward socialism, and a socialism that corresponds to the general conditions of a country like ours in the age in which we are living; from the lab in translating that policy into a practice that encourages understanding of it and support for it from all those men and women whom we want to win over and can win over to this fight.

We see now more clearly that since the fifties our country and the world have experienced radical changes which have all highlighted the same fact: Capitalism's inability to answer the new questions raised by social development; its entry into deep crisis; the need to go beyond that system and to establish an original socialism in France. The question of changing society has gradually come directly onto the agenda as "the practical answer to society's urgent problems." The socialist transformation of France has become the essential question -- the central question for the whole social movement.

However, it took us 20 years to give a practical definition, at our 22d congress, of a French brand of socialism and of a French way of achieving it. For 20 years we more or less remained prisoners of a "model" of socialism unsuited to our country and our age.

The Repercussions of Our Lag Have Placed Us in a Weak Position

That strategic lag has had important repercussions. It has had repercussions on our theoretical and political advances, which have all been deeply affected -- even the most important, and more generally it has had repercussions on our overall political approach. Indeed at the same time we were leaving questions of the future more or less unanswered, we fought to create the right conditions for political change. It was to that end that we moved toward a union taking the form of a joint government program.

However, the existence of the joint program, by centering the political debate on the struggle for change, merely posed even more forcefully that same question of the prospects, to which we ourselves were not giving an answer satisfactory to the conditions in our country.

Thus our difficulties were increased. My making do with proposing an intermediate step toward an objective which was inadequately defined and postponed until later, we ourselves helped weaken -- or even make people withdraw from -- the battle on the question, which was nonetheless decisive, of the nature of the changes necessary in French society. In addition, by signing a joint program in those conditions, we helped blur the differences between us and our partner, the PS, and at the same time we pushed broad sections of the people's movement toward the PS.

That trend was made all the easier by the fact that the Fifth Republic institutions, and especially the system of electing the president by universal suffrage, which was introduced in 1962, tend to polarize political life and push to one side the political forces which do not seem in the best position to feature in the second round. Thus the opinion that the PCF's effacement in the PS' favor was necessary for victory gradually took shape. This was especially the case since, faced with this electoral system, which is particularly dangerous for democracy, we decided not to present a Communist candidate for the presidential election in 1965 and 1974.

All those contributory factors placed us in a weak position.

By failing to place in good time at the forefront of our struggle the question of the lofty content of the solution the workers' intervention should impose. We placed ourselves in a weak position compared with those who were encouraging a wait-and-see attitude, passiveness, and the delegation of power to administrators [etats-majors].

By failing to define precisely and in good time the French brand of socialism we want, we placed ourselves in a state of weakness compared with those who were attacking the socialist countries and creating confusion regarding our objectives.

Finally, by failing to assert in each political battle our party's original and independent role, we placed ourselves in a weak position in face of the attacks launched by the right and the employers. And we also placed ourselves in a weak position in face of the PS, which did not conceal its aim of significantly weakening the PCF.

Carrying Through the Logic and Implications of the 22d and 23d Congresses

We have come up against all that over the past few years; in 1977, when we were unable to maintain the direction and fundamental provisions of the joint program, and also during the presidential and parliamentary elections in 1981.

It may seem paradoxical that we suffered the severest effects of this strategic lag at the very time we were trying to overcome it. But we had little time since our 22d congress in 1976 and our 23d congress in 1979. Above all the progress we made in this recent period was hindered by the consequences of our previous approach. Thus it was when we were drawing a new strategy and starting to implement it and promote it that we most strongly felt the difficulties connected with our historical lag. As the draft resolution explains, we found it "impossible, in a short space of time, to deploy all the new aspects of the strategy of the 22d and 23d congresses, which went in the opposite direction to the long-established attitudes accentuated by the logic of the joint program."

Moreover, it would probably be an illusion to believe that the new situation has miraculously removed the difficulties we encountered or that a congress resolution would be enough for our strategy and the new political practice it implies to become the common possession of all communists.

In many respects we still need to overcome the effects of our lag. Now the new political situation and the importance of our party's being able to play its role fully in it make it absolutely vital to achieve that as soon as possible.

The work of our 22d and 23d congresses provide a strong and broad basis for doing that. Far from calling them into question, our critical examination leads us to confirm their full value and to throw our whole 24th congress into the effort to "carry through their logic and implications."

Well, in order to contribute -- together with the draft resolution -- to the congress discussion, I would like to devote my report to the questions raised in this way. I would like to devote it to the questions of the future:

I -- The French Brand of Socialism

What kind of society do we want? For what kind of society are we struggling?

The draft resolution we have just debated replies in clear terms. We have made an irrevocable choice: A French brand of socialism; democratic, self-managing socialism.

That answer is neither hasty nor arbitrary. We first outlined it after the events of May and June 1968, in the /Champigny Manifesto/. Some 9 years ago we put forward for the first time the idea -- and I quote -- of a "French brand of socialism," defining it -- and I quote again -- as a "democratic socialism." That was written in 1973 in the book "Le Defi Democratique." "The PCF'S policy," we explained then, "defines a French path to socialism and a French brand of socialism."

Some 3 years later our 22d congress began to define the whole prospect of that original socialism and the path for attaining it. In 1979 our 23d congress extended our strategy of a democratic march to this socialism, which is itself democratic.

We are more determined than ever to stand by that choice, for it stems from the most fundamental facts of French society today.

1. We Want a Just Society

The society we are proposing is primarily a just society. Of course we do not pose the question of justice in the abstract, outside the realities of our country and our times. We are not living in the France of "Les Miserables" or "Germinal" or in a Third World country. We are living in late 20th century France.

In One Generation: Major Social Changes

In this France, in the space of one generation, the scientific and technological upsurge and its effects on production, the development of social life and people's struggles have improved the standard of living and radically changed consumption methods and many ways of living. For instance consumption has quadrupled in 25 years. Today more than 9 out of 10 households have a regrigerator, while only 1 out of every 10 had one in 1955. Some 8 out of every 10 households have a washing machine, whereas 1 out of every 10 had one in 1955. Some 7 out of every 10 households have an automobile, as against 2 out of every 10 in 1955. Some 9 out of 10 households have a television, as against 1 out of every 20 -- 18 times fewer -- in 1955. Some 7 out of every 10 households have a telephone, twice as many as 5 years ago.

This development has been accompanied by changes in relationships to property. For instance, sales on credit -- despite the traps they conceal -- are now commonplace; joint ownership -- despite the problems it raises -- has increased.

These social changes cannot be measured only in terms of increased consumption. Indeed the face of French society has altered radically. Ours was a country whose population has been largely stable since the early 19th century. Since the liberation, the French population has increased by one-third. Ours was a country in which capitalism was primarily that of people like "Le Pere Goriot": usurious, speculative and oriented toward colonial exploitation; a country with a largely archaic industry. In the space of 25 or 30 years the colonial system was dismantled, national production quadrupled, the number of salaried intellectuals doubled percent and secondary school staff increased almost sixfold. Ours was a country in which the rural world had considerable influence. Some 30 years ago 30 percent of Frenchmen were farmers. Today under 8 percent of the working population is employed in agriculture. Almost 9 out of every 10 Frenchmen live in cities.

Ours was a country in which the traditional middle classes who were not wage-earners played a very important social and political role. They have been virtually wiped out. Today more than 80 percent of the population of working age are wage-earners. Ours was a country with largely ossified, frozen and rigid social structures. Many of those structures have collapsed. Human relationships -- in the enterprise and city but also in couples or families -- are undergoing radical changes. To give just one example with numerous effects: Since 1945 the number of female wage-earners has doubled.

In short, in a very brief period of time major changes have occurred in virtually all spheres -- production and productivity, consumption, education and living conditions. Factories, laboratories and nuclear power stations have emerged. New machines do the work of the human hand and brain. Aircraft and fast trains criss-cross our sky and land. Expressways have been laid out. Cities and towns have grown. In 25 years more schools and universities have been constructed than had been constructed since the Middle Ages. The French people have equipped themselves with social security and one of the best health systems in the world. Means of communication, trade and travel have widened their relations and horizons.

A Deep Crisis in Society.

Does this mean we have experienced a kind of fairy tale and that our country is like some "wonderland"? Far from it. Not only has real progress not solved all the problems, but the profit system has also limited, curbed and even reversed that progress itself. It has resulted in the birth and growth of a deep crisis in society.

For instance, instead of improving the conditions of men and women at work, the introduction of scientific and technical progress has frequently led to a mass loss of positions [dequalification], to the spread of fragmented, repetitive and boring work, to the increase in the number of specialized working men and women. Instead of lightening the burden of work, the advances in production and productivity have in most cases increased exploitation.

In the same way female employment has resulted in the overexploitation of female workers within and outside the enterprise. The extension of education has produced a corresponding increase in social segregation and a very serious crisis in education. Intensive urbanization has ostracized the rural world and has disrupted lifestyles and social and family relationships in the town and especially in the big cities. From being a powerful means of information, communication and culture, television has largely become a channel of manipulation, obscurantism, standardization of ideas and isolation. Fifty percent of French people do not read or read very little. Fifty percent of French people do not go on vacation.

Statistics sum up these inequalities: 10 percent of families possess 60 percent of French wealth, while 50 percent of families only possess 5.5 percent. Even these figures are averages. In present-day France the maximum earnings gaps range from 1 to more than 100 [as published]. A confirmation of what we have been saying over the past few years: Poverty is far from having disappeared in France; social inequalities are far from having disappeared in France; social inequalities have become even more intolerable than in the past. That is the reality of the crisis affecting French society.

A great deal has been claimed, alleged and invented by those who wish to sow illusions to conceal the causes of this situation. Indeed this crisis is not the result of circumstances. It is not the result of external of inexplicable forces. It is the crisis of a society -- the capitalist society.

The Causes of the Crisis: Capitalism

What in fact are the causes of the crisis?

One cause of the crisis is the capitalist tendency to increase profits by reducing the share of the product given to the producers themselves, in other words, consumption by the people. But that tends to reduce the outlets at a time when technical progress can only bring in profits if production is increased on a massive scale. And that badly hits the rapid increase in the people's needs, which is connected with that same technical progress. This is the crisis of outlets.

One cause of the crisis is the capitalist tendency to increase profits by draining and redeploying the available resources, not into the products most useful to people and to the country but into those deemed most likely to bring the best returns on capital. But that produces tragic closures and unemployment and all kinds of imbalance: between regions, between branches of the economy, between cities and rural districts, between imports and exports. This is the crisis of the national production apparatus.

One cause of the crisis is the capitalist tendency to increase profits by massively increasing state aid to capitalist groups, but that increases the imbalance. This is the crisis of public financing.

One cause of the crisis is the capitalist tendency to increase profits by trying to earn returns on capital by investments in foreign countries and by all kind of speculation. But that increases unemployment already caused by the crisis in outlets and investments. And unemployment in turn affects economic development and profit. This is the crisis of exporting capital.

One cause of the crisis is the capitalist tendency to increase profits by artificially inflating prices, by increasing financial costs and other parasitic costs in an insane fashion. But this disruption creates problems for the creation of profit itself. This is the crisis of inflation. And it is also the monetary crisis engendered by inflation.

One cause of the crisis is the capitalist tendency to increase profits by overexploiting the workers. But that turns increasingly against maximum profit. Indeed today the workers' higher standard of education and qualification and initiative and the reduction in the work week are all essential factors in economic progress. Overexploitation is a source of absenteeism, accidents, illness, falling production and a lowering of quality and even rejection of work. This is the crisis of work.

One cause of the crisis is the capitalist tendency to increase profits by exploiting natural resources with a productivist intensity which challenges the laws of nature and leads to destruction, irreparable losses, waste and imbalance. This is the tendency toward crowding the workers together by imposing anarchical urbanization and turning the rural districts into deserts. But this plundering is reaching a danger level which is also threatening profits. This is the crisis of the environment.

All these causes are interwoven and they interact. These are the insuperable limits of capitalism.

The Crises Can Only Be Overcome by Building a Different Society

This system's only real aim is to amass increasing amounts of capital and to make that amassed money profitable in the short term and at any price. Therefore capital is not essentially a production factor, but production itself becomes a factor in capital. The determining objective is not to manufacture products in the most useful, economic and lasting way but to produce an increase in capital. Thus the enrichment of a few prevails over the needs of all. Money dominates the human aspect.

It is true that this system is making considerable efforts to adapt. But it disturbs the rational exercise of the economic functions necessary to the nation. It is incapable of using all the possibilities of science and technology, all the existing potential, for the people's happiness. Through its very efforts and whatever room for maneuver it still has, it is proving increasing unable to solve the crucial problems of social development. It is emerging increasingly as a force countering progress.

This is the crisis of French society. It reflects the growing stagnation in the capitalist system in face of the rise of the productive forces and the growth of human needs. It produces absurd situations, chaos, and intolerable suffering.

This is a structural crisis, a comprehensive crisis which affects economic, social and political life, the world of ideas and culture, behavior and morality. It proves by adding A to B that it is possible only to break this vicious circle by building a different society.

In France today the majority of working women and men and young people are still excluded from a life worthy of our age. They face unemployment, job insecurity, price increases, lack of social, cultural and sports facilities, uprooting, frustrations, the weakening of personal relations, and insecurity. I repeat that millions of them can be described as suffering from "modern poverty," as we said in 1973 at our party's 20th congress.

The aspiration to justice, therefore, has not been rendered irrelevant by the progress of the recent decades. Quite the reverse; the new inequalities big capital has created by distorting that progress are all the more intolerable.

The Main Demand of Our Times: Justice

A just society is, therefore, the main demand of our time. Our country needs such a society to overcome its difficulties. Human progress requires it. It corresponds to our most deep-seated conviction.

/Justice first means full employment./ Indeed as the year 2000 approaches, how can anybody accept that a single man, woman or young person should still suffer the tragedy of unemployment, the humiliation and anguish of feeling rejected, thrown on the garbage heap and despised? How can anybody accept that the country's economy should still have this millstone around its neck? It is unacceptable. The right to work, the right of each man and woman to secure a good stable job and having the oppotunity of changing it is the first distinctive characteristic of the French brand of socialism we want.

/Justice also means an adequate purchasing power, appropriate resources for each man and woman./ Indeed how can anybody in this day and age accept that men and women should be without the bare essentials of housing, food, and decent clothing, for obtaining health care with all the modern advances, for giving their children a good trade, for travel and entertainment? It is unacceptable. Adequate and increasing resources for all workers and retired workers so that they can organize their lives in material security and hence, especially, an improvement in the lot of the most underprivileged people and an end to all poverty is another objective of the French brand of socialism we want.

/Justice also means radical changes in the conditions and nature of work./ Indeed how can anybody accept that society today should perpetuate what Marx called more than 100 years ago "the compartmentalized individual, a mere agent of a retailing social functioning"? That is unacceptable. Work should not be merely the obligation to earn your living, but should enable the worker to express himself. The general promotion of the working class, with more specialized, interesting, rich, creative and responsible work, respect for the dignity of men and women at work, and in particular the reduction of semiskilled work -- that is another essential aspect of the French brand of socialism we want.

Justice also means equal access to health care, equal access to education, sports and culture. Indeed how can anybody accept at the end of this century that the workers should have a shorter life expectancy than others? How can anybody accept that their children should have less hope of learning than others? It is unacceptable. Fully realizing the right to health, introducing a democratic and modern reform of the national education system are imperatives for the French brand of socialism we want.

We make no secret of the difficulties of the task. Making society progress while enabling all men and women to enjoy its progress is an amibitious objective. It presupposes an end to all kinds of capitalist waste and confusion. It presupposes hitting out at excessive profits and excessive incomes. It presupposes -- and we are not trying to hide this -- that an effort be made by those who have the means of doing so. Because inequalities in income and inherited wealth must be reduced and the scale of salaries must be narrowed, starting by increasing the lowest wages.

We do not have a simplistic and unrealistic view of all that -- a view unsuited to a country like ours. Nothing is more contrary to our plan than dullness, barracks-style life and shortages. The democratic socialism we want is a far cry from any abstract eqalitarianism and is not based on the postulate that all individuals are identical and interchangeable. But its aim is to enable each one, man or woman, to develop his personanality and organize his life with solidarity.

That is why, for instance, we reject the standardization of consumption as crazy in our plan for a French brand of socialism. We do not separate -- and more especially do not contrast -- individual and collective consumption.

We Reject the Standardization of Consumption and Incomes

What we want is to give all men and women the means of satisfying their personal needs and those of their family in all spheres. Therefore -- and this is the first condition -- purchasing power must be increased. At the same time, we must develop the facilities without which it is impossible to satisfy those needs in the present age. For instance having the means to raise your children does not just involve earning a better wage, receiving higher social benefits and living in a comfortable dwelling; it is being able to give them the education of your choice in a family atmosphere that corresponds to your views and preferences, and it is also guaranteeing that those children receive good teaching, are monitored by a school medical service worthy of the name, and have the opportunity to find entertainment and engage in sports and cultural activities outside the home if they or their parents so wish. The same applies to all spheres.

We also reject the standardization of incomes in our plan for a French brand of socialism. The idea of bringing everybody down to the same level is foreign to us. What we want is to enable all men and women, and not just a minority, to enjoy conditions of life that correspond to our times and the commodities offered by a modern country. We do not want to remove these conditions and commodities from the workers -- whether wage-earners or self-employed -- who enjoy them, but we want to give everybody access to them.

We are in favor of narrowing the hierarchy, but we want a heirarchy that really depends on qualifications for work, and on each man's and woman's initiative.

Having said that, I repeat with full conviction that justice must be achieved!

2. We Want a New Growth

To achieve justice, there must be new growth.

For a long time capitalism has told the workers: "Produce more and you will live better." For more than 20 years French production increased considerably. Did the standard of living for the majority of the French people improve?

Undoubtedly it did, but not in proportion to the increased production. And at what price was this achieved? I have recalled that.

Then the crisis came.

Capitalism then told you: "Zero growth. Produce less and you will live better." Its propagandists were seen advocating a kind of "wartime economy," "restrictions" and "austerity." "Make do with little," you were told. "Spend less. Make sacrifices." The adverb "too much" dominated those statements: "You want /too much/. You are receiving /too much/ medical care. There are /too many/ women at work; let them stay home." And so on and so forth. Only profits were spared that /too much/.

In practice that means the maximum compression of direct and indirect earnings. "Well, of course," they explained peremptorily, "that is necessary if we are to be able to export, to export at any price. So we will swell the profits." And they added with the semblance of mathematical certainty: "Profits mean investment and investment means jobs."

If only it were true! But all our experience belies it. Zero growth, austerity, incomes policy are all well-known to the French people now. Those cures are poisons. They lock France into the crisis. They simply confirm capitalism's effort to impose reduced consumption and more intense exploitation on the pepple at any cost, for the only valid growth for capitalism is the growth of capital. Zero growth perhaps, but not for profits!

Our Choice of Society: A Human Growth

That experiment has been tested. There will never be a way out on that path. For France, the future belongs to a new growth; a human growth that is neither austerity nor capitalism's blind productivism.

Capitalism is earning short-term profits. Creating a French brand of socialism involves replacing that with new and more complex but effective criteria of social and national profitability.

Capitalism is the scourge of unemployment. Creating a French brand of socialism involves truly giving priority to employment in the economic strategy by making it the determining aim of any calculation and any orientation from the start. That implies a new kind of productivity. In some cases, for instance, that could lead to chosing techniques that maintain or create good jobs in preference to others that destroy jobs.

Capitalism means suppressing needs. Creating a French brand of socialism involves replacing that by taking account of the real needs, of social progress, of the quantitative and qualitative improvement of consumption for the largest number of people.

Capitalism means lack of, and sometimes rejection of, research, the inability to incorporate the full extent of scientific approaches and results into production. Creating a French brand of socialism involves pushing the basic research and development effort to the furthest extent on as many fronts as possible and ensuring the vital and reciprocal link between research and production.

Capitalism means distortions and disproportion between sectors and branches and imbalances between regions. Creating a French brand of socialism involves developing the national territory in a different way, taking account of all the new transportation and communications possibilities, the relative independence of production units from sources of raw materials, and modern energy capacities. It involves developing all that is possible throughout the country and manufacturing French goods throughout France.

Capitalism means the destruction of nature. Creating a French brand of socialism involves organizing growth that is low in energy and raw materials, that is vigilant toward nature, air, water, the landscape and every living thing. It involves building cities on a human scale.

In short, social progress, national independence, regional fairness, ecology and urbanism -- in fact all the great needs of our time -- require a new economic rationale, a new efficiency, a type of development in which quality and quantity are no longer mutually opposed but go hand in hand. It is a choice of society.

Social Ownership and Private Ownership

If this new type of development is to be implemented, it must be designed, directed and controlled by and for the workers, consumers and users and citizens. The economy must be controlled by men, not men by the economy. This control presupposes that the major means of production and trade become the property of society. It requires an adequate set of democratic nationalizations and an adequate development of the public sector and its guiding role.

Nationalization is not a communist hobby-horse. The reason we attach vital importance to nationalization is simply that it is vital in order effectively to meet the present needs of a developed country like ours. It is ridiculous to think the new growth can be achieved with big capital at the helm.

Does this mean we want to nationalize everything? We do not want a standardization contrary to the situation and to the needs in this sphere any more than in that of consumption or incomes.

A French brand of socialism is inconceivable without individuals and families having the opportunity to own the home in which they live, their automobile, a second residence or other existing or future consumer goods.

But it is also inconceivable without the existence, alongside the public sector, of other forms of social ownership -- cooperatives, friendly societies, associations, and communal, departmental and regional ownership -- and of an economic sector based on private property.

I repeat, it is inconceivable. And it is inconceivable in view of the best solutions for developing French society.

For instance, consider the small and medium-sized enterprises, or traders and craftsmen. This type of production and service, which has been developed in our country for a long time, offer undoubted advantages of flexibility, mobility and adaption to demand. Even the most modern kind of production should not imply solely mass production. In addition to that there is the capacity the small and medium-sized enterprises, commerce and craftsmen have for creating jobs in a decentralized way in the regions and their contribution to the life of towns and cities. In short, we are not granting the small and medium-sized enterprises a reprieve for some electoral or tactical consideration; we need them to develop a socialist economy.

That does not mean the private industrial and commercial sector can disdain or neglect the workers' rights. Quite the reverse. We maintain that the prosperity of those enterprises cannot be achieved on any pretext at the expense of the working and living conditions of their employees, whose rights we defend with the greatest vigor.

Agricultural Ownership

The same approach led us to define our position on agricultural ownership more than 10 years ago. The peasants' role is vital for developing the economy in our times. It is also important for protecting the environment. In our country there is no need to ensure the peasants' ownership of the land by an agrarian reform, which entails vast distribution and thousands of expropriations. One of the characteristics of French agriculture is that many of the peasants have owned their land for a long time. Therefore under the French brand of socialism the aim is to guarantee such ownership and its transfer by inheritance, and to enable the farmers who need it to have priority in buying or renting the available land.

Nor is there any need in our country radically to reorganize agricultural production. Another characteristic of French agriculture is that is was developed and modernized mainly on the basis of the family farm, with high yields and a small labor force. The aim of a French brand of socialism is to encourage the continuation of modernization by just rewards for farming and by supporting the cooperative movement which already exists and which the peasants will develop in the way they wish.

The Workers' Intervention

In a general way this set of economic changes forcefully poses the question of the intervention by the workers and citizens at all levels of choice, orientation and implementation.

Today the employers still regard themselves as absolute masters in the enterprises. But this monarchical attitude is increasingly coming into conflict with the needs of production and of the producers. If they are to be developed, the productive forces require increasing creativity and initiative from the workers. The employers' attempts to obtain those requirements are clashing with the outmoded nature of old heirarchies, divisions between decisionmakers and executives, between the managers and the managed. It is no longer possible to confine the mass of manual and intellectual workers to subordinate, purely executive tasks. As we have said often enough; the enterprise must stop being a latter-day Bastille.

In the French brand of socialism participation increasingly will become the goal and driving force of economic progress. This radical change presupposes the creation of new social relationships within the enterprises. The aim is to enable the whole social movement to set its own development objectives. To do that, it is necessary to draw up with the workers and the population at all levels a democratic plan which will be implemented by contractual means and not by administrative directives. The national enterprises must be given the means of having real managerial autonomy. In a word, the workers must be encouraged to have real access to responsibilties at all levels, and we must move toward self-management.

3. We Want Democracy and Liberty

France is a country of freedom.

The cry of "Long live liberty" uttered by people upholding their rights against arbitrariness, humiliation and oppression has sounded down through our history for more than 1,000 years. In the Middle Ages it was the cry of the serfs in revolt against their feudal attachment to the glebe. It was the cry of the artisans, the tradesmen, the journeymen and the intellectuals "forming the Commons" against the nobles. Later it was the cry of the Humanists, then of Gassendi and Descartes, the Encyclopedists, the bold upholders of free thought. "Liberty, dear liberty," the Marseillaise will sing across Europe.

Through the Centuries of France's History: The Fight for Freedom

All this history shows that sermons, proclamations and declarations have never been sufficient to produce a single scrap of liberty. Freedom is earned and upheld. It is a battle.

Despite numerous failures and indescribable sufferings, the people's struggles for freedom -- too often ignored by official history -- shook the Ancien Regime. And this mainly is why the revolutionary bourgeoisie in 1789 and 1793 was able to mobilize the people for the decisive assualt against feudalism. Since then, none of the freedoms which were preserved, extended or acquired have been granted by the bourgeoisie. All of them without exception were seized by the people, and increasingly by the working class. "Live free or die," the rebels of 1848 and the fighters of the Commune had on their flags.

These liberties constitute a rich heritage. In our country -- as in very few other countries -- franchises and communal immunities were established as early as the 11th century. And as early as the 12th and 13th century serfs gained freedom at the price of daily resistance against lords and through powerful movements. Unlike the case of other regions in Europe, where serfdom, tyranny and obscurantism prevailed until the 18th and 19th centuries and even to the threshold of the 20th century, in France nation and freedom developed together right from early days.

Thus the French people have learned to fight for freedom over the centuries. And every time they abandoned themselves to those who misused the word "freedom" to lead them onto the paths of dictatorship, authoritarianism and personal power, they paid a bitter price for it.

At the same time, rationalism, the critical spirit, individualism and love of life, expressed both in popular traditions and in sublime creation, have stamped their seal on the consciousness of the Franch people.

In short, the profound masses of the Franch people have seen for 1,000 years their own aspiration and, let us say, their own existence reflected in the demand for freedom.

We Are the Continuators of These Struggles

We are the sons and daughters of those people. We are imbued with their mentality and we are the continuators of their struggles. To us freedom with peace is the supreme asset.

Ever since 1920 we have waged a struggle with undiminished enthusuasm against all injustices and all oppression. We embarked on the path to freedom by opposing colonial wars from the Rif War in 1925 to Indochina and Algeria. We embarked on the path to freedom against fascist subversion when we called on the French people on 9 February 1934 to participate in the demonstration from which the popular front "for bread, peace and freedom" was born. We embarked on the path to freedom at the side of the Spanish Republic, which was abandoned to Franco and Hitler. We embarked on the path to freedom in 1938 against the Munich capitulation, which our party was the only party to oppose -- a fact forgotten by too many people. We embarked on the path to freedom until death, and this was the path taken by people like Semard, Peri, Catelas, Wodli, Danielle Casanova, Fabien and thousands of other resistance workers, who could have said with our Comrade Aragon, "My party has restored France's colors to me," and with our Comrade Eluard, "Freedom, I am writing your name."

Freedom -- The Entire Meaning of Our Struggle

I do not claim we are an example of human perfection. Perfection does not exist. But I state after 61 years: Our activities have never deviated from the French line of which we are the heirs and along which we are determined to continue, without weakening, in new and diverse situations.

It is not in the least surprising that we are indefectibly attached to all freedoms. This attachment has not been dictated by either circumstances or the demands of propaganda. I will not even emphasize the fact -- even though it is true -- that it springs from our ideal. For above all it is merely a result of what we are, of the origins, life, history and individual hopes of all of us, men and women.

In this hall and on the rostrum I see men and women who are either manual workers, office workers, farmers or intellectuals from all over France. Is it not true, comrades, that the whole aim of your daily struggle everywhere is to achieve for yourselves and for all the men and women belonging to your class and your people a better, fairer, more secure and more beautiful life, a freer life and a freer society?

How long has it taken, how many struggles had to be waged, how many sacrifices have had to be made to protect and develop every particle of dignity and every spark of freedom? Every time a boss violates a right in his enterprise you communists can be seen on the front line, fighting together with the entire party for the freedom of the workers. Every time violence, bullying, contempt and intolerance appear in any city, you communists can be seen on the front line defending, together with the entire party, the freedom of its inhabitants. Every time democracy is violated, diminished or threatened at either local or national level, you communists can be seen on the front line defending, together with the entire party, the freedom of the citizens. Every time human rights and freedoms are crushed anywhere in the world, you communists can be seen on the front line defending, together with the entire party, the freedom of peoples.

This has been the case for 61 years. Let us be proud of the fact that for 61 years freedom has been the French Communists' daily bread. Especially because beginning in 1920 capitalism has been a hard and profitable teacher for us. By harrying, persecuting and excluding us, by subjecting us to repression, witch hunts, bans and either open or underhanded ostracism, the capitalist forces have unwittingly helped us to realize still better -- even though it was hardly necessary -- the incomparable value of freedom. The teaching of those who believe that the workers and peasants are all right as far as work is concerned but that management should rather be the concern of other people -- that teaching has turned us forever into steadfast supporters of the broadest possible democracy or participation and of freedom for one and all. What is more, at a time when capital is seeking to break and curtail freedoms so as to save its privileges, we are defending these freedoms -- even those that are still occasionally called "bourgeois freedoms" -- just as we defend our work tools against the wreckers. We want to maintain, enrich and extend them by means of new freedoms and new rights. We want to do so because this is indispensable for implementing socialism.

We Have Unreservedly Condemned Stalinism

Oh, I know -- I can already hear those who proclaim their hatred of socialism in the newspapers and on the radio exclaiming, "And what about Stalinism? Have you forgotten that?"

Let's be clear about this: It was the 20th CPSU Congress in 1956 that revealed the crimes and dramatic violations of socialist legality committed in the Stalin era. Who can mention any other party or government that has so openly criticized its own mistakes in public and promised to correct them? As for us French Communists, we have unreservedly condemned Stalinism. And if you please, esteemed critics, you who degrade liberty by turning it into a propaganda machine against socilaism, what do you accuse us of? What responsibility are you trying to make us assume for acts we have not committed? We French Communists, from generation to generation, wherever we have been -- in meetings or in plants, in the government or in camps -- we have never attacked liberties. And not all the parties in France can say as much. I reject your groundless accusations.

We Provided Constructive Replies to All the Questions We Were Asked

I reject them all the more as we have studied a draft for a socialist society adapted to France today: French socialism, in liberty and by liberty. As an example, let us cite some of the questions we have resolved.

/Alternance?/ We have been saying for 10 years: If the majority of the people withdraw their confidence after once giving it, we will respect universal suffrage by stepping down from power. You do not make people happy without their support, and even less in opposition to it.

/The one-party system?/ In 1963 Maurice Thorez said that to make this a condition for socialism is not in line with the traditions, or political habits or the state of society in France.

/Independence of trade unions?/ A 1979 document confirmed again that we reject the idea of a "transmission belt" between our party and the trade unions. In our opinion, the trade unions should be totally independent of the government and the bosses, of the church and the parties.

/Individual and collective freedoms?/ In 1975 we elaborated a "declaration of freedoms" entitled /To Live Free/, guaranteeing all the freedoms already gained and the new freedoms needed by our people. This declaration, which we intend to insert at the head of the constitution, has been submitted by us to the National Assembly and submitted for the French people's discussion. Our proposition is still valid.

/Freedom of conscience?/ Not only do we recognize this in the most explicit way, but our party has also had credit since 1936 for breaking with narrowminded anticlericalism by extending a hand to believers -- which does not rule out, on the other hand, a sincere and open discussion with them. As for the secularity of schools, we have always upheld this and we have specified since 1970 our opposition to all "official philosophy."

/Cultural diversity and freedom of creativity?/ In 1966 the Argenteuil Central Committee criticized the aspiration to dictate in this sphere and came out against all limitations of the "right of creative workers to research."

/As for the dictatorship of the proletariat/, our 22d congress marked a logical and decisive turning point by deeming that it did not suit France.

These constructive replies, which the draft resolution takes up, must still be developed, completed and deepened by us in an effort at continual theoretical and political elaboration. But they define well the bases and perspectives on which and for which our party fights, and recruits and educates its members.

We Want French Socialism, in Liberty and by Liberty

Obviously this is not in line with the "model" of socialism with which our critics reproach us. and which is in the minds, it must be said, of many people who do not know the truth regarding our policy and our plan for society. In effect, do not lose sight of the fact that all our opponents, given substantial coverage by the media, foist on people as a plain truth a caricature of our intentions and our actions. We must show greater perserverance and boldness in highlighting convincingly the liberating essence of our plan for society.

For a long time, it is true, we believed in the existence of a "model," even if we noted at the time the French variations of that model. But we have settled this question rationally and rigorously. Socialism cannot be a graft onto the national stem. It is not more a question of transplanting a "model" to France, even if it be acclimatized, than it is of creating a "model" or a "countermodel" of socialism. It is a question of making the French brand of socialism emerge from the national reality of France, from the contradictions and hence from the possibilities of French society itself. That is why the French brand of socialism we want cannot fail to preserve all France's acquired liberties, while enriching them, deepening them and giving them new dimensions.

This meets the deepest human aspiration and the deepest social need. I have shown this: To implement the immense and innovative task of socialism, it is necessary for millions of women and men, whose diversity gives the people their form, to take the helm. It is necessary to develop liberty and democracy as never before and to introduce self-management. That is true efficacy and the only way out.

Socialism Needs Freedom

Freedom -- what a force! We want it, we need it like we need air to breathe if we are to make socialism succeed.

/Individual freedoms/, to guarantee to every man and woman personally, in private life, in their correspondence and conversation, in their movements, the security without which they cannot become fully involved and legal guarantees to protect every man and woman from tyranny.

/Freedom of expression, of assembly, of demonstration, of association, of petition/, to allow all opinions to make themselves known and to confront each other, to allow new ideas, however bold, to be tried out and to make their way. To allow all men and women, individually or collectively, to voice their claims, proposals and criticisms to all bodies and institutions.

/Freedom of scientific, literary and artistic creation, freedom of study and publication/, to promote the necessary scope for thought and research.

/Trade union freedoms, including, naturally, the right to strike, the new right to work and freedoms at enterprises/, which must develop unprecedentedly.

/Freedom of opportunity for everyone to all public appointments/ and the guarantee of the fundamental rights of public office.

/Political freedoms/ to enable every man and woman to be a sovereign citizen and to take part in the elaboration, execution and monitoring of decisions in all spheres of political, economic, social and cultural life. This right of citizens to participate must be guaranteed by the right of political parties to exist and organize themselves freely. It must also be guaranteed by the democratic election of all deliberating assemblies. This means, in our view, the regular holding of elections by free, equal and secret universal suffrage, with each citizen having the right to elect and to be elected. And this means elections by proportional representation -- the only electoral system that ensures the precise representation of voters.

/Political freedoms/ to enable the state, as representative of the working people, to contribute to the satisfaction of the nation's needs and aspirations. This means, in particular, the establishment at all levels of real power for elected assemblies, the separation of the executive and the legislature and the rejection of personal power.

/Local, departmental and regional freedoms/ to develop real decentralization, making it possible -- with real powers and means at each level -- to decide everything that can be decided at the lowest level, that is, the level closest to the people. This means, in particular, true regional power and the development of local self-management.

And with all this -- allow me to emphasize this point -- /freedom of information/, which is a human right in our era and a vital necessity for democracy. In this sphere the French still cannot see the arrival of the change they await. Honesty in information and pluralism have still to be won in radio and television. The space devoted to people's problems, their lives, their questions, their needs, remains very poor. What are we to think, for instance, of television, a French public service, which goes to plants in Poland to question the workers about their freedoms -- this is information -- but never enters a French enterprise to ask the same question of our own employees -- that is, a refusal to inform? Is that freedom? And where do the bans come from? It is important to struggle to ensure that radio and television meet modern needs as regards information, culture and leisure, guaranteeing the expression of currents of opinion, increasing knowledge and developing initiative and responsibility among citizens.

I will sum up. The development of freedoms is essential to enable working people, citizens, men and women, to make the choices that will cause society to progress according to their own aims, by the rhythm and in the forms they themselves decide. This claim to freedom for everyone accords today with the interests of the nation against the increasingly parasitical class that is crushing and engulfing it. It is the common denominator on the basis of which we propose to bring together the most diverse strata of society in order to advance together. Tomorrow, I am sure, the French will live, above all, by freedom. That is the French brand of socialism we want.

4. We Want a New Cultural Renaissance

The French brand of socialism is also, in our view, a society of culture.

Promoting culture -- in the broad, strong sense of the word -- is a necessity as regards the major objectives of social transformation.

Social justice? Living life to the full means having access to all the spiritual assets born of the development of mankind. It means ensuring that every individual can develop or create in himself or herself all possible capacities.

New growth? A condition of this, as I have said, is the full utilization of knowledge and skills, attaching full value to the knowledge and initiative of all members of society.

Democracy, self-management? They presuppose that every citizen is capable of assuming increasing responsibilities at all levels.

Thus the socialism we want cannot tolerate cultural poverty any more than material penury.

Capitalism Mutilates the Human Being

Where is France in this respect?

On the one hand it has considerable, original assets: Its historical gains, the traditionally high level of research and creation, education and the health system, a very rich diversity, millions of qualified intellectuals. Added to that are the extraordinary opportunities of our era. But on the other hand, let us have the courage to say: These gains, which are also marked by selfishness and class malthusianism in an inegalitarian society, increasingly bear the marks of a decade of crisis, which has ravaging and at times dramatic effects in the sphere of culture.

So to choose the general promotion of culture is to respond to urgent needs. This is all the more necessary in that capitalism traps the development of individuals and social relations in an increasingly anachronistic and pernicious threefold division. Capitalism, in fact, is the perpetuation of the division between physical labor and intellectual labor. It separates the elements of an indissoluble whole, whereas we should be bringing knowledge and production, theory and practice closer and closer together. Capatalism is the perpetuation of the division into social classes. It confines cultural progress to a minority, whereas the nation's wealth depends increasingly on the flourishing of all the people. Capitalism is the perpetuation of the division within the individual. It divides life into a time for alienated labor and a stunted free time, whereas society needs individuals who are integrally developed, each of whom aspires increasingly to higher, richer personal unity.

This threefold division mutilates the human being, society, culture itself. Advancing toward socialism means liberating the scope of opportunities and new aspirations while working to reunify the individual, society and culture in the richest possible diversity. That is what we have called a /new cultural Renaissance/.

We Want a New Future for Culture

A new Renaissance means first of all attacking segregation in all spheres and freeing culture to make it the common property of all. It also means new organization of labor. And new education, offering everyone multiple opportunities for development, linking life to the passion for knowledge and understanding, developing respect for others, solidarity and responsibility.

A new Renaissance also means promoting the development of each individual. The same applies to initial education for small children and schoolchildren. And -- a vital issue -- all that can be done to attack the present forms of division between working time and free time by means of making working time an opportunity for the expression and development of the individual and by means of extending and enriching free time.

A new Renaissance also means developing culture in all its dimensions. And making an effort to place all components of culture and knowledge on an equal footing, simultaneously promoting the sciences, arts and physical and sports activities. And combating everything that subjugates cultural life and creativity to profit and to censorship and self-censorship. And helping intellectuals by enlarging their numbers and the social sphere from which they originate and by promoting and attaching value to their functions.

We Want a Fundamental Improvement in Human Relations

At the same time a new Renaissance means a fundamental improvement in human relations. Every man and woman, as we have said, leads his personal life as he wishes. But we must be able to say no to the jungle law, to arrogance, contempt, hatred, violence exerted by the stronger against the weak. Moral values did not drop from the skies any more than freedoms or culture did. They are the result of long battles to develop human ties between human beings. Like freedoms and culture, these values are attacked, eroded and denied by capital. It is important to defend them by updating and perfecting them. The society we want is also -- and can only be -- a fraternal society. Men and women do not aspire to the impossible. But they no longer wish to see their capabilities frustrated, to be robbed of their time, to be tied to exhausting work and deprived of culture, real leisure, personal and family life, friendship and human warmth. They no longer wish to be manipulated and exploited. They want to be masters of their own lives. The French brand of socialism will be this form of humanism, or it will be nothing. [to be continued]

APPEAL REJECTED, NATIONALIZATION BILL SIGNED

LD111728 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] This time it is certain that the nationalizations that the Mauroy government has decided on will come into force. The appeal presented by the opposition has been rejected by the Constitutional Council and thus the prime minister signed the bill at about 1730 this evening.

HERNU CONFIRMS WEAPONS SALES TO NICARAGUA

NC120916 Paris AFP in English 0907 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 12 Feb (AFP) -- French Defence Minister Charles Hernu has confirmed that France recently sold 100 air-to-ground missile launchers and 7,000 ground-to-air missiles to Nicaragua in keeping with "contracts made by preceding governments." Mr Hernu, who was lunching with members of the diplomatic press, said yesterday that the French Socialist government would honour "all the contracts concluded by preceding governments but from now on there will be a progressive decrease in arms sales".

The defence minister, who preferred to speak of "technical military aid" rather than an "arms trade", said that "for friendly countries" this assistance should constitute "a factor of increased independence.

He said that French military assistance, as well as supplies of military equipment, would involve transfer of technology in certain cases and training of military personnel. He said 7,000 officers from other countries were currently undergoing training in French military academies and in some branches of industry.

Mr Hernu said that for the Socialist government, military assistance was an "act of aid and friendship to countries which by and by may draw closer to France". He said France was trying to ensure the "coherence" of its foreign and defence policies and would reject efforts by the two superpowers to impose restrictions. France, Mr Hernu said, must aid "friendly nations" to organise their defence against a potential aggressor to prevent their "alignment with one or other of the superpowers". "France poses no political condition and those nations we help choose this form of assistance freely. It is the case for Nicaragua and also for Egypt, Iraq and Greece," Mr Hernu said.

RELATIONS WITH U.S. 'SLIDING TOWARD CRISIS'

[Jacques Jacquet-Francillion editorial]

[Text] Relations between Paris and Washington are sliding slowly but inexorably toward a crisis. One observation should be made already: In 8 months the inconsistencies of our diplomacy and its double talk have succeeded in destroying the store of confidence which Mitterrand's France automatically enjoyed in Reagan's America. The storm has not yet openly broken, but it is rumbling in the secrecy of the chancellories. In private conversations people at the highest level in the U.S. administration no longer deny feelings of disappointment and bitterness. These reactions have not yet been openly reflected in official statements because President Reagan and Alexander Haig, his secretary of state, feel it is vital to preserve an appearance of unity in the "Atlantic family" while there is still a chance, a faint hope, of loosening by however little the stranglehold on the Polish people.

But behind the facade it is obvious that Washington is finding it increasingly difficult to understand us. Francois Mitterrand entered the Elysee stating loud and clear that the real danger comes from the East and proclaiming his fidelity to our traditional alliances. He spoke that same language to Ronald Reagan at their Yorktown meeting in October. He said it even more firmly on 13 December when the Polish military boot crushed Solidarity on the Kremlin's orders.

Nonetheless, it was Francois Mitterrand himself who, without wasting a minute, authorized the signing last Friday of a major contract with the Soviet Union for the supply of Siberian gas. The U.S. Government does not dispute our right -- what right would it have to do so? -- to try to guarantee our energy supplies. Its sole expectation was for us to postpone the conclusion of this deal for a while in view of the circumstances or at least for its scope to be limited, if only in a very symbolic way. We would not hear of it. The Kremlin was in a hurry and might have become angry.... Pierre Mauroy virtually admitted that when addressing the assembly.

Nonetheless, we are still assuring the Americans that they remain our best friends and partners. But we are supplying arms to Nicaragua in a region undermined by Soviet-Cuban subversion and regarded by Washington as a priority security zone. We have sworn that these arms are purely "defensive." The State Department spokesman replied today that we were lying and that, in the Pentagon's view, some of these weapons, missile-launchers, are "offensive" in nature. We are denying it, hand on heart, saying that this is not our opinion and that, in any case, "the French military equipment supplied to Nicaragua cannot be regarded as offensive toward the United States." This is certainly fine rhetoric, a perfect masterpiece of diplomatic hypocrisy...but do we hope to be taken seriously for long by doing that?

General de Gaulle distrusted the Americans like the plague. However, in time of danger he knew how to keep his word and choose his camp in the national interest. Do people still remember that during the Cuban missile crisis he was the first Western head of state to side with the United States immediately and unreservedly? "Change" has been the official watchword since 10 May. God...what a change for France!

COLOMBO SEES NO SPLIT IN WEST'S STAND ON POLAND

AU111600 Rome ANSA in English 1525 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 11 Feb (ANSA) -- The Polish crisis has in no way created "divisions" among the Western nations, even if there are some differences of opinion over the use of sanctions as a political tool in the present situation, according to Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo.

Colombo, who was interviewed for today's edition of the Milanese daily CORRIERE DELLA SERA, in Madrid, where he is attending the European Cooperation and Security Conference (SCSC), claimed that the West's "assessment of the events has been unanimous, just like the analysis of those events." According to Colombo, "all" the Western countries had "certainly" laid responsibility for the crisis at the door of the Polish Government, but also at that of "Soviet influence." "On the political assessment, there are no differences," the Italian diplomatic chief asserted. "On the denunciation of the facts, apart from the more or less accentuated tone that each of us has, I think the expressions have been the same."

Turning to the more practical question of sanctions, Colombo reminded the CORRIERE that Italy's position on the Italo-Soviet agreement for the gasline planned to link Siberia and Western Europe was to take out time for reflection. "We Italians have taken our position independently," he said. "What we have called a pause for meditation, a halt in the negotiations so as to make a complete assessment of our decisions in relations to the scope of the Polish events and the Soviet Union's attitude." [as received] He also pointed out that Italy's position has not changed in the meantime, even though France has already signed its leg of the accords with the Soviet Union.

In other points, Colombo said that no Western country is contemplating breaking off or suspending the Soviet-American talks on medium-range missiles in Geneva despite the Polish crisis. In this connection, he recalled the recent Geneva meeting between U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko. He added that the current wave of international tension might lessen if, in Poland, there was a return to "dialogue" between the government and the independent trade-union, Solidarnosc., "But the real Solidarnosc, not an invented one."

GLEMP, OTHER CHURCHMEN DEPART FOR WARSAW

LD11554 Vatican City in English to Central and West Europe 1445 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] Rome -- Polish primate Archbishop Jozef Glemp, Cardinal Macharski, archbishop of Krakow, and Monsignor Gulbinowicz, archbishop of Wroclaw, left Rome for Warsaw this morning on board a Polish National Airline flight. Before leaving, the primate of Poland held last-minute talks at Fiumicino Airport with Archbishop Luigi Poggi, apostolic nuncio with special responsibilities, and with Mr Kazimierz Szablewski, head of the Polish Government's working group for relations with the Holy See.

Before boarding his aircraft, Monsignor Glemp told journalists: I wish to thank the Italian people for the good will they have shown toward us. You have been very kind toward us Poles. For his part, Cardinal Macharski, replying to journalists' questions, said that dialogue is the only way which holds good for all nations, for all states and forms part of the church's tradition. He added that the church is constantly seeking new responses not only in Poland but throughout the world and that our hope is in Jesus and it is a human and a Christian hope. In turn, the archbishop of Wroclaw, Monsignor Gulbinowicz, thanked the Italians for the aid they have provided for Poland. Your aid is very important for us, he said, especially for children, for the sick and for the elderly.

The three Polish church leaders were accompanied on their flight back to Warsaw by Monsignor Domin, auxiliary bishop of Katowice and president of the welfare commission of the Polish Episcopate.

SWEDEN

RECENT CHEYSSON VISIT HARMONIOUS, PRODUCTIVE

PM111711 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 6 Feb 82 p 6

[Disa Haastad report: "We Have Much in Common"]

[Excerpts] Sweden will cooperate with France and draw up an action program on disarmament. French External Relations Ministry aides will soon come to Stockholm to begin the drafting of a demarche on El Salvador.

These are the most important long-term results of French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson's visit to Stockholm. However, Swedish Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten was able to begin the press conference at the Foreign Ministry with the most spectacular piece of news -- the fact that he and his French counterpart had succeeded in resolving the airline conflict [on fares by Air France and SAS]. "Although this was not the only reason Cheysson came here," Ullsten added.

Claude Cheysson, the first French external relations minister to visit here since 1966 and so far the most important figure from Mitterrand's Socialist government to visit us, hastened to say that he was here because Sweden and France have so much in common, have such a similar view of foreign policy. This is particularly true of attitudes toward Central America, the Third World and the United Nations.

Poland was, naturally, the first topic raised, and Cheysson's condemnation of the violation of human rights in Poland was clear and unambiguous. He had said to the Polish foreign minister the day before yesterday that France is now waiting for Jaruzelski to keep his promises and lift martial law and free those in prison before there will be any further credits for Poland. However, he did not like the word sanctions. Nor could the Polish party organ TRYBUNA LUDU entice Cheysson into saying anything negative about Reagan's TV spectacular for Poland. "Everything which makes a contribution to the expression of feelings and opinions about events in Poland is good in our view," Cheysson said, and drew on his pipe.

Cheysson was just as clear and unambiguous about El Salvador. What is happening there is a crime which must be condemned. What people in El Salvador are doing is engaging in a social revolt for human rights. And for the most part Ola Ullsten could only agree and say that he had similar views.

But there are differences. For example, France has an advanced nuclear arms expansion program. DAGENS NYHETER asked if this could be affected by growing popular protests in Europe or the current Geneva disarmament negotiations on medium-range nuclear arms in Europe. "There are many nuclear arms in East Europe, and we think that the best response to the threat is not to sit in a corner and wait until they land on our heads. We do not accept that any ally should speak for us -- we want to be completely independent," Cheysson said. He added that if nuclear arms were suddently to be banned France would see itself forced to increase its conventional forces four or five times over in order to preserve the necessary balance.

However, despite the differences between the two countries, Sweden and France will cooperate on an action program for disarmament. Sweden has been invited by France to participate in a petition which will later be put forward in the framework of the European Security Conference. As it is, Ullsten and Cheysson will meet again there in Madrid next week.

The cooperation on El Salvador will take place in the same way: France will send diplomats to Stockholm for consultations.

PAPANDREOU STATEMENT ON U.S. N-WEAPONS CLARIFIED

NC120940 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 11 Feb 82 p 2

[Text] The government spokesman yesterday furnished explanations on some "misunderstandings" arising from Prime Minister Papandreou's interview with Italian television the day before yesterday. The spokesman explained that Mr Papandreou's reply to the question on the EEC was not properly rendered. He did not say that it will be decided in the spring whether Greece will withdraw from the community. He said that by 15 March, Greece (as the prime minister also stressed in Bonn) will submit its proposals to the other members of the community regarding the special problems that concern Greece.

The spokesman also elaborated on passages in Papandreou's interview that referred to the question of nuclear weapons in Greece. There are no nuclear weapons at the U.S. bases in Greece, he said. Should there be any on Greek territory, they are not stored at the bases, but elsewhere. The spokesman also said that the question of the nuclear weapons the Americans have in Greece is not connected with the question of the base negotiations.

He hinted that Mr Papandreou's proposal for establishment of a nuclear-free zone in the Balkans still stands.

NATO Nuclear Weapons

NC120947 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 12 Feb 82 pp 1, 16

[Excerpts] The nuclear weapons in Greece constitute NATO war material and do not belong to the United States or to Greece. They are stored at Greek bases under double-lock and are guarded by Greeks and Americans under extremely strict security measures. The Americans have a key because the United States is the manufacturing country and has worldwide responsibility for nuclear weapons on the basis of bilateral agreements as well as on the basis of a more general NATO agreement.

Before the nuclear weapons can be used in the event of war, the U.S. President must first give his consent, after which the NATO committee must be convened, and when it gives its consent it also asks the country in which the nuclear weapons are stored to consent. The nuclear weapons cannot be used without the consent of the country in which they are stored. The decision to use them is called release of nuclear weapons.

PAPANDREOU, USSR ENVOY VIEW RELATIONS, CYPRUS

[Text] Prime Minister Papandreou yesterday summoned the Soviet ambassador in Athens, Mr Kaboshkin, to Maximos Mansion and discussed with him the entire spectrum of bilateral economic and political relations as well as recent Cyprus developments. The prime minister outlined the question of pending Greek-Soviet agreements (supply of electricity, construction of an alumina plant, supply of natural gas and so forth) and explained the views of the Greek Government on a number of foreign policy questions. They also discussed Cyprus developments and the Soviet Government's stand on this question. The meeting lasted 35 minutes.

In the afternoon the Council of Foreign and Defense Affairs met at Kastri. Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos briefed the council members on the developments at the Madrid CSCE session. A discussion on the forthcoming visit to West Germany by Deputy Defense Minister Petsos followed. In West Germany Mr Petsos will have talks on defense cooperation between the two countries in the military industry field.

PAPANDREOU DISCUSSES PASOK SOCIALISM WITH DEPUTIES

NC112030 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1900 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] PASOK's accession is a historic change for the country, the prime minister stressed to addressing members of the movement's parliamentary group this morning. One of our basic views, he stated, is that acceptance of the government by the people is far greater than the election percentages, even among those who did not vote for us. One reason for this is the great wear and tear on the right, which was the result of its policy; in other words, its lack of policy, lack of strategy, in all sectors. It is a fact, Papandreou added, that for its close followers PASOK meant, and continues to mean, the great change, a structural change in Greek society and the economy.

For the others who support, stand by and express hope in PASOK, there was general agreement that the country was faced with a dead end on all matters and that if the same men who administered the country for decades were once again returned to power this would have basically undermined Greece both as a state and as an economy. We are the last hope for democratic Greece in the sense that our success or failure will determine not only our fate as a party but also the fate of the country.

One of the major problems facing us is the corrosion of the state apparatus. No matter which sector of the state apparatus one may examine, one will see that trafficking, illicit trafficking, is the rule. There is a daily attack on the prosecution of the dissenters. We have replied: We cannot implement a new policy without staffing key positions with persons who will be not only good technocrats but also believe in the goals, the program and the vision of PASOK. In this way we are obliged and under contract to the people to proceed with the change of personalities in control of government policy.

At this point Papandreou observed that he is obliged to conduct a critique of day-to-day practices. First of all, he said, it is unworthy and of no help to PASOK to go after petty officials. This chase must not be applied to the lower echelons of administration. We have no reason to act like avengers. We must not establish the new Greece on the basis of going after those who do not agree with us or who in the past acted in a manner we do not consider democratic.

Papandreou then referred to the function of the party in relation to the implementation of government policy, and stated: We must not forget that in the same way that the movement is essential for the implementation of our long-term goals, it is also dangerous to replace the administrative structure, to take the place of and to undermine the government's policy, through interventions by both local and branch organizations at various levels of the government apparatus. It is the responsibility of all of us to deal with such interventions with determination.

In another portion of his address PASOK's chairman observed that a simple glance at the new conquests of this period is very impressive. I believe, he stressed, that never before have so many changes been brought about during just 3 months. In the sector of expanding democracy the recognition of the national resistance movement; abolition of the Observances of Hate; granting the vote to 18-year-olds; termination of the maintenance of dossiers on citizens -- something which had been established for all sectors, including the armed forces, the repatriation of refugees; administrative decentralization; and local self-government are only some of the steps along this course.

The socialism in which we believe is not the social democracy of the West, the beautification of the system or collective bureaucratic socialism. Many elements in our own effort can be recognized and can be accepted even by nonsocialists, who, however, share some prospects for modernization. This fact perhaps explains the ever-increasing acceptance we have among our people.

This is the third course, if you prefer; the course that relies basically on decentralization and peoples participation. This is collective socialism. If within one or two 4-year terms we manage to reform the state along these lines, then we will have covered the first major stage in the implementation of the socialist vision. This is what we must bear in mind when we are counting our steps of progress as a government.

Over and above all this, however, Papandreou continued, the law on administration is a basic legislative step. There will be a speedy answer on the question of multiple positions and multiple salaries. It is unbelieveable, he observed, what we have discovered as we search. There are officials holding eight positions, directors with salaries with 400,000 drachma per month and much more.

Our intent is to establish ceiling salary brackets for all state employees. We must also conduct a vast struggle against corruption that takes the form of commissions. There is an unbelievable sideline economy, there are a very large number of our fellow citizens, an ocean one might say, who rob the state through illegal commissions. Consequently, we are faced with a vast task of moral purging.

Speaking on the draft law on university education, Papandreou said this is a revolutionary change. There will also be legislative action in the economic sector, he added, such as the new law on incentives and the law on agricultural cooperatives.

Referring to foreign policy, Papandreou said Greece is an important presence in the European and Mediterranean areas. For the first time Greece has a national, comprehensive foreign policy, he said. We have had the courage, he stressed, to be the first to take this difficult road, and now others are following us.

Papandreou also referred to national defense and other sectors. Many other deputies then spoke on the operational character of the parliamentary group.

BRIEFS

AMBASSADORS TO ITALY, LIBYA -- The Council of Ministers has approved the appointment of Chr. Stremmenos, a Bologna University professor and permanent resident of Italy, as Greece's ambassador in Rome. Mr Stremmenos will succeed I. Pesmazoglou, a career diplomat, who is retiring. The council also approved the appointment of Emm. Kafetzopoulos, an expert on international affairs and a member of the PASOK Central Committee, as ambassador to Libya. Kafetzopoulos is succeeding Dhim. Petrounakos, also a career diplomat, who has been recalled. According to press reports, it is expected that more "PASOK personalities" will be appointed as ambassadors. [Athens ELEVTHEROS KOSMOS in Greek 6 Feb 82 p 1 NC]

TURKISH-USSR TEAM MEETS ON BORDER DEMARCATION

TA111659 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] The seventh round of talks on the redemarcation of the Turkish-Soviet border near the Arpacay dam, which is being constructed jointly by the two countries, began in Ankara today. Technical work on the cartography and [word indistinct] methods in connection with the agreement initialed in Moscow last July will be concluded during the talks. The text of the agreement on the redemarcation of the border will be prepared at the end of the joint Turkish-Soviet committee meeting.

The work on the redemarcation of the border between Turkey and the Soviet Union was conducted between 1969 and 1973, and the Turkish-Soviet sea frontier as well as the continental shelf were delineated. Following the demarcation of the border at the Arpacay dam, the entire delineation of the border between the two countries will be completed in accordance with (?modern methods).

The Turkish delegation at the joint Turkish-Soviet committee is headed by Asaf Ilhan and the Soviet delegation is headed by (?Pavel) Kuznetsov.

JEWISH, ARMENIAN LEADERS MEET WITH PRIME MINISTER

TA111720 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] The leaders of the Jewish and Armenian communities in Turkey paid a courtesy visit to Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu today. Ulusu first received Chief Rabbi David Asseo and later Armenian Patriarch Shnork Kaloustian. It was reported that Asseo and Kaloustian conveyed to the government good wishes for success from the members of their communities and told the prime minister that their communities will be glad to fulfill every duty that befalls them in the spirit of unity in the country.

Before visiting the prime minister, Asseo called on Interior Minister Selahattin Cetiner. Asseo said he conveyed to Cetiner his community's feelings of loyalty. In turn, Cetiner said: We are convinced that all our citizens will exert efforts through cooperation and unity of heart and belief to progress beyond the present goals. Cetiner noted that he is sure the Jewish citizens share the same enthusiasm and expressed his gratitude.

Kaloustian called on Religious Affairs Director Tayyar Altikulac. Kaloustian expressed pleasure at meeting Altikulac and pointed out that religious leaders occupy an important place in the formation of public opinion, the improvement of human ethics and the establishment of an atmosphere of tranquillity and security in the country, adding that these leaders aim to raise citizens as good persons in every aspect. Kaloustian said all Armenians are living in the secular Turkish Republic in prosperity, tranquillity and full religious freedom and without any repression. Kaloustian noted that as a religious figure he condemns the murders of Turkish representatives abroad and added: No religious figure can condone murder, bloodshed, vengeance or the termination with weapons of life given by God. Noting that the perpetrators of these murders cannot be human, Kaloustian said: A person who shoots defenseless people in the back cannot belong to any nation, race or religion. It is evident who is controlling them and who these persons serve. Kaloustian added that the Armenian community is ready to do everything possible to encourage the perpetrators of these murders abroad to behave like human beings.

In his turn, Altikulac said human beings must live together in tranquillity, harmony and solidarity and show respect for each other's beliefs. Pointing out that he does not view the murderers of Turkish diplomats abroad as human beings, Altikulac said: It is impossible for a human being -- regardless of his community -- to commit such treacherous deeds and shed the blood of innocent persons.

PIPELINE BLAST SUSPECTS LINKED WITH SYRIA KURDS

TA111348 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 4 Feb 82 p 19

[Text] Diyarbakir -- It has been reported that the five militants who twice in the past blew up the Iraqi-Turkish oil pipeline received the money and the directive to carry out the bombings from Kurdish National Unity Party leader Jalal Talabani in Syria. It is being alleged that the militants received the time bombs in Syria and were promised up to 5 million lira to carry out the sabotage. Security officials said the time bomb was of Soviet make and added that the KGB could have been involved in the incident. The incident was clarified as a result of investigations by a special team assigned by the VII Corps and Diyarbakir Martial Law Command.

Security officials said five persons have been captured so far in connection with the bombings of the Turkish-Iraqi pipeline near Kayri village, Idil District, in May 1979 and June 1980. They added that Selam Akca, one of the captured militants, was the brains of the group, while Ibrahim Genc, who was also captured, had placed the bomb. Under questioning, Genc said they had received both the money and the directive in Syria to carry out the sabotage. In the investigation the suspects said they had received the directive to blow up the pipeline from Kurdish leader Talabani. Genc, 23, from Yavman village, Idil District, Mardin, was taken to the site of incident to show how he placed the bomb.

RELEASE OF MILITANT IN IRAN 'POLITICAL SCANDAL'

[Oktay Ozeskici report]

[Text] Ankara -- Isa Armagan, the rightist Turkish militant captured by chance in Iran 2 weeks ago, has been released by the court. The decision of the Iranian authorities to release Armagan, for whom there is an international arrest warrant by Interpol, has been termed here as a political scandal.

Armagan was arrested in Turkey and charged with being involved in the Balgat murder incident in which 5 persons were killed and 12 others wounded. Nevertheless, Armagan managed to escape mysteriously from the maximum security Mamak military prison in Ankara and cross into Iran. Turkish security officials appealed to the Iranian authorities for the recapture of the rightist militant, who was condemned to death by a Turkish military court, and made representations to Interpol in Paris on the irresponsible stand of Iranian authorities.

Recalling that the murderer of Balgat had been released once before by the Iranians, security officials said: It is unbelieveable that a criminal has been captured twice and released in both cases. In the first instance it is possible that the Iranians were not aware of Armagan's crimes. However, his release for the second time after not only Iran but the whole world knew about him is incomprehensible.

PAHR CONFERS WITH SED POLITBURO MEMBER IN VIENNA

[Text] (APA) -- Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr yesterday received SED Politburo member Erich Mueckenberger for a talk. According to a report by the GDR news agency ADN, Pahr and Mueckenberger, who is also chairman of the SED faction in the GDR People's Chamber, noted at the talk that GDR-Austrian relations had developed "very well," and that such relations between states with different social systems were acquiring a markedly increasing importance particularly during times when the international situation is tense.

According to ADN, Pahr spoke out against a policy of sanctions and boycott and for the continuation of the international dialogue, and reaffirmed his hope for the successful continuation of the Madrid CSCE meeting.

ARMS EXPORTS SUBJECT TO STRICTER CONTROLS

PM101145 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 30 Jan 82 p 1

[Text] Eindhoven, 30 Jan -- The Netherlands Government wants to make the export of military products subject to stricter controls. A draft proposal to this effect will probably be ready in September, Defense Ministry Under Secretary Stemerdink said yesterday evening in Eindhoven during a debate on the theme "Weapons and Work" organized by the Labor Party's Young Socialists. According to Stemerdink, present export regulations are too imprecise: "At present firms are not allowed to export any military products to countries in conflict situations, but this description is somewhat vague. Moreover, such situations can arise overnight." It was Stemerdink's opinion that the export of defense products should be limited to the Western nations -- the United States, Canada and Western Europe. "In particular, exports to the Third World should be made impossible; they have disastrous consequences for the developing countries."

Stemerdink thinks his predecessor, Under Secretary van Eekelen, had stimulated the export of military products. The previous government had appointed an official to mediate contacts between various nations and Netherlands defense materiel firms. The new government has allowed this post to fall vacant.

No More Arms to Turkey This Year

[Text] The Hague, 2 Feb -- During the course of this year The Netherlands Government will give no further support to Turkey through the supply of military materiel or the granting of economic aid. This was made clear in written answers to the second chamber from Foreign Minister Max van der Stoel.

In 1979 and 1980 the Turkish Government received two loans, each of 40 million guilders, from the Netherlands Government and in 1981 a loan of 43 million guilders. In addition, a series of 25 F-104G Starfighters with their ground equipment, documentation and spare parts have been given to Turkey in the last few years. In the spring of 1981 Turkey also received some radar equipment. At present there are no talks in progress about any new aid projects.

The government is also striving to reach a clear position by the end of this quarter on economic sanctions against South Africa, van der Stoel said.

COMMUNIST PARTY HEAD MEETS SED'S MUECKENBERGER

AU121253 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 12 Feb 82 p 2

[Excerpt] Vienna -- On Thursday Erich Mueckenberger, SED Central Committee Politburo member, had a friendly meeting with Austrian Communist Party [KPOE] Chairman Franz Muhri, Politburo member Erwin Scharf, KPOE Central Committee secretary; and with Hans Steiner, head of the Central Committee Foreign Relations Department. At the talk, held in a cordial atmosphere, basic problems of international developments, problems of the communist world movement as well as problems of further developing the collaboration between the SED and the KPOE were discussed. There was complete agreement on all questions that were discussed. The sides described it as one of the main tasks of their parties together with all peace forces to wage the struggle against the danger of a nuclear war that is emanating from the current U.S. policy of confrontation and intensified armament. They called for specific international agreements on arms limitation and disarmament on the basis of the equal security of both sides, as proposed by the Soviet Union and other states of the socialist community.

Both sides support the peace program of the 26th CPSU congress and the proposals submitted by Leonid Brezhnev for a limitation of nuclear armament. Both parties positively assess the good political, economic and cultural relations between the GDR and the Republic of Austria and will continue to promote them.

In the afternoon Erich Mueckenberger returned to the CDR from Vienna-Schwechat Airport.

MORE POLES TO GET POLITICAL ASYLUM STATUS

AU121210 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 12 Feb 82 p 8

[Special DIE PRESSE Report by "MA-"]

[Summary] About 20,000 of the Poles who have fled to Austria now have a very good chance of being recognized as political refugees in the sense of the Geneva Convention. That would be about 70 percent of the Poles who have requested political asylum to date. An Interior Ministry spokesman confirmed on Thursday that this figure was quite realistic. According to him, numerous asylum requests that had been turned down before the proclamation of martial law in Poland will now be reconsidered, since the majority of the applicants are "Solidarity" members who after 13 December 1981 were in danger of being subjected to political persecution. More than 29,000 of the 34,000 Poles registered by the Interior Ministry have requested political asylum. In January, 646 out of 860 Poles were granted the status of convention refugees, while the remaining 214 were granted permission to remain in Austria.

Apparently the Interior Ministry plans to substantially increase the number of political refugees in Austria after the traditional immigration countries have thus far disappointed Austrian expectations. "'If these countries prefer political refugees, we will be glad to provide them with political refugees,' it was stated." Moreover, the new policy will give Poles whose request for political asylum has already been rejected another chance.

AUTHORITIES BEGIN SCREENING OF ARAB CITIZENS

[Text] Security authorities have begun the screening of citizens of Arab countries who are staying in Austria. In the Austrian capital more than 500 persons have already been screened since last weekend. Dozens of detectives have been assigned to the screening operation. They fan out to all districts and check the travel documents and residence permits of between 70 and 80 persons per day. Most checks are carried out at their places of residence. However, it has turned out that many of the persons to be screened no longer live at the registered addresses, or that other persons were staying there who had not registered with the police [as is required by law in Austria]. According to an official source, the current checks are part of a general screening of all Arabs living in Vienna, estimated to number about 3,600.

NETHERLANDS

'VOLUNTARY' SOUTH AFRICA SANCTIONS ASKED

PM111627 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 8 Feb 82 p 1

[Text] The Hague, 8 Feb -- The Netherlands industry and commerce must boycott South Africa as much as possible on a voluntary basis. Foreign Minister van der Stoel will call on them to do so in his speech to the Second Chamber of Wednesday [10 February]. The interim report from an interministry working group presented to the foreign minister last week made it clear that compulsory sanctions against South Africa are legally and economically impossible. The Benelux Treaty makes unilateral export restrictions by one of the three partners more or less impossible. The new Belgian Government is even less inclined toward joint action against South Africa than was the previous Belgian coalition.

In its interim report the working group presents a resume of the reprisals The Netherlands could expect if it implemented sanctions against South Africa. One would be that South Africa would probably close its ports and airports to all Netherlands ships and aircraft. All exports of important goods such as coal, various ores, gold and diamonds to The Netherlands could be stopped, something which would be a palpable blow to industry and commerce and also to the employment situation in the country. The working group's interim report was discussed at last Friday's [15 February] cabinet meeting. The ministers agreed that the furthest the government could go would be to call for a voluntary boycott.

MINISTER PLANS CONTINUED AID TO SURINAME

[Text] The Hague, 8 Feb -- Cooperation and Development Minister van Dijk has no plans at present to stop development aid to Suriname. He made this statement to AVRO Radio this morning from Indonesia, where he is paying a 10-day visit. According to Van Dijk "In itself the fact that the army is now wielding power in Suriname is no reason for us to withdraw our aid. More important considerations for the continuation of aid are respect for human rights and the restoration of democracy as soon as possible."

Second Chamber member Ter Beek (Labor Party) made a plea on VARA Radio Saturday [6 February] for the reconsideration of all development aid to Suriname in the light of the changes in the country. Ter Beek, a foreign affairs specialist, announced that his party's parliamentary group will press the Netherlands Government to end its support for the military apparatus in Suriname. Ter Beek took the view that it is impossible for the Netherlands to continue its aid now that Suriname is once again totally under military control after the dismissal of President Chin a Sen.

VISAS NOW REQUIRED FOR EL SALVADOR TRAVEL

PM101155 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 30 Jan 82 p 2

[Excerpt] The Hague, 30 Jan -- El Salvador has reintroduced regulations which make it necessary for Netherlands citizens to have visas to visit the country because Foreign Minister van der Stoel described the Revolutionary Democratic Front/Farabundo Marti Liberation Front (FDR/FMLN) as a "representative political force." In fact, van der Stoel signed a French-Mexican declaration at the United Nations General Assembly describing the FDR/FMLN in these terms. This declaration was described by the Salvadoran junta and by a number of Latin American countries closely connected with the United States as "interference in the internal affairs" of El Salvador and was rejected. The FDR/FMLN is waging a guerrilla war against the junta. El Salvador has introduced similar visa regulations for citizens from France, Sweden, Norway, Ireland, Mexico, Panama, Nicaragua and the Eastern bloc.

DISARMAMENT STEPS DISCUSSED WITH GDR IN GENEVA

LD130324 Hamburg DPA in German 1832 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] Geneva 12 Feb (DPA) -- A German-German talk by experts on the possibility of disarmament steps in the United Nations took place in Geneva on Friday for the second time this week. The talks was headed by Ambassador Henning Wegener, chief delegate of the FRG to the International Disarmament Commission in Geneva, and Ambassador Gerhard Herder, head of the GDR mission at the United Nations in Geneva. Details of the exchange of views which is to be continued in the near future were not revealed this time. The background to the meetings is an exchange of letters between the foreign ministers of the two German states started by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

It seems that Genscher would like to see the Federal Republic and the GDR jointly put on paper the principles on which disarmament and arms control measures are based. The German-German meetings are taking place on the sideline of the sessions by the International Disarmament Commission. The two German states are among the 40 member-countries, including the nuclear powers.

APEL: 'WE STAND FIRMLY BY WESTERN ALLIANCE'

LD131210 Hamburg DPA in German 1045 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Munich, 13 Feb (DPA) -- According to Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel, the Federal Republic stands "firmly and unshakably by the Western alliance" and will continue to render the defense contribution expected of it. "We are no wanderers between two worlds", Apel stressed in his address today at the 19th International Military Studies Colloquium in Munich. "The USSR stands no chance of driving a wedge between us and the United States". He did not share the view that the alliance is incurably disrupted even though plurality and national sovereignty might result in open debate and controversy within the alliance.

The allegation that the alliance is drifting apart, Apel said, is "totally and entirely wrong". Eighty percent of all Federal citizens support NATO and close relations with the United States. The Federal Republic is far too deeply anchored within the Western alliance for any reorientation of German foreign and security policy to occur. "We neither drift away from the Western camp in the direction of neutrality nor are we indulging in petty thinking about our trade with the East."

Nonetheless, Apel said, it would be unwise for the West to renounce detente. At the same time, the Federal Defense Minister said that in discussing security policy "the peace-preserving function of nuclear weapons" should be made clear. These are political weapons which had safeguarded peace in Europe. At the moment he sees no reason for the USSR to run an incalculable risk in confrontation with the West. Apel went on the emphasize that the Bundeswehr has again achieved NATO's 3 percent target in real terms in 1981. There would be less reason for concern about the balance of strength "if all NATO partners had lived up to their commitments in the past as we have done."

Speaking in the debate following his speech, Apel mentioned the United States by name, stating that unlike the Federal Republic, it had reduced its defense expenditures during the seventies year after year. The defense minister strongly rejected the warning addressed to the Federal Republic by the two U.S. senators, William S. Cohen and John G. Towers during the discussion, that the gas pipeline deal with the USSR would make it dependent on Moscow, or even liable to blackmail. The USSR would not succeed in using the deal for putting pressure on the Federal Republic, Apel replied. On completion of the pipeline 30 percent of the Federal Republic's natural gas would come from the East, but this amounted to less than 5 percent of its entire energy consumption. The Federal Republic considers the project important not only for economic reasons, but also as an "attempt at partnership."

L'HUMANITE TEXT OF MARCHAIS PCF CONGRESS REPORT

PM101237 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 4 Feb 82 pp 3, 9

[Apparent text of report by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais to the 24th PCF Congress 3 February; second installment -- further installments will appear in subsequent DAILY REPORTS]

[Text] II -- How and With Whom To Advance?

/How/ and /with whom/ to attain this new society?

We have said for many years, and we reasserted forcefully at our 23d congress: In the conditions of our country and our age the march toward socialism is and will be the work of a majority rally of the people -- what Waldeck Rochet called the "majority movement of the working nation." This movement must be implemented along democratic paths, with clear objectives and stakes and finding expression through universal suffrage. The democratic path we propose is the path of respect, at every moment, and of majority will.

The Democratic Path, the Path of Union and Struggle.

This democratic path must not harbor any illusions, either for us or for the popular movement. The aim is to change society, to abolish domination in all spheres of exploitative capital. So it is a question of a fierce class struggle, a confrontation in which the opponents of change press, and will press, with all their might to deceive, obscure, mislead, threaten and divide.

So our strategy has nothing to do with the soporific concept of a gradual evolution, without any jolts, in which it is enough to wait for the voters to go to the polls every 5 or 7 years. We do not imagine that the French bourgeoisie has broken with its long authoritarian tradition. Of course not! To assert that the advance toward socialism must proceed democratically and peacefully is quite simply to believe that in France this transformation may be effected at any moment within the kind of correlation of forces which prevents the bourgeoisie from resorting to violence and force.

The democratic path we propose is the path of unity, unity in the face of every problem posed, among all people concerned, to define objectives and adopt solutions; unity to obtain satisfaction, gains and new rights and to create through each of these modifications the conditions for broader support, loftier objectives.

At the same time, and inseparable from this, the democratic path is the path of /struggle/. Struggle to make reality and consciousness move forward as one, as the draft resolution notes; the struggle to modify, gain after gain, the correlation of social and political forces, to thus bring together the conditions for electoral victories on the basis of loftier objectives and to guarantee these victories afterwards. Obviously the progress of these struggles cannot be programmed in advance. They include and will include no doubt moments of acceleration and others of stagnation, phases of progress which may be rapid and decisive and others of equilibrium and even retreat. Their "only timetable" is "the one which is determined by the needs of the masses, their level of consciousness and the development of the correlation of forces."

In short, everything shows us that only unity of action "at the bottom" can enable the whole of the social movement to progress up "to the top," as far as the administration of the country's affairs. This is one of the main lessons we were already drawing at the 23rd congress from the experience of the joint program: The people's movement cannot delegate to any leadership body its necessary function as an active participant in social transformations.

It could not do so yesterday with regard to the leadership bodies of the political formations of the left. It cannot do so today with regard to the government, even if this includes Communist ministers.

It will not be able to do so tomorrow, whatever the disposition of political forces.

To confine the popular movement to a role of passive support for the government, which would be entrusted with changing society in its place, would be to turn things upside down and condemn oneself to failure. Transformations will only be imposed thanks to the broad, conscious and determined intervention of our people. Outside this intervention, outside the continual expression of the people's will in all spheres, nothing in France can or will be able to budge.

An Immense Reservoir of Forces To Advance on the Path Toward Socialism

Is it possible to bring about this majority movement? Is it really possible to unite our people, when the crisis "is building up disparities" and is increasing the "fallacious yet palpable and daily conflicts" between working people of different conditions?

In other words, /with whom/ are we to progress today toward the necessary transformations?

I recalled that more than 8 out of 10 people of working age are wage-earners at present. So 18 million men and women and young people are faced with the realities of the market place; side by side with men and women workers, they are experiencing exploitation, to very different degrees of course, and are bearing the burden of the crisis.

It is the same with technicians, of which the majority today form an integral part of the working class.

It is the same with white collar workers, whose conditions, norms and work discipline increasingly are resembling those of workers.

It is the same with engineers and cadres, research workers and scientific workers, whose numbers have grown considerably and who want to obtain the means of innovation and responsibilities.

It is the same with teachers, who aspire to exercise their profession in a school fitted to play its social role to the full. More generally, the majority of intellectuals, the vast majority of agricultural workers, and indeed numerous tradespeople, artisans, and small businessmen are affected by grave problems.

All in all, it is the vast majority of our people today whose social situation, living and working conditions and the most basic needs and interests invoke a change in society. Not only have the transformations which have taken place at the heart of our society and the crisis is experiencing not reduced the number of those who can rally and act to change the order of things, but they have even considerably enlarged the scope of the forces capable of freeing themselves from capitalism. In other words not only can we not content ourselves -- still less satisfy ourselves -- with the present limits of the backing we have enlisted, but we must also become more aware of the vast reservoir of forces which can be won over to the battle to advance on the path toward socialism. All our assessments, our objectives and our style of work must start from there.

I stress: Start. This consideration does not mean that it is possible have a uniform and undifferentiated movement, that there are no contradictions or conflicts between the social categories that we want to rally together. All of them are far from having an identical interest in the transformation of society and all are far from having a clear awareness of this interest.

First: The Working Class

Within this entity it is the working class which can and must be won over the first to the battle for change. The working class, which on its own in its full extent forms almost half the active population, represents in effect the vital force of the modern economy. As the most directly and most harshly exploited class, excluded from responsibilities and power, it has acquired a long experience of struggle and organization. As the chief victim of the crisis, it is in the front rank in the battles against the domination of capital and for the democratic transformation of the country. As the draft resolution stresses, "its demands and aspirations are the heart of all the main problems of French society. To satisfy them does not merely accord with their interests alone, but with those of all other categories of working people and those of the nation itself."

To promote recognition of the role and place of the working class in national life is the prime goal we set ourselves.

This task is difficult. We do not have a naive concept of the working class. We know its composition has evolved considerably. In recent decades the big bosses have resorted to new forms of exploitation. Alongside skilled workers, they have developed the category of specialized workers. They have made increasing use of female labor. They have had greater recourse to casual and immigrant labor. They have striven to take advantage of the crisis in an attempt to pit its victims against one another. At the same time, the structure of the production apparatus has changed. At the meeting-point of scientific progress and the realities of the enterprise, technological innovations have developed, accentuating the social nature of production and raising perceptibly the quality of the work force. Thus the working class has been transformed. The technicians, whose numbers are constantly increasing, white-collar workers and certain engineers are an integral part of it today, from the economic viewpoint. The big bosses have striven to exploit these changes and the diversity of situations which they engender to their own advantage so as to call into question the unity of the working class and pit its various strata against each other.

These developments confront us with new and complex problems. How different are the concerns, tastes and behavior of a young woman worker who has specialized in textile or footwear manufacture and those of a metallurgical worker; between an immigrant worker in Flins and a highly skilled worker at the Rateau firm; between a mother working at home for the Bella firm and an aeronautical technician. Each and every one of them are part of the working class. Each and every one are exploited by capital. Each and every one have essential interests in common. But we still have to make great efforts of thought and imagination in order to help everyone everywhere take their full place in the class struggle, seizing upon everything which unites them.

White Collar Workers

It is the same with white collar workers, both men and women. Their numbers have increased. I have observed that their living and working conditions increasingly resemble those of the workers. Their demands are becoming increasingly similar. All the same, even when they are waging major struggles, civil servants and employees of banks, insurance companies, stores and local authorities do not view capitalist exploitation in the same way as do the workers. They retain illusions about their social status.

We promote the development and success of all the struggles of white collar workers, in the certainty that it is the only way that they will develop an awareness of the community of interests uniting them with the working class, and that new forms of solidarity and rapprochement will come into being and increase.

The Intellectuals

The popular movement can also include, we are convinced, most engineers and cadres. Most of them are in fact in a contradictory position. While receptive to the technocratic arguments that the big bosses use to justify monopolist redeployment, they are at the same time offended by the waste of human potential. But when they come up against the impact of the workers' struggles, they are afraid lest the acquisition of new rights by the workers will lead to a negation of their powers and to jeopardizing their situation. It is difficult to overcome these prejudices. There again it is through struggle that we will help them by making them understand in practice, on the spot, that their function and their knowledge will be raised in value rather than put in jeopardy by the effort to give the working class its proper place in the enterprises, just as in society as a whole.

More generally, we are not unaware that the social origin, training and way of life of intellectual working people of all categories lead them to underestimate the class dimension of the problems which affect them and often to conceive that rallying with the working class is a bad bargain whereby they would lose their identity, their professional individualism and their social responsibility. By acting with them to smash the intolerable segregation, whose victims are the working people, and to ensure the renaissance of French culture, we are striving and will strive to dispel these misunderstandings. For we must win over the intellectuals to the fight for socialism.

The Farmers and Nonwage-Earners

The struggle of the farmers also present opportunities for winning new forces over to this fight. We know prejudices with regard to the working class continue to exist among many of them. But the majority have been hit hard by the effects of the policy of liquidating family farms. Their opposition to this policy, their devotion to national independence and the progress in cooperation have created new bases for joint action between them and the working class. In order to consolidate and extend these bases, we are defending with them the interests of national agriculture and we are striving to make clear to them our desire to develop national agriculture, basing it on the family farm, in the context of the French brand of socialism.

Finally, we do not seek to mask the obvious obstacles that hamper the participation of artisans and tradespeople and of small and medium businessmen in this fight. In fact, I want to reemphasize that in these small and medium-sized enterprises our first concern is to defend the interests of the working people. But we do not neglect any opportunity to help these strata take their proper place -- on the unambiguous bases I have just defined -- within the movement for change.

Women and Young People

This movement is not conceived simply in terms of social strata. The popular movement is enriched by new aspirations and new fights.

Thus, the entry of women into the struggle is one of the important occurences of our age. Their demands and their aspirations for equality are putting in the balance the domination of capital over national life. Of course, the womens movement has its contradictions. Women do not constitute a homogenous social category. The great diversity of their social situations, of their ways of life and thought and the efforts of the big bourgeoisie to divert their aspirations create complex problems. Our action aims to proceed from their actual demands, enrich the democratic struggle with their original aspirations and in return give these aspirations the class dimension of the popular struggles.

Young people constitute a great force for social emancipation. Two years ago, at the time of a meeting of the Central Committee devoted to the problems of young people, we used the expression "the Crisis Generation." That reflects reality very well. Everyone is affected by the crisis. They know many of them are doomed to unemployment and job insecurity, to an unsuitable education and inadequate or nonexistent training, to a cruel lack of means for amusement, travel or sports. Young people are rebelling and fighting along with the communists. But there are also young people for whom reality is too harsh and who go under. There are young girls and boys who retire into themselves, who drop out of school or work, who despair, who wallow in drugs or delinquency.

With those, we take an uncompromisingly responsible line. We combat everything that debases the human being. But let's get to down to the essential points: So as to change the concepts these young people have of their life, let us begin by helping them change their life. Let us stop making school for working class children, right from their earliest years, that merciless instrument of selection, that manufacturer of failure and exclusion, that dasher of hopes. Let us give everyone, boys and girls, a fitting training for our time and a good and interesting job. Let us offer them the means to reveal themselves to others, to cultivate themselves, to discover their country and the world.

That is what we want. That is why we call on them to participate with us in the democratic and revolutionary combat.

This combat is effective. A single example. For more than 2 years now, our party has been engaged in battle against the practices of the slave traders of the temporary agencies, in order to guarantee a stable job for all young men and women who want one. It is a battle that we were the first, and for a long time the only ones, to wage, a battle which perhaps some young people hesitated to fight along with us because they did not think it was possible to make the bosses give way on this point. Well, this battle has just had success with the government decisions regarding regulations for and restrictions on temporary work. Even though the battle must be pursued in order fully to ensure job security, even though the action against unemployment must be developed, the proof is there once again that the struggle is useful.

Young people need to join in the struggle at the heart of the popular movement in order to resolve the difficulties they encounter. And the popular movement needs their contribution, their militancy and their innovative capacity in order to win.

Rallying the Vast Majority of Our People

The diversity of our people also means the plurality of the currents of thoughts, opinions, beliefs and philosophical convictions that express the history and present reality of the French nation. This plurality, far from being an obstacle to the popular movement and to the struggle to transform society, is in our view a precious asset.

This concerns believers. There have been rapprochements and discussions have been initiated. Certainly obstacles have been put in the way of this progress by the hierarchies of the churches. The stance of Pope John Paul II on the major questions of social life and on political problems go against the liberation aspirations of our time. But we intend more than ever to develop our efforts for dialogue, mutual comprehension and joint action.

This call for joint action is also addressed by us to those who want to enrich France with the diversity of its regional identities; to those who want to live, work and take decisions in their "home region"; to those want a different quality of life; and in general to all who fight for social and human solidarity.

Everything shows then that the distinctive features of the new society we want -- justice, liberty, fraternity and peace -- are unifying goals. They constitute responses to the most profound aspirations, be they conscious or implicit, of the vast majority of our people. They enable us to envisage the contours of a popular movement extending far beyond the political majorities that have existed up to now. That is the kind of movement we want to build.

Promoting Staunch and Effective Union of the Left

This path of struggle and union is also the path of union of the left and of the agreements between our party and the PS. As we stressed at our 23d congress, we are in favor of agreements respecting the autonomous activity of each of our two parties, of accords that correspond to the actual level of the popular movement, that confirm the elements that unite us without masking the elements that separate us, that favor union and action while leaving room for intervention by the working people, without stifling this intervention and without corseting it according to preprogrammed stages.

This is the meaning of the agreements we concluded with the PS after the presidential and legislative elections and since then. These agreements have enabled us to establish, and then confirm, a new cooperation between our two parties -- in the government, on the basis of the solidarity that links its members and at the heart of the majority. It is our concern to promote a staunch union of the left, respecting the identity and the role of each partner and enabling them to take their full place. And it is our concern to promote an /effective/ union of the left, a union that contributes in all clarity to preserving the cohesion necessary between the two parties to meet the country's expectations.

The Direction of Our Action Since 10 May

It is naturally this strategy, whose main features I have just outlined, that has guided all our action since the victory of the left.

We made a full contribution to that victory. First, by placing the question of a change of power and policy at the heart of our own campaign for the presidential election. Then, let us state without false modesty, by demonstrating a spirit of responsibility toward the people and the nation by our decision, immediately after the first round, to send all our forces, without reluctance or ambiguity, into battle to ensure Francois Mitterrand's victory and then to elect a leftwing majority to the National Assembly.

The part we played in the victory yesterday we are playing today within the government and the majority.

We do this with the aim of responding to the country's expectations as expressed in the 10 May vote. That is to say, within the framework of the Franch people's choice, with all its possibilities and without losing sight of its limits, both as regards the objectives they set and as regards the influence they attributed to us.

The Attitude of the Bosses

There is no lack of obstacles along this path. Big capital is not reconciled to its defeat.

Thus the right loses no opportunity to voice its desire for revenge and its willingness to fight. Chirac has already declared himself to be the savior France is waiting for. Giscard and Barre are taking up their stances by announcing catastrophes. This old reactionary rightwing, which the country rejected on 10 May, is eager for revenge and is using every means at its disposal to step up its maneuverings, including as we saw recently, the Constitutional Council, which has been turned into a bulwark of the interests of the financier class.

But it is above all the bosses who consistently do everything in their power to bring about failure for the new policy the country wants.

From the first, the bosses have stepped up economic, financial, political and ideological pressure; they have savagely opposed the working people's rights, old and new; for a long time they remained ostentatiously deaf to all government proposals tending to improve the job situation; they even came out openly against the economy by deciding on what has been called a veritable "investments strike." And they are continuing along this path. Today, like yesterday, their aim is clear: To seek to retard as much as possible the policy of social and democratic reforms and to try to paralyze that policy in order to defend their own interests. And, moreover, to lead that policy into difficulties from which they hope to be able to profit at the right moment in order to keep the communists out of the government.

In these conditions there can be no question of slowing down the current process or yielding to the bosses' demands and maneuvers. On the contrary, what is essential is to advance with determination and firmness along the path of satisfying the needs of France and the French.

We Act To Contribute to the Resolution of the Country's Major Problems

Taken together, the first measures adopted and those in progress are steps in the right direction. We are all the more pleased because we recognize in the government's actions ideas and aspirations for which we have waged a major struggle, with the working people, in recent years.

But we must not conceal the fact that major, serious problems remain. They are: /Unemployment/, which now affects more than 2 million men and women in our country; /inflation/, which continues to arode the purchasing power of working class families; /lack of democracy/ within enterprises and outside them, which requires new rights for working men and women. These are the current problems. They are urgent. They affect many millions of people. They must be resolved without dalay. It is only in this way, by facing up to these fundamental problems of our society, that we will be able to create the conditions for a mobilization of the people which will sweep aside the obstacles erected by the opponents of change. And in the last analysis that is how French women and men will judge us.

We devote our efforts to this.

We do this in government. And I believe I am expressing the feelings of the congress and of the party as a whole when I say how much we appreciate the action of Communist ministers in the government. We are making these efforts in parliament too. And I would like equally to congratulate our parliamentary comrades on their effective, constructive work. Finally, we are making these same efforts all over the country, in a practical, concrete way, utilizing all the new opportunities presented to the people's movement for rallying and taking action, thereby helping to obtain every possible improvement.

That is the task of all our party's organizations, all its members and all its elected representatives. As I said at the Central Committee meeting on 4 December 1981: "Not so much denouncing as explaining; not so much criticizing as proposing; and not only explaining and proposing, but building, obtaining, implementing, making concrete -- that is, in all spheres, the rule of action for communists today.

We Want To Go Far: To Democratic, Self-Managing Socialism.

By acting in this way we are adopting the viewpoint of our party's progress, of the upsurge of its influence. It is through its constructive activity as a party of struggle and of government that our party will give concrete proof of its irreplaceable role. It is thus in life itself that working women and men will give it new means of reinforcing its fight.

Neither an auxiliary force nor a useless busybody, our party intends to play its full role as a major people's revolutionary, national force. Unity does not preclude fair, healthy rivalry between the participating forces. We are issuing an ambitious challenge to our partners in the majority, a challenge in the service of the working people and the country.

That is the path open to us today. As you see, we want to go far. Marching to the rhythm our people decide and will decide, we want to advance toward the prospects which have opened up: to democratic, self-managing socialism.

III -- The French Path to Socialism and the International Situation

Our fight is a national one. But it cannot be separated from its international environment.

On one hand this is because France plays a part in a whole set of international relations which it cannot discard. An independent France does not mean an isolated France.

On the other hand it is because the class struggle is not locked behind individual borders, but has international dimensions.

1. France in the World

When assessing the potential of nations it is now even less possible than before merely to measure the area of their territory, the number of their inhabitants or their GNP. Of course those material factors have a great influence. We are far from comparing our material strength to that of much bigger and richer states. But we certainly have no desire to admit that the biggest states have a special right in the world to settle matters over the heads of other states.

And we certainly do not give in to the despicable temptation to try to assert the material advantages bequeathed to us by history so as to take an arrogant attitude toward nations more sparsely populated or less advanced on the paths of progress:

Of course France is an economic force that counts. And the new growth we want can only improve its position.

Of course France is a military power, with a considerable nuclear force. And there is no question of it unilaterally abandoning its independent national defense system, based on the maintenance of its deterrent force and on a democratic national conscription army.

Of course France occupies a particular place on the diplomatic chessboard. For example by its presence in the UN Security Council and in West Berlin and more generally by its experience, its relations and its influence.

But there is more: Because of what it represents in markind's history, because of its material, scientific, technical and cultural advantages, because of the abilities and fighting spirit shown by its people over many centuries, France can play an international role much greater than its size, its population and its economic and military power. It can do that, provided it pursues a policy based on peace, independence, security, democracy and justice for all nations.

Our View of France's Foreign Policy

That is our view of France's foreign policy.

France is in the western part of Europe. It has close links with its neighbors at various levels, within the EEC framework. It is a member of the Atlantic alliance. It is these facts we take into account in our consideration of the present and future. The draft resolution explicitly confirms this long-standing position: We do not propose to break our alliances.

As an EEC member, our country, while maintaining its freedom of action and its legitimate national interests, at all times can and should play an active role in promoting a democratic, truly independent workers Europe open to the world; a Europe which, of course, still has to be built.

As a member of the Atlantic alliance -- which must not be confused with the NATO integrated military organization, of which we are not a member and which there is no question of our rejoining in any form -- France must honor the commitments that membership entails.

It is a fact that blocs exist today. This fact must be taken into account. But in our view that policy of blocs does not correspond either to the interests of the peoples of the world or to our country's interests. That is why we are working for their simultaneous disbanding. That is why our fundamental principle is to reject the subordination of France to anybody in any form, now or in the future. To claim the reverse is quite simply to slander us.

In any case we uphold unswervingly, and will uphold, France's independence and sovereignty. In the present international context, while shouldering the responsibilities stemming from its alliances, France can preserve its full capacity for action in all circumstances. It can reject any alignment. It can make its own voice heard and take all the positive initiatives which only it can take.

By joining mankind's great battle our nation will help open up new prospects of peace and disarmament. It will, for its part, fulfill the hopes of hundred of millions of men and women in Europe and on the other continents. It will also be able to make an original and new contribution to the solution of the vital problems of hunger, servitude, unemployment, underemployment and illiteracy. Almost 2 years ago, "in the name of realism," in other words, taking account of France's real and potential influence, I asked this question: "Who better than France can now play a role in the move toward a new international economic and political order?" In fact people are now beginning to gauge the impact our nation can have in this sphere.

By acting in that way France will be able to take a more open approach to the world, to rebalance its foreign trade, and establish better cooperation with the Third World and the socialist countries. By establishing a new kind of ties with the other nations it will help to attract solidarity that will be beneficial for its economic, political and social development. For by supporting other peoples' fights for peace, justice, freedom and independence, France is bound to find new means of ensuring its democratic development.

To conclude this point, I repeat that the building of the French brand of socialism we want is bound to encourage such a policy and give it full scope.

2 -- The World We Want

By helping make France play a role worthy of it, we reach the heart of the battle which gives full meaning to the militant commitment of all communists: The battle for human liberation.

We are all the more determined to give that battle the necessary energy and scope because imperialism has launched a vast international campaign of manipulation and lies over recent years. I am talking about its campaign on the subject of "human rights."

You will say rightly that the representatives of this capitalist system are not lacking in cynicism in advocating human rights, since that system has massacred, tortured, imprisoned, humiliated, forcibly enlisted, deported, persecuted, exiled, profaned, exploited and expropriated throughout the world, and is continuing to do so wherever it can; that the capitalist system is responsible for two world wars, colonial wars, numerous civil wars and repressions, and is still whipping up the arms race, that the capitalist system murdered the Rosenbergs and the Charonne demonstrators and more than 100,000 communists in Indonesia; that the capitalist system is covered with the blood of the Indians in some places, with the Jews in others, with blacks elsewhere and is still waging war on the people of Northern Ireland, still herding the Palestinians into camps, crushing hundreds of millions of Latin Americans, torturing Turks and sustaining apartheid.

Nonetheless, however cynical it is, that campaign exists.

The Real Motives of the "Human Rights" Campaign

It started in the United States around 1973-74. At that time the representatives of the biggest multinationals and some of the top politicians in the United States, Japan and Western Europe founded the "Trilateral Commission," one of whose leading lights was Mr Brzezinski, President Carter's adviser. It was that commission that launched the vast human rights campaign. At the same time in Washington, the House Foreign Affairs Committee produced a report with this significant title: "Human Rights in the World Community, A Call for U.S. Leadership." Since then a methodical, sustained and coordinated campaign has been unleashed on the world.

The motives for that campaign are obvious. On the domestic front U.S. capitalism wanted to regain the ground lost after the defeat in Vietnam. It sought the consensus of its own people although, despite their power and resources, the people are suffering from unemployment, inflation, racism, urban violence, drugs and the weakening of presidential authority.

Abroad U.S. and international capitalism want to deprive the peoples of the prospect of a democratic solution to the crisis, to stem the wave that is carrying them, despite a thousand difficulties, toward liberation and socialism. In addition to that, there is the anxiety it feels at the long-term development prospects of the socialist countries, which have to solve major problems but which, unlike the capitalist countries, are not experiencing a crisis that is producing 10 million unemployed in the United States, a equal number in the EEC, 3 million in Britain, more than 2 million in Italy and France, 1.7 million in the FRG, 1.2 million in Japan -- a total of 25 million in the OECD countries. Finally the recent rise of the peace movement, particularly among the German people, is bound to confirm the bourgeoisie's pessimism.

Indeed as far as capital's profits and power are concerned, a world marching toward freedom, peace and socialism, however hard this march may be, is obviously a "dangerous world."

Thus for its instigators the aim of the human rights campaign is not humanitarian or moral but political. Because it is increasingly difficult to justify capitalism, it aims to make people tolerate it and give it the benefit of the doubt by slandering socialism. Because socialism offers mankind an alternative, it aims to discredit it by distorting it. In other words, because capitalism cannot destroy socialism by war, it is trying to destroy the hope of socialism by propaganda. Moreover that does not prevent it from making every effort to destabilize a particular socialist country that is in difficulties.

Vast Resources for This Campaign

That is why President Reagan had scarcely any hesitation in donning the armor of the "Superman" defending human rights.

Vast resources have been poured into this campaign. Peoples who are liberating themselves are attacked unashamedly in the name of human rights. They are portrayed as fanatics or savages.

A repellent picture of socialism is painted at great expense in the name of human rights. It is a constant series of successive episodes. All positive situations are played down, criticized and distorted. History is being rewritten without any intellectual or moral scruples.

The slightest incident, the slightest negative fact, is inflated into an affair of state or an interstate affair. An artificial situation is being produced, "plots" are hatched and operations conducted. All methods are used to influence the feelings and awareness of millions and millions of honest people, leading to this conclusion, which is hammered out incessantly: Socialism is Hell.

The major electronic media, radio and television, are the mainstay of this manipulation. In this respect the "normalized" French Radio and Television excel in overzealousness: Of course this manipulation is based on monstrous hypocrisy. It uses a very narrow concept of human rights. It sullies that noble cause by turning it into a propaganda tool. It deeply distorts the truth, even when it is based on the real difficulties, mistakes and faults of the socialist countries. We look at all aspects of the truth. We want full freedom for all the workers, all peoples in all countries.

The New World We Want: The World of Human Rights

Nonetheless a great deal is at stake in this campaign, and for the future of peace, democracy and socialism in France all workers, all sincere people in our country must be fully aware of it. That is why we decided 2 years ago to give our struggle in this sphere a new dimension, particularly by forming a committee for the defense of freedom and human rights in France and in the world. Let me make myself clear. In saying that, I am not claiming to have discovered anticommunism and hatred of socialism. But the scope of those phenomena must be appreciated in the present historical situation and they must be given the appropriate response. For no force, no pressure and no campaign will ever be able to prevent us from pursuing our struggle for a world of peace, justice, freedom and democracy and for socialism. This new world we want is indeed the world of human rights.

We Want a World of Peace

Nothing is more precious than each human being's right to live in peace. Some 37 years without a world war is already a major achievement. But in many parts of the world each individual's me[illegible]ight to life is still being flouted tragically. And the escalation in the arms race imposed by imperialism is posing serious threats to the future of the world. In addition what an incredible waste it is of all the money swallowed up in that way when it could contribute to universal progress and development.

It is vital, therefore, for this popular and humanist movement to be strengthened, especially in France and in Europe -- a movement that is already unusually broad and which is developing in many forms to force an end to the arms race and the search for a negotiated peaceful solution to all conflicts. It is vital for significant steps to be taken toward disarmament. The medium-range missiles — U.S. and Soviet -- and all nuclear weapons must be limited and reduced, while maintaining the balance of forces. The neutron bomb must be banned in all countries. Military confidence-building measures must be achieved. That is why we deem it vital for peace that the Geneva negotiations should produce a positive result, as should the Madrid meeting that will reopen in a few days' time. Of course we know a world without arms and without war cannot be built in a day. But we must aim for that. There is no alternative to detente, peaceful coexistence and disarmament.

This battle is the responsibility of states. But it is also the responsibility of peoples. For human life is much too serious and precious a thing for the financial powers to govern it at will. Therefore our draft resolution rightly considers the struggle for peace to be a major line. I am convinced it should make it possible to achieve tangible results.

We Also Want a Just World

As I indicated just now, the unbelievable level of world arms spending is rendered even more intolerable by the extent of the problems now affecting almost three-fourths of the world's population. There is a heart-rending contrast between the means offered by science and technology and the extreme poverty inflicted on so many human beings.

At the dawn of the 21st century, while biology, biotechnology and other sciences are opening up astonishing prospects, almost 800 million men, women and children are subsisting in profound poverty. At least 500 million human beings are undernourished. Each year 50 million of them die of starvation, including between 15 and 18 million children. If this tragedy continues, in 20 years the number of starving or malnourished people will reach 1.3 billion. The number of unemployed people which is already more than 1 billion in the underdeveloped countries will have increased still further. Mankind will approach the 21st century with almost 1 billion illiterate adults.

These are universal problems. They affect the majority of mankind directly; and they concern mankind as a whole, the people in the developed countries and the people in the countries which are not yet developed. It is primarily a matter of fraternity and humanism. Believe me, when you have seen children in Africa, Asia or Latin America knowing that they have no more than a week or a few months to live, when you have had that experience, you can never forget it. You cannot sit back and do nothing when dozens and dozens of nations are experiencing hunger. You cannot sit back and do nothing when disease decimates tens of thousands of people in a single day while such progress has been made in medicine. You cannot sit back and do nothing when 3 out of every 10 adults cannot read or write while knowledge is flourishing in an unprecedented way.

It is all the more important to act since mankind is not inevitably doomed to a constantly widening gap between a handful of privileged people and masses reduced to abject poverty. There are not too many human beings on the earth. There is no lack of means for removing the most serious aspects of poverty. No: The causes of the situation are known. They are the relationships of domination and violence imposed by capitalism which, for 200 years, has plundered, exploited and ravaged whole continents. That is why we, who have always stood and will always stand by oppressed peoples, are demanding the necessary measures to end the frightful injustice they are suffering.

At the same time the solution to this problem of justice is part of the class struggle waged by the workers in the capitalist countries. It is linked to the solution of the crisis in our country to the resorption of unemployment, to the growth of the French economy. To help the developing countries is also to help ourselves. The interests of our people and those of the Third World peoples converge. That is why we are struggling for this new international economic and political order which is becoming a pressing need. We are struggling so that each sovereign and independent people can enjoy autonomous and original development in keeping with their needs, their lifestyle and their culture. We are struggling for mutually enriching cooperation for billions of men and women to be established on democratic bases without interference or intervention. We are struggling so that each man and woman, wherever they live, can develop their abilities and run their lives without oppression. We are struggling for a world from which colonialism, neocolonialism, racism and imperialism will be banished forever; for a world of human beings who are equal whatever their color, of nations which are equal whatever their size.

We Want a World of Freedom

Finally, we want a world of freedom and democracy. We want socialism. A world of peace and justice in our times necessarily requires the development of democracy and, more especially, a break with a class society in which the human being is treated as a tool for making money from capital, be it "national" or "multinational." The deep crisis which capitalism is experiencing in all the developed countries which it dominates highlights the inconsistency between its structures and the demands for fundamental changes contained in both the peoples' efforts to achieve emancipation, the growth of knowledge, and the level attained by the productive forces. Socialism takes its place in the changing situation as the answer to those demands.

Just look at the extent to which this universal need characterizes the changes being made. Some peoples are building socialism, others are having to rid themselves of very old forms of society in order to take that path. Yet others show that aspiration, on gaining national independence, in more complicated processes. We have already had occasion to stress that this is a trend characterized by extremely diverse conditions, traditions, standards of living, specific needs, mentalities and lifestyles. This trend is inconsistent and fraught with difficulties. There is nothing straightforward, uniform or automatic about it. But it is a fact that despite the furious imperialist counteroffensive it bears witness to the multifaceted and growing aspiration of peoples to socialism.

Does this diversity and complexity worry us? No, we regard the growth of different experiments which have been started or are envisaged as the proof that peoples are increasingly anxious to seek their own original way of building a superior society. We, who are struggling in a developed and highly individual capitalist country to move toward our nation's own brand of democratic socialism by democratic means, want to make our own contribution to the general liberatory movement. We want to do this by our action to build a new society in our own country and also by supporting the efforts of all peoples who are struggling in that direction.

Yes, it is France's duty and honor to stand unreservedly and unswervingly alongside all those peoples. Yes, we are and will remain unshakably loyal, however, difficult it might be, to the France of Montaigne, the defender of the American Indians in the days of the conquistadores; to the France of Montesquieu, the bane of the 18th century slave traders; to the France of Robespierre who cried: "let the colonies perish if they must cost you your honor, your glory and your freedom"; to the France of Father Gregoire and Victor Hugo.... We are continuing and will continue that humanist France by fighting for a socialist France. Because the French brand of socialism is the noble socialism of peace, justice and freedom, it is the socialism of human rights.

3. Our Party's International Solidarity

It is in the same spirit that we are developing our international activity as a political party. On the basis of the great objectives which we share we show solidarity with all the forces struggling for peace, progress, justice, freedom, independence and socialism in the world. The communist parties are in the forefront of those forces.

Solidarity with the Ruling Communist Parties

/We show solidarity with the ruling communist parties./ We try to make the most stringent assessment possible of the contribution made by the peoples building socialism at the same time as the diversity and present limits of that enterprise. As the draft resolution indicates, we are neither narrowminded nor prejudiced. Many communists probably readily dream about the existence of one or several almost perfect socialist countries which they would hold up as an example in their country to speed up the revolutionary awakening. In short, they dream of utopia realized in a very short space of time. But reality is much more complex: If it is to be realized, utopia must be built in a long process of changing the real situation.

Therefore, let us not oversimplify the reality of building socialism either by painting too bright or too gloomy a picture of it. We are well aware of the fact that no social change in history has been easy, none has escaped setbacks and inconsistencies and none has been brought about without struggles. This applies especially to socialism which is a daunting task, probably the greatest which mankind has ever designed. Yes, building socialism, changing the lives of millions if not billions of people means moving mountains. It is for that very reason that there is not and cannot be, scientifically speaking, any universal, ready-made "model" of socialism. Socialism cannot be imported, for it can only be the result of society's real progress and the ripening of the contradictions within it.

In addition to this, however necessary that progress is, it is not spontaneous or automatic. It requires one essential factor: intervention by the masses and their creative initiative. That is why, I repeat, a French brand of socialism is not and cannot be a socialsim ready-made in another country, repainted in French colors, but can only be a socialism designed and built in France, for the French peoples and by the French people themselves. In saying that we are not disregarding the diversified experiments in building socialism in the world. Quite the reverse: All aspects of them stimulate and enrich out thinking and our fight. It was the same approach which ledour 23d congress to abandon the use of the expression "Marxism-Leninism" in describing our theory. It was not that we were playing down the vast role played by the great revolutionaries like Marx, Engles and Lenin who laid the foundations of that theory. But we want to take account precisely of the very meaning of their battle by not turning that living theory into an immovable doctrine. We want to take account of its constant enrichment on a world scale.

We also rejected the theory and practice of having one or several centers of the world movement for socialism. No more international nor anything which, at world or regional level, might come to take its place to direct, lead or staff the communist and workers' parties in each country: That is our view and our practice.

The Nature of the Socialist Countries Is Not in Doubt

Does this mean that there are no fundamental, universal criteria of socialism? No. That eclecticism is foreign to us. Socialism is both a collectivization of the major means of production and trade, a government representing the working people within which the working class exercises a political leadership role, the gradual satisfaction of the constantly growing material and cultural needs of all members of society and a fundamantal effort to change social relationships. There is no doubt about the nature of the socialist countries. It is a fact that there have been a number of socialist revolutions in the world since 1917. The countries which, at various times and in increasingly different forms, have taken the road to socialism now have growing economic, political and military influence. As regards living standards and full employment, social security and health care, education, research, sport, the rights and dignity of the workers and of peoples, they have achieved results and in some cases have made breakthroughs. The changes they have made in their countries have beneficial repercussions for all peoples. The draft resolution recalls those facts, most of which are disregarded by French opinion. Whatever the crisis and difficulties encountered, nothing can persaude us to deny that those are countries which are building socialism, for if we raised the question differently, we would be setting up our own national view of socialism as a universal criterion and would be falling into the dogmatism of "models."

Nothing can make us play down or deny that fact which strikes us as so natural today but which, three generations ago, was still such a bold prevision: Over a large part of the world socialism has moved out of the sphere of predictions and entered that of realization. Thus, we have every reason to stand by the overall historical assessment which our 23d congress made of existing socialism. Some people will say that the results of socialism after a little more than 50 years or after 20 or 30 years, are not all we had hoped deep down inside. That may be so, but we have in fact learned the real complexity and difficulty of history.

Socialism, as I have said, is a human adventure which has no precedent. The history of the countries which are building it is seen as the product of progress and failures, of struggles waged by the social classes of the peoples and the individuals composing them. It involves difficulties, inconsistencies and even painful mistakes.

CHEYSSON PLANS VISIT TO UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

PM111719 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Feb 82 p 3

[Text] External Relations Minister Cheysson will make an official visit to Abu Dhabi (United Arab Emirates) 20 February, the Quai d'Orsay stated Tuesday. Mr Cheysson had been due to visit the Emirates and Kuwait 9 through 11 January, but the visit was postponed owing to the convening of an emergency NATO meeting on Poland.

The new date chosen for the visit to the Gulf did not suit Kuwait, the Quai d'Orsay spokesman said, but the Quai d'Orsay believes that a date can be set soon. In any case, Mr Cheysson cannot visit Kuwait until after Mr Mitterrand's visit to Israel. The Kuwaiti newspaper al-Anba' stated for its part at the beginning of the week that Mr Cheysson's visit had been canceled at the request of the Kuwaiti Government, which is "dissatisfied with the new French policy" in the region, especially regarding United Nations vote on Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights.

MINISTER MEETS SOLIDARITY REPRESENTATIVES

NC152119 Paris AFP in English 2110 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 15 Feb (AFP) -- French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson met today with three representatives of the Polish Independent Solidarity Trade Union, including Solidarity Presidium member Zigmunt Kowaleszki. During the 45-minute meeting, held at the request of the members of "Solidarity's Coordination Committee in France", Mr Cheysson reaffirmed his condemnation of the state of seige in Poland and discussed the situation in the country, the representatives said. The Solidarity delegates asked the French Government to continue its pressure on Warsaw on behalf of persecuted persons, to facilitate the sending of humanitarian aid to Poland, to break the isolation of the Poles by increasing the number of Polish-language programs on French radio's external services, and to help preserve Polish culture.

FORTY MIRAGE-2000 AIRCRAFT SOLD TO INDIA

LD151534 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] A draft agreement has just been signed with India on the purchase of 40 Mirage-2000 aircraft built in France. This represents the first part of a contract which should subsequently be developed. In principle, the first aircraft will be delivered in 1981. The outlines of this agreement were laid down by Mrs Indira Gandhi during her trip to France in November.

IRAQ BUYS FR4 BILLION IN MODERN ARTILLERY

[Text] Iraq has bought modern 155 mm artillery worth about Fr4 billion from France. The contract, which was signed a few weeks ago, is for the delivery of 85 155 mm GCT (high rate of fire) self-propelled guns mounted on AMX-30 tank chassis, and batches of ammunition. This makes Iraq France's largest foreign buyer of this equipment after Saudi Arabia, which was equipped with these guns even before the ground-to-ground artillery regiments of the French land army. In fact, last year Saudi Arabia lent Iraq six of its artillery weapons -- which, if certain reports are to be believed, were apparently used in the Iran-Iraq conflict -- even before an agreement on this type of weapon had been officially concluded between Baghdad and Paris.

With a combat weight of 42,000 tons and manned by four men, the 155mm GCT self-propelled gun can fire eight rounds a minute (on automatic fire) at a maximum range of 24 km. Armament and ammunitiion are kept on board.

This agreement is important in that Iraq, having turned to France to equip its armed forces with anti-aircraft artillery, has now asked it to equip the rest of its army with classic high-fire power ground-to-ground artillery. It is known that Iraq has bought from France Roland anti-aircraft systems worth about Fr10 billion. These are armored tanks carrying surface-to-air missiles capable of hitting, at supersonic speed, enemy aircraft flying at very low altitudes.

ARAB LEAGUE OFFICE SEEKS DIPLOMATIC STATUS

PM121517 Paris LE MONDE in French 6 Feb 82 p 5

[Text] The Arab League has asked the French Government to grant diplomatic status to the members of its office in Paris, the Quai d'Orsay confirms. That status gives the right to certain privileges and immunities. The request, which was apparently made in December, is being studied, it adds.

The Arab League is invoking the rule of reciprocity since EEC offices in Arab countries enjov diplomatic status. It also points out that several European and African countries grant its offices that status. The same request has been made in other European capitals.

Mr Yazid, the director of the Arab League's Paris office, strongly criticizing French policy in the Near East, stated on 1 February: "Since I am not accredited to the French head of state, I am free to speak without risking a diplomatic incident."

HERNU WANTS FRG REPLY ON TANK PLAN BY 31 MARCH

PM151339 Paris LE MONDE in French 10 Feb 82 p 8

[Excerpts] French Defense Minister Charles Hernu has asked his West German counterpart, Hans Apel, whom he received at a working meeting in Paris on Moanday, to ensure that the FRG will make clear by 31 March its intentions on whether or not to build, in collaboration with France, a modern combat tank suitable for replacing the AMX-30 and the Leopard during the 1990's. Mr Hernu declared his readiness to consider all possible solutions, after making it clear to his counterpart that the French land army needs a new tank from 1990.

During his talks with Mr Apel in Paris, Mr Hernu repeated that France, for its part, is prepared to play the cooperation game with the FRG, but not at any price, particularly not if its military and industrial interests suffer as a result. The French minister declared himself ready to study all formulas for West German participation, including, if the government solution is not accepted in Bonn for financial reasons, an appeal to a private finance consortium on the German side. Mr Hernu also told his West German colleague that it is possible to conceive of different deadlines for bringing the equipment into service in the two armies, given that France reckons on needing this tank from 1990. This is why the French defense minister asked Mr Apel to ensure that the FRG decide on its intentions before 31 March. A committee of experts from the two countries is going to discuss the details of the agreement. Paris asserts that it has made its West German partner understand that a serious decision is expected by that date and that if Bonn, against Paris' wish, is evasive again, France will take official note of the West German stance with regret, even if it means embarking on a new project alone.

The two ministers had time to examine other programs for possible cooperation between the two countries in the aeronautics sphere. France and the FRG have set up a joint project, which seems to be very advanced, for a gunship for France and a missile-carrying helicopter for the FRG from the same basic version. Moreover, the two ministers have agreed to meet again in June, probably in Paris, together with their British counterpart, John Nott, so that the three of them can study a new combat aircraft called ACE (European Combat Aircraft), which could produce a whole family of machines according to need.

GOVERNMENT STAND ON EL SALVADOR DEBATED

AU151434 Rome ANSA in English 0847 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 15 Feb (ANSA) -- The position of the Italian Government on accelerating developments in El Salvador as outlined Wednesday by Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo in a statement delivered to the lower house became the new focal point of ongoing polemics between the Christian Democrats and the Socialists, the two major parties in a five-way coalition led by Premier Giovanni Spadolini, a republican. Last week, a series of sharp exchanges took place between the party of relative majority and the third ranking Socialist Party over Socialist and Social Democrat demands for an immediate "check up" of the agreements behind the formation of Spadolini's cabinet at the end of June last year. The deepening differences between the government partners was extended at the weekend to include what the socialists described as a "lukewarm" response to the situation in El Salvador made by the Christian Democrat foreign minister on the behalf of the government.

The fresh round of charges and contercharges, political analysts said Sunday, now threatens the stability of the seven-and-a-half-month-old coalition, which includes the Social Democrats, the small right-of-center Liberal Party, and the premier's Republican Party. Spadolini was sworn in on June 28 as Italy's first non-Christian Democrat premier since shortly after the Second World War.

In his statement to the house last week, the foreign minister stopped short of passing judgment on the civil strife in the Central American country, led by Jose Napoleon Duarte's Christian Democrat regime, and said that it was "problematic" to ascribe responsibility for the massacre of civilians there either to government troops or the guerrilla forces.

The position was immediately challenged from the opposition benches by the Communist Party, the nation's second largest, and the small Radical Party, as well as by Socialist M.P.'s.

On Saturday, Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi disassociated his alignment from the government stance, as reported by the foreign minister, and flatly declared that the political-military regime in power in El Salvador is responsible for "the massacres, the violence and the systematic violation of human rights" in the country. Craxi went on to accuse the United States of encouraging the Salvadoran junta on the path of repression by providing military and moral support and of blocking the way towards a peaceful political solution through negotiations with the liberation movements. The Socialist secretary, who harbors strong hopes of replacing Spadolini as Italy's next non-Christian Democrat premier, also argued that, "The Italian Government must not give any credit to the project for elections mounted by the Salvadoran Government which, in the context of violence and terror generated by regular and irregular forces, is certain to be transformed into a farce".

The socialist leader concluded by recommending that the request for Italian observers to be sent to El Salvador for the March elections be "sharply rejected". The Christian Democrat response to the assertions advanced by Craxi came Sunday in an editorial written by DC Secretary Flaminio Piccoli and published by the party organ, IL POPOLO. Piccoli said that Italian Christian Democrats condemn the massacres in El Salvador then insisted, however, that the "Salvador case" should be examined more thoroughly.

The premier, in his statement Sunday, declared that the "Italian Government is not indifferent to the drama" in that country and confirmed that the government has no intention of sending observers to El Salvador for the upcoming elections. He also said that the Rome government "demands a solid effort in the West for the creation of a broadly representative democratic government" for the Central American republic.

The foreign minister, for his part, said that, "The exacerbation of polemics does not help to get a focus on what there is in common between the socialist position and the government stance, as outlined to the house and accepted, from differing points of view, by the other parties of the coalition."

Colombo's statement came as an indirect response to a charged droppe by the Socialist deputy secretary, Valdo Spini, who said Sunday that a matter of "such importance" as conditions in El Salvador sparked irritation in Socialist ranks because the government failed to take his party's position into account.

According to Spini, this indicates that the Christian Democrats do not intend to contribute to the creation of a more stable and lasting political framework for Italy.

Also the secretary of the small Social Democrat Party, Pietro Longo, sided with the Socialists when he declared that these tensions in the coalition "are largely attributable to the Christian Democrats who are systematically refusing to check out the stability of the government." On the sidelines, the Liberal, Raffaele Costa said, "It would be good for the two major government parties to come up with a show of good will, to not exploit circumstances, and put their differences behind them by noting above all that the principles of Helsinki are universal and applicable in Warsaw as well as in San Salvador."

FOREIGN MINISTRY DEFENDS COLOMBO ON EL SALVADOR

AU160908 Rome ANSA in English 0812 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 16 Feb (ANSA) -- The Italian Foreign Ministry accused the Socialist Party of "unfounded" accusations against the attitude of Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo on the El Salvador situation in a comment delivered to the editorial staff of the Socialist Party organ "L'AVANTI." In the comment, which appears in today's edition of the daily, the ministry claimed that there was no basis for calling Colombo's position in parliamentary debate on which is "quickly" drawing away from the line approved by the United Nations General Assembly.

In his statement to the House last week, the foreign minister stopped short of passing judgment on civil strife in the Central American country, led by Jose Napoleon Durate's Christian Democrat regime, and said that it was "problematic" to ascribe responsibility for the massacre of civilians there either to government troops or guerrilla forces.

The Socialists described this as a "lukewarm" response to the situation in El Salvador made by the Christian Democrat foreign minister on behalf of the government. Other accusations by the Socialists, that the minister was ignoring the essential points of the UN resolution (approved by Italy, Germany and France with the abstension of Great Britain and the veto of the United States), were also described as unfounded in the ministry comment. "The Italian Government has reiterated to the junta in El Salvador that it condemns the violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms," the comment read in part.

Concerning the UN resolution in question, the ministry note claimed that it "restated its appeal to all nations to desist from intervening in the internal situation of El Salvador and suspend all arms supplies and every type of military aid."

The ministry also maintained that "in the declaration before the House, Cuban intervention, with an activity not only ideological but also of support for the armed struggle, was pointed out as a destabilizing one. "As far as the United States position is concerned," the comment continued, "Italy and the other European nations have always asked them to favor a dialogue among the political forces and not to accentuate the conditions of an armed conflict."

The Italian Government has accepted the Socialist Party request not to send observers to the upcoming elections in El Salvador, the Foreign Ministry maintained in its statements, "after attentive evaluations and consultations with the other European nations."

GOVERNMENT DENOUNCES DESTABILIZATION ATTEMPT

LD131402 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1300 GMT 13 Feb 82

["Official Note" from the Presidency of the Portuguese Council of Ministers and the Portuguese minister of internal administration; read by unidentified spokesman -- recorded]

[Text] In the wake of the overwhelming victory of the Portuguese workers on 12 February, the government detected minority actions which were aimed at undermining law, order and the citizens' security. These actions followed a number of localized disruptions of democratic normality which took place throughout the day, such as acts of sabotage and attempts to prevent the operation of essential services and demonstrations aimed at physically curtailing the free exercise of fundamental rights. All these disruptions were overcome in a climate of democratic calm thanks to the prompt intervention of security forces under the government's guidance.

The government was fully aware of the chance that such minority actions might occur, particularly in the event of a failure of the attempted general strike planned by the Communist Party, as indeed happened. It was therefore in a position to adopt all the necessary measures for safeguarding law, order and the citizens' security.

The movements detected late on 12 February involved acts of illegal agitation by small groups of individuals. Security forces detained elements connected with specific plans to subvert democratic institutions. These plans included concerted actions in various parts of Lisbon and its outskirts. Documents which were found in a seized vehicle are being analyzed, as well as magnetic tapes with recorded proclamations to the nation. Various firearms were also found. Systematic interference aimed at jamming official communications networks was detected. Detained persons are being questioned and will in due course be handed over to the judiciary within the legal deadline.

On 12 February the Portuguese workers overwhelmingly defeated the attempted communist strike. On the same day the government, with the assistance of the security forces, neutralized a terrorist attempt to subvert the structures of the democratic state of law.

Correia Outlines 'Scheme'

LD141040 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The Portuguese Government has made it known that the percentage of adherence to the general strike planned by the Communist Party in Portugal for 12 February was very low: All essential services continued to function. The government concluded that the Communist Party in Portugal has suffered a setback as a result of the failure of the planned general strike. Minister of Internal Administration Angelo Correia went on television to prove to the nation that subjacent to the strike there was a whole insurrectional scheme to disrupt the established order. As examples of disruptive activities he listed the use of bulldozers to block entrances to workplaces of nonstriking workers and the sabotaging of shop door locks. He also mentioned the blockading of roads with tree trunks, the stoning of vehicles and persons, an attempt to sabotage the cattle feed plant in Alcains and water and power cuts on the southern bank of the Tagus and in Lourdes.

Minister Correia further disclosed that the government had received indications of plans for provocative and subversive actions to be carried out during the evening of 12 February. The minister also disclosed that there had been attempts to run down national guardsmen at road checkpoints set up by the National Republican Guard [GNR] on the southern bank of the Tagus and in Alcabideche. A national guardsman was shot in Couco. A GNR corporal was killed in Ermidas do Sado. Some of the people responsible for these actions have already been detained, and firearms have been seized outside the Lisbon region. The minister concluded that the situation is over and the country is calm.

CP Calls Reports 'Slander'

LD141100 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0700 GMT 14 Feb 82

[Communique issued by Portuguese Communist Party on 14 February: read by Party Spokesman Vitor Dias -- recorded]

[Text] Minister Angelo Correia's televised address on 12 February was yet another serious insult on the part of the government to the Portuguese workers and democratic forces. The government responded to yesterday's great day of struggle with a huge avalanche of lies and fabrications through the manipulation of state-owned media, particularly television. We can now see that this truly terrorist campaign to poison public opinion, launched by the government, has not yet come to an end. The insinuations and nonsensical accusations levelled by Correia are clearly at the service of a provocative setup which was already part of previous government plans to conceal the great victory scored by the workers with their general strike. By its substance, tone and wording, Correia's address can only confirm in the eyes of the Portuguese democrats that the Portuguese Communist Party is not exaggerating when it says that the threat of fascism lies behind the Democratic Alliance government. On television last night Correia proved, in fact, to be worthy of inclusion among the interior ministers of the fascist era.

In the face of the seriousness of the statements made by Correia, the Portuguese people are fully entitled to immediately demand that the government produce convincing and explicit evidence to prove its charges. The wicked slander hurled by the minister of internal administration again confirms the idea that Correia himself is the one who is in an exceptional position to explain much about links with terrorism and responsibility for provocations. With calm, the Portuguese people will not allow themselves to be deceived or intimidated. The commonsense, intelligence, political maturity and democratic feelings of the Portuguese people will prevail over the dishonesty, moral abjection, reactionary nature and provocative posture of Correia and the government. The Portuguese people will in the end rid Portugal of a government and ministers who are an affront to the democratic regime and the liberating ideals of the 25 April 1974 revolution.

SOVIET AMBASSADOR RECEIVES PROTEST NOTE

[Text] The Soviet ambassador to Lisbon, at his request, was received today at the Foreign Ministry where he was handed the protest note approved in parliament yesterday concerning the repercussions of the successive statements released by the embassy's press office in connection with statements made by Mario Soares. The Foreign Ministry also conveyed to the Soviet ambassador the government's displeasure and its wish that the embassy's reply will meet the requests for appropriate apologies in order to establish whether the incident should have further consequences. Another meeting has been set for the next few days.

SOARES POSTPONES VISIT TO LATIN AMERICA

PA160213 Madird EFE in Spanish 2140 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] Lisbon, 15 Feb (EFE) -- Portuguese Socialist Party (PS) leader Mario Soares decided today to postpone his visit to Costa Rica, Venezuela and Panama which was scheduled for 20 February, it was learned here today. According to a PS source, the postponement was due to the fact that the Socialist International meeting, which was scheduled for 24 and 25 February in Caracas with the presence of Mario Soares and other European political leaders of the same ideology, was called off. Soares, who had been invited by Luis Alberto Monge, the newly elected President of Costa Rica, had intended to stay there 3 days. The Portuguese Socialist leader had also been invited by Panamanian President Aristides Royo and was to have gone to Panama after the Caracas meeting.

PARTY PAPER SCORES PRAVDA ATTACK ON PCI

PM101643 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 5-11 Feb 82 p 15

[Commentary: "Debate, Not Anathemas"]

[Text] The PCE has frequently declared itself in favor of a Marxist debate on the new problems which are creating differences and even divergences among communists -- a debate which because of its importance also concerns other political and social forces. The PRAVDA article claims to be a reply by the CPSU to the PCI's reflections and critical observations in connection with the tragic and disturbing events in Poland. But this article does not facilitate debate. Rather, it tends to prevent it. The tone and contents conform to the old patterns which have done so much harm in the past. For Soviet readers this is a dialogue of the deaf -- or rather, a monologue -- because the press in their country has not published the PCI's documents.

The central issue is Poland. There can be different approaches to it from Marxist stances. Everything invites a serious, responsible and self-critical debate and a thorough reflection. The popular, democratizing and renovating movement shows the majority of the Polish people in a stance of opposition to the government, the party and the model of society. The recourse to a military junta is an unprecedented event in countries which proclaim themselves socialist -- an event not envisaged by the classics of Marxism. The situation in Poland raises many disturbing questions. PRAVDA evades the issue of Poland and replaces arguments with anathemas and condemnations. The PCI leadership is described as "opportunist, revisionist and sacrilegious." The PCI "is attempting to blur the aggressive essence of imperialism," "acting openly against world socialism and directly helping imperialism, anticommunism and all the forces hostile to social progress in general." It "agrees with Haig and defends a platform opposed to the policy of the Soviet Union, of the countries of the socialist community, of the vast majority of the communist movement and of the entire national liberation movement." The PRAVDA article presents the CPSU as the repository of absolute truth, as the center and guide to which it is necessary to bow in order not to fall into sacrilege or hereby and, to top it all, as the absolute and undisputed representative of an extremely broad set of world forces which includes nothing less than the entire national liberation movement, despite that movement's complexity and diversity.

PRAVDA disregards the critical nature of Marxism and condemns any attempt at reflection on the real situation of the countries which proclaim themselves socialist. With phrases from the old language it idealizes so-called real socialism when it praises "the methods of real democracy of the people and for the people, with an increasingly broad participation by the workers in the running of the state and of society," and when it asserts that in those countries "life is developing fully and brightly, without attempting to avoid either a single new problem or a single complex difficulty, resolving them in the interest of society and of the citizen." That idyllic picture is a false one. Nobody can deny the advances and achievements of the countries of so-called real socialism. But it is not possible to disregard their shortcomings, mistakes and distortions, or the limitations regarding issues essential to economic and social development, such as freedom, democracy, participation by the people and self-management. If that picture is correct, it might be asked: Why was the 20th CPSU Congress necessary? Why did the events in Hungary occur? Why did the "Prague Spring," cut short by the Warsaw Pact troops' intervention, emerge? Why are the events in Poland erupting? The PRAVDA article confirms the disturbing process of the ossification of Marxism in the Soviet Union. Since the 20th congress there has been no serious formulation concerning the positive or negative aspects of Soviet reality. And what is worse, the atmosphere of rejection of any form of serious debate on equal terms, without anathemas or condemnations and without the old leading party attitudes reemerging, persists.

It is not inappropriate to recall the words spoken by Santiago Carrillo, representing the PCE at the Conference of European Communist and Workers Parties held in Berlin in June 1976.

"In fact," Santiago said, "We communists originated and grew up under conditions of struggle and persecution comparable only to those experienced by the early Christians: They were thrown to wild animals, crucified and cast into the catacombs; they held out, clinging to their faith, their beliefs and their symbols, until they broke the social siege which was excluding them. We have experienced a similar situation, and in many countries we have still not emerged from it. The sufferings which our parties have had to bear, and still bear, our period in the catacombs, created in our ranks an amalgam of scientific socialism and a kind of mystique of sacrifice and predestination. We came to have something of a new church, with our martyrs and our prophets. For many years, Moscow, where our dreams began to be realized, was our Rome. We used to speak of the socialist October Revolution as if it were our nativity...." "It was our period of childhood. Today we have become adults...."

The document approved by that conference proclaimed "the equality of rights and sovereign independence of every party and the principle of noninterference in internal affairs and of the free choice of different paths in the struggle for progressive social transformations and for socialism." Referring to the document's contents, Santiago Carrillo asserted at the Berlin conference: "There is no doubt that today we communists have no leading center and no international discipline binding on us, that what unites us are the ties of affinity based on the theory of scientific socialism, and that we would accept no return to the structures and conceptions of internationalism characteristic of the previous period."

The PRAVDA article does not mention the PCE. But we feel affected by those attacks on the PCI, with which we have fundamental points of agreement in the Eurocommunist conceptions and in our reflections on so-called real socialism and on the crucial issues of the struggle against imperialism, for disarmament, peace and the elimination of the military blocs and for solidarity with the peoples struggling for their freedom.

PEREZ-LLORCA RECEIVES FOREIGN COUNTERPARTS

[Text] Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca had separate meetings this evening with the foreign ministers of France, Great Britain and the Netherlands. Perez-Llorca discussed with Claude Cheysson bilateral problems between the two countries. Sources close to the Foreign Ministry have said that Perez-Llorca discussed with his British counterpart, Lord Carrington, the negotiations on Gibraltar as well as the international situation and the development of the Madrid conference.

PARTIES FORM FEDERATION FOR NEXT ELECTION

LD130316 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0000 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Text] A federation of conservative parties, which is an amplified Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] or a UCD which is returning to its origins as a federation of parties, has been formally constituted. It is made up of UCD itself headed by Calvo-Sotelo, a liberal party headed by Antonio Garrigues, the Christian Democrats formed into a party headed by Landelino Lavilla, the conservatives of Jose Maria de Areilza, and finally a reformist party, newly formed, of Adolfo Suarez. These five parties in a federation will run together in the next general elections. According to its promoters, this formula will obtain more seats than if UCD stood alone, gaining broad sectors of potential electors. The agreement has economic standing since there will be sufficient financing for the federation. It is thought that the bloc could be effective in preventing a possible socialist victory.

The secretary of state for information has said that this report does not have the slightest foundation.

SORSA APPOINTED PRIME MINISTER-DESIGNATE

LD121730 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] President Mauno Koivisto has appointed the Chairman of the Social Democratic Party, Kalevi Sorsa, prime minister-designate. Sorsa is to form the new government on the basis agreed on earlier. The government will thus continue to include the Social Democrats, the Center Party, the People's Democrats and the Swedish People's Party. The government parties agreed earlier today on the distribution of essential ministerial posts. According to the agreement, the prime minister will be a Social Democrat, the foreign minister is to represent the Swedish People's Party, and the minister of trade and industry will represent the Center Party. The distribution of the other ministerial posts is to be decided on Monday. Chairman Sorsa said a moment ago, after having informed President Koivisto about the negotiations, that the president hoped that the Chairman of the Swedish People's Party, Par Stenback, could be given the post of foreign minister. It is probable that the Center Party will elect its candidate for the post of the minister of trade and industry next week.

The present foreign minister, Center Party Chairman Paavo Vayrynen, announced today that he will not participate in the new government. Vayrynen noted that the Center Party has given up the portfolio of the foreign minister at the request of the Social Democrats. According to Vayrynen, the Social Democrats had presented the alternative of early elections. Vayrynen did not regard the proposal of the Social Democrats as justified or right. However, Chairman Sorsa regarded early elections as a sensible alternative. In his opinion, no minority government would have found it worthwhile to try to have next year's budget settlement accepted. The deciding bodies of the present government parties will have a meeting the middle of next week to make a final decision on the formation of the government.

FOERDE CRITICAL OF COMMITTEE REORGANIZATION

PM160907 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 30 Jan 82 p 7

[Text] Norwegian Labor Party Deputy Chairman Einar Foerde has criticized the government's reorganization of the composition and powers of the Committee for Arms Control and Disarmament. At Friday's [29 January] cabinet meeting, the government reduced the number of committee members from 16 to 12 by removing the four places for Storting members. The new instructions also state that the new committee should have a "decidedly expert character" and be composed primarily of "researchers and representatives from state administration with special competence in questions on disarmament and arms control." Foreign Ministry Deputy Secretary Oscar Vaernoe is the committee's new chairman, replacing Labor Party politician Helge Sivertsen, who has chaired the committee since 1974.

"The reorganization shows first and foremost that the government takes the view that work in this particular field is for experts only. The majority of the members of the new committee are experts on whom the government can rely under any circumstances," Foerde said. "The fact that the four Storting representatives have been removed from the committee indicates that the government no longer attaches the same importance to the broad involvement in this committee aimed at by previous governments. This conflicts with our philosophy. If we are to make any progress with this work we need broader involvement. It would have been natural to involve more groups, such as the youth organizations which have shown such great interest in this very field. "Looking at the political composition of the new committee, I think that the new government is here -- as in all important areas -- giving committees a decidedly more one-sided composition than the previous government aimed at," Einar Foerde said.

DENKTAS SENDS ANNIVERSARY MESSAGE TO EVREN

TA130628 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, has sent a message to head of state Gen Kenan Evren on the occasion of the seventh anniversary of the establishment of the Federated State. In his message, Denktas said that it is the sacred duty of every Turkish Cypriot to defend what has been gained through the lives of martyrs and the sacrifices of war veterans in Cyprus and to attain as a nation the goals set by Ataturk. Denktas said: Our community, well aware of the sacrifices necessitated by this great duty, will resolutely continue its activities and will definitely attain the goals set by the lofty Turkish nation. Denktas also sent messages to Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and the Prime Ministry's Cyprus Affairs Under Secretary Vahit Guneri on the occasion of the seventh anniversary of the establishment of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus.

DENKTAS ADDRESS ON ANNIVERSARY REPORTED

TA131654 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Text] The seventh anniversary of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus was marked with ceremonies today in the Turkish sector of Cyprus. In an address broadcast by the radio and television on this occasion, Turkish Cypriot President Rauf Denktas reiterated that the partnership right of the Turkish Cypriot community certified by international agreements constituted the basis of the Federation State. Denktas recalled that both the Turkish and the Greek Cypriot communities in Cyprus had equal founding partnership rights in the independence and sovereignty of Cyprus. Referring to the intercommunal talks, Denktas said that no party had any superiority over the other in the talks. In today's session of the Turkish Cypriot Legislative Assembly which convened extraordinarily to mark this occasion, the deputy speaker of the assembly as well as party leaders addressed the meeting. Ceremonies were also held in Mersin to mark the anniversary. A wreath was laid at the Ataturk monument in the Square of the Republic, the martyrs were remembered, the Turkish flag was hoisted and the Turkish national anthem was played.

SPOKESMAN REJECTS DENKTAS 'PARTITION PHILOSOPHY'

NC141111 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1000 GMT 14 Feb 82

[Text] Commenting on a speech yesterday by Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas on the occasion of the seventh anniversary of declaration of the so-called Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, the government spokesman has stated that Mr Denktas is openly declaring the philosophy of partition. The spokesman added that, with his statement that Cyprus is and will remain Turkish, Mr Denktas really shows the mentality of an Ottoman emperor, whereas the other positions he supports prove that he has not abandoned at all the philosophy of division. The spokesman went on: Mr Denktas is trying without success to present the Greek Cypriot side as being responsible for the lack of progress in the inter-Cypriot talks, while, once again, with his statements he insists on the faits accomplis created by the Turkish invasion and appears more intransigent than ever, thereby proving beyond any doubt his responsibility for the failure of any progress in the inter-Cypriot dialogue.

The government spokesman concluded: These statements by Mr Denktas not only are provocative but in essence they undermine the dialogue and confirms the view that the Turkish Cypriot leadership aims only at promoting the faits accomplis in contravention of the UN resolutions and the summit agreements which he signed himself.

TURKMEN TO ATTEND NATO MEETING IN FRG

TA121658 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen left Madrid for the FRG today to attend a scientific defense technology meeting organized within the framework of NATO. Turkmen was in Spain to attend the European Security and Cooperation Review Conference in Madrid. The deputy chief of the general staff, Gen Neodet Oztorun, left Istanbul for the FRG today to attend the NATO Scientific Defense Technology meeting to be held there. The latest developments in defense technology and defense strategy issues will be discussed at the meeting to begin in Munich tomorrow. U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger is also expected to attend the meeting which will open with an address by FRG Defense Minister Hans Apel. The meeting will last 2 days.

[Text] Ankara, 15 Feb (AA) -- Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen returned to Ankara Monday after a week's absence. Turkmen had attended the "Wehrkunde" conference on defense technology in Munich over the weekend after representing Turkey at the Madrid conference. He is expected to make a statement Tuesday on his activities in Europe.

Pleased With NATO Meeting

TA142122 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2100 GMT 14 Feb 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that the NATO scientific defense technology meetings which ended in Munich today were conducted in an atmosphere favorable to Turkey. The Mediterranean news agency reports that in a statement after today's meeting, Turkmen said he exchanged views with the representatives of the countries attending the meetings. Expressing his satisfaction over the results of the meetings, the foreign minister said: We stated that, unlike Greece which did not attend the meetings, we share the views of the other NATO countries in connection with Poland. We also reiterated once again our views for the strengthening of solidarity among Western countries.

DAILY SCORES ABSTENTION AT UN ON ISRAEL

[Commentary by Oktay Eksi: "Whose Foreign Policy Is It?"]

[Excerpt] The policy we are currently pursuing during the debate at the United Nations on Israel -- which annexed the Golan Heights -- is apparently aimed at not angering the United States. However, it is certain that even if this stance appears to serve our interests in the short range, it will be very costly to Turkey in the long run -- as it was in the past. As a matter of fact, Turkey has been paying dearly for all its past votes on Algeria where the Cyprus issue is concerned. All the nonaligned countries as well as all the Arab countries -- except for Saudi Arabia and from time to time Iraq -- have always voted in favor of Greece at the United States.

After having made this point, it is necessary to ask Mr Turkmen and Mr Kirca: Was it our own or another foreign ministry that issued an official statement on 5 December 1981 following the annexation of the Golan Heights and said: Through its decision to annex the Golan Heights, Israel has added another to the faits accomplis it has been creating in the Middle East. The Turkish Government deplores this fait accompli undertaken in the region by Israel in utter disregard of world public opinion.... Our government does not and will not in any way recognize Israel's decision to annex the Golan Heights....

If this statement reflects Turkey's foreign policy, then what does Mr Kirca's "abstention" at the United Nations reflect? And we are supposed to be known as a nation that "attaches importance to its independence and dignity"....

ASSEMBLY APPROVES SPAIN'S NATO MEMBERSHIP

TA151831 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1550 GMT 14 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 15 Feb (AA) -- The Consultative Assembly approved Spain's membership in NATO Monday by a vote of 110 to 24, with 11 abstentions.

The roll call vote followed statements by several members opposed to the proposal on the grounds that Spanish parliamentarians had taken an anti-Turkish stand at the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly and that according to press reports, the king of Spain had snubbed the Turkish foreign minister during the latter's stay in Madrid for the follow-up European Security and Cooperation Conference.

During the debate, Hamza Eroglu (Ankara) said Spanish MP's should realize that Turkey is doing them a favor by accepting Spain's membership in the alliance, despite their anti-Turkish stand at the Council of Europe.

Nuri Ozgoker said he could not understand why Turkey should support NATO membership for a country, parliamentarians of which sided with Greek MP's in any attempt to expel Turkey from the Council of Europe. "Are we inviting Spain to NATO so that she can oppose us inside the alliance?" he asked.

Turkey should not follow blindly the policy of an ally, he said, and demanded the suspension of Spain's entry in NATO. Zekai Bayer (Istanbul) announced he would vote against the proposal because of Spanish members' behavior in the Council of Europe Assembly.

Spokesman for the Foreign Ministry Muammer Akcer said the reports about the king of Spain not shaking hands with Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen had been "exaggerated." There had been no question of the king meeting Turkmen because Turkmen was not paying an official visit to Spain.

The ministry spokesman explained that those Spanish parliamentarians who opposed Turkey's membership in the Council of Europe belonged to leftist parties. The same MP's opposed Spain's membership in NATO as well. "If the Consultative Assembly obstructs Spain's membership, it will have served the purposes of this group, while going contrary to the wishes of the majority in Spain," he said. Turkey was "not merely going along with her allies" in this respect, he added, but believed Spain's membership was in Turkey's interest as well. The general staff had formally said Spain's membership would help strengthen Turkey's defence, he pointed out.

TCP SPOKESMAN ON CURRENT SITUATION IN TURKEY

NC141124 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 13 Feb 82 p 7

[Excerpts] After the intensified oppressions against the democratic forces and attempts to exterminate them, the situation in Turkey has caused worldwide indignation. Following is an interview given to RIZOSPASTIS by a spokesman of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] referring to the latest developments in our neighboring country.

Question: What are the latest developments in Turkey?

Answer: I would like to stress certain particularly important aspects. The rapprochement between the reactionary junta and the U.S. Government undoubtedly constitutes the most dangerous situation at this time and is completely contrary to the national interests. This can be particularly seen in the results of the latest visit to Ankara by U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger. A special "bilateral military coordination" organ has been established, which actually has the mission of making possible the imposition of direct U.S. military domination over our area. Furthermore, other secret plans of the Pentagon for the installation of new nuclear missiles in Turkey have also become known. The junta's steps toward rapprochement with the United States encourage the Reagan administration to further increase its military pressure on Ankara so that our country may totally be turned into a base for their aggressive designs against the USSR and our neighboring countries.

Another aspect of the present situation is the increased efforts by the junta generals, through demagogic statements about "return to democracy," to conceal their steps toward establishing and legalizing their dictatorship under the cloak of an apparent parliamentarism. The body which they have established under the misleading name "consultative assembly" is actually used in working out a constitution that will legalize all the antidemocratic decrees and laws of the junta.

Question: How do you judge the reports [as published] of official Turkish representatives on the Polish People's Republic at international organizations?

Answer: Whereas a legal government in the Polish People's Republic adopts measures, on the basis of the constitution, to neutralize the antirevolutionary forces and smooth the situation in the country and thus consolidate peace in Europe, the military government of Turkey, which has seized power through a coup d'etat, has abolished the constitution and flagrantly violates human rights. The procedure followed in imposing their rule creates all the greater dangers for peace in the area and for the country's national interests. The procedure is being applied with all the harder oppressive measures against the democratic forces. In view of this situation, it is really laughable that the generals who are in power in Turkey interfere in the internal affairs of the Polish People's Republic and criticize the process of smoothing the situation in that country.

Question: How do you judge the praise by Haig and Weinberger for the present Turkish government:

Answer: While Reagan appears in a "broadcast show" as a "trade unionist" and sheds crocodile tears for the so-called "Solidarity" Trade Union, his Secretaries Haig and Weinberger are openly praising the oppression by the [Turkish] military regime.

The Reagan administration's open support for the military junta in Turkey clearly shows its hypocrisy on the events in Turkey. Oppression in Turkey could never have acquired such a barbarian nature without the direct support of the Reagan administration. The military prosecutor wouldn't dare demand the death penalty for the 52 trade unionists if the U.S. government had not openly given its approval. The praise by senior U.S. representatives for the reactionary Turkish junta proves that they are equally responsible and accomplices in the barbariac oppression and violation of human rights in Turkey.

Question: How do you assess the recent meeting of the TCP, the Turkish Labor Party and the Turkish Socialist Workers Party?

Answer: United action by the broader anti-imperialist and democratic forces is necessary in confronting the dangers emerging from the present situation and in utilizing the militant potential which appears at the same time. The summit meeting of the three parties is an important step in this direction. Joint action by them will serve as an example for other patriotic forces.

GOVERNMENT RATIFIES PROTCOL WITH LIBYA

TA151825 Ankara ANATOLIA in French 1645 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 15 Feb (AA) -- It has been announced that a trade protocol initialed in Tripoli at the conclusion of talks held in Libya from 16 to 19 November 1981 has been ratified today by the Turkish Council of Ministers in Ankara.

According to the protocol, Turkey will export to Libya grain, livestock, meat, olive oil and fruits and will import chemicals. A joint engineering consultation firm is also to be formed with capital of $500,000 to be supplied equally by the two parties. The executive committee of the firm will be composed by six persons, three Turks and three Libyans.

COURT RELEASES SOVIET SHIP ON GUARANTEE

TA121809 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] The Soviet ship that collided with the Turkish freighter Asya-I in the Bosporus some time ago was released against 500 million Turkish lira guarantee. The Soviet ship had been stopped by gendarme boats at the exit of the Dardanelles while attempting to escape after colliding with the Asya-I freighter in the Bosporus. The Fifth Commercial Court of Istanbul had imposed a lien on the Soviet ship, which is anchored at Canakkale port for the past 5 days. The Soviet ship departed Canakkale port following the deposit of the 500-million Turkish lira guarantee.

CSCE SESSION

TINDEMANS: 'SOVIETS FACE WEST'S INDICTMENT'

PM161349 Brussels LE SOIR in French 11 Feb 82 pp 1, 3

[Francis Unwin report on speech by Belgian Foreign Minister Tindemans to 9 February Madrid session of European Security and Cooperation Conference (CSCE): "The Soviets Face the West's Indictment"]

[Excerpt] Tindemans: "The USSR must be reminded that continued interference and, even more seriously, any foreign armed intervention in Poland would entail the profoundest consequences for East-West relations. The CSCE process -- to which we still adhere -- is not endangered by our criticisms but would very obviously be endangered by indiffernce or timidity. It is the whole weight of the final act which is in jeopardy. Our action aims, with no illusions but also without the weakness of resignation, to persuade the East to resume the difficult but necessary course of negotiation. We also know that there will be no real security in Europe or in the world without the conclusion of balanced accords, limiting arms on both sides to comparable levels. We know that this is where Europe's long-term future lies. We will continue, even though forced to condemn their present policy, to organize our efforts with a view to persuading the Soviet and Polish Governments to return to the path of dialogue and moderation."

Certain "hints" which question what is traditionally, though wrongly, called the Yalta Partition are also to be noted in the speech by Tindemans and thus the EEC: "At the end of the war our continent was caught up in a situation determined essentially by the positions won by the occupying military forces. It was not the law, since none of the agreements signed during the war envisaged it, nor the free expression of the will of Europe's people, but force and repression which were going to shape its aspect."

PLENARY SESSIONS OF CONFERENCE SCHEDULED

[Text] The plenary session of the Madrid Conference has scheduled its working agenda for 16 and 17 February. On Tuesday an informal meeting of delegation heads is scheduled and in the evening a meeting of the drafting group is to take palce. On Wednesday another plenary session will be held.

MBFR PLENARY SESSION

CANADIAN DELEGATE REJECTS EASTERN CHARGES

AU121134 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 12 Feb 82 p 3

[Text] Yesterday's 295th plenary session of the Vienna negotiations on a reduction of forces in central Europe was attended by Prof Eugene Rostow, Director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, who did not take the floor. Rostow had come from Geneva where in a speech before the UN Disarmament Committee he had pointed out that progress in disarmament must be made dependent on the attitude of the Soviet Union. The only speaker at yesterday's session was Canadian Chief Delegate Ambassador David C Reece, who resolutely rejected the Eastern charge that the West was blocking any progress at the Vienna negotiations because it demands a clarification of the controversial troop strength figures of the Warsaw Pact armed forces. Reece stressed that any agreement on a first reduction phase was possible only on the basis of troop strength figures recognized by both sides. He added that agreement on accompanying control measures was also an essential prerequisite for a desired agreement. An Eastern spokesman declared after the plenary session that it was regrettable that to date the West had not taken a stance on the recently submitted proposal by the Warsaw Pact countries to appoint a work group for drafting a first agreement. A spokesman of the NATO countries declared, however, that this proposal was at present being studied. The next plenary meeting will be held next Thursday.

REAGAN PLANNING TO ATTEND BONN SUMMIT IN JUNE

LD121258 Hamburg DPA in German 1213 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 12 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Government officially announced this afternoon that the NATO summit with U.S. President Reagan will take place in Bonn on 10 June. Government Spokesman Becker said that the Federal Government welcomes this decision very much. Becker said that it is likely that President Reagan will arrive in Bonn on the evening of 9 June. This will provide an opportunity for bilateral talks with the Federal Government. According to Becker, Reagan's schedule does not include a visit to Berlin.

Demonstration Threatened

LD121742 Hamburg DPA in German 1705 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] [Dateline not given] The participation of U.S. President Ronald Reagan in the NATO meeting in Bonn is "extremely likely to lead to a large-scale demonstration by the peace movement" in Bonn. This has been stated by the National Association of the Environmental Protection Citizen Campaigns [Bundesverband Buergerinitiativen Umweltschutz] which issued a statement today stating the "gigantic arms policy" of the Reagan government and U.S. policy on El Salvador could "not remain unchallenged" and had to receive "a clear reply from the German population."

Ecologists Plan Disruption

LD141248 Hamburg DPA in German 1226 GMT 14 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn 14 Feb (DPA) -- An "information and action program lasting several days" has been announced by the ecologists to coincide with the visit of U.S. President Ronald Reagan. Reagan will arrive 9 June for the NATO summit, which begins a day later in Bonn. This program "will occupy" the capital "in respect of both space and politics". A spokesman of Environmental Party said in Bonn on Sunday. The ecologists "do not rule out the possibility that the NATO summit, with Ronald Reagan as a symbolic figure of the arms race and the possible nuclear, biological and chemical destruction of Europe, will not be able to take place at the planned venue." Reagan's visit is an unsurpassed provocation to the peace movement.

NORWAY'S WILLOCH CONFERS WITH CHANCELLOR

LD161554 Hamburg DPA in German 1520 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 16 Feb (DPA) -- The FRG and Norway have apparently agreed that there should be a break at the Madrid CSCE because of the dispute over the treatment of the situation in Poland. Norwegian Prime Minister Kaare Willoch, after a long talk with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today, expressed his regret to journalists in Bonn that the Soviet Union and the other East European states were not prepared to talk about the events in Poland. "Hence, in our opinion, there is a need to introduce a short break in the negotiations," Willoch said. "But we are in complete agreement that these negotiations must be continued later."

Prior to this Schmidt had pointed out that this topic had not been explored in great depth at his meeting with Willoch, but he did hint that both governments had come to similar conclusions in their deliberations. "Basically, we think the followup conference to Helsinki is an important instrument and we do not want to throw it away," the chancellor went on to say. In his view the CSCE would offer benefits for Europe in the future, too.

After their first meeting since Willoch's entry into office both heads of government stressed the necessity of continued close participation by Norway in the political cooperation of the EEC countries. Willoch said that for his country the question of EEC membership was no longer relevant. "Political cooperation does have a high value for us, however."

This afternoon the Norwegian prime minister continued his talks with Bonn politicians and party representatives. He will later meet with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and CDU/CSU politicans. Prior to his return home on Wednesday morning, he will be received by President Karl Carstens.

According to Schmidt and Willoch they achieved complete agreement on essential questions of East-West relations, security policy and arms control during their private talk. Both stressed the need to expeditiously continue Soviet-U.S. negotiations on the control of medium-range armaments. They also came out against pursuing the subject of a nuclear arms-free zone in Europe because this distracted people from the Geneva negotiations. Willoch added: "We cannot achieve the security of our countries by means of some kind of guarantee from the Soviet Union." Concerning the situation in Poland, both sides agreed that the Soviet Union is partly responsible. Schmidt said that he continues to think it desirable to combine the offer of economic aid to Warsaw with demands for lifting martial law, the release of those interned and a resumption of the dialogue with the trade unions and the church. But this aid should only be given if the Polish leadership returns fully to the basis of the Helsinki Final Act.

Both heads of government assessed positively the current state of bilateral relations. Asked about the possibility of German submarines being supplied to Norway, Willoch said that his government has not yet taken any binding decisions on where these craft were to be purchased.

SPD'S WEHNER PLANS FACT-FINDING TRIP TO WARSAW

LD151402 Hamburg DPA in German 1341 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 15 Feb (DPA) -- SPD Bundestag Parliamentary Group Chairman Herbert Wehner will travel to Warsaw next weekend as the first leading Bonn politican to visit Poland for political talks since the imposition of martial law. Parliamentary Group Spokesman Knut Terjung confirmed DPA's information to this effect on Monday. He said that Wehner is making a fact-finding trip to the Polish capital at the invitation of leading Polish politicians. The spokesman did not give further details about whom Wehner will be holding talks with.

SPD BEZIRK CONGRESS OPPOSES MORE MISSILES

LD142150 Hamburg DPA in German 1638 GMT 14 Feb 82

[Text] Paderborn, 14 Feb (DPA) -- The SPD Bezirk Eastern Westphalia-Lippe has spoken out against stationing additional missiles in Europe. After hours of controversial discussions a resolution to this effect was passed with a majority of 139 to 124 delegate votes at a Bezirk party congress on Sunday afternoon in Paderborn. The party congress calls on the Federal Government to use its influence at talks between the superpowers to secure the non-stationing and the dismantlement of the Soviet SS-20's. The delegates also demanded a stop to all preparations for stationing the controversial missiles in the Federal Republic.

CORPORATION SEEKS NEW BUSINESS IN MOSCOW

[Text] Moscow, 15 Feb -- A top-notch delegation of the Salzgitter Corporation has been negotiating on new business with the East in Moscow since Monday. The delegation is headed by Salzgitter President Ernst Pieper. Other members of the delegation, which will conduct talks in Moscow and Leningrad, include the Chairman of the Salzgitter Supervisory Board, Parliamentary State Secretary Karl Haehser of the Federal Finance Ministry.

Salzgitter hopes to contract new orders in the field of chemical installations and in construction. Salzgitter has also appeared as the supplier of spiral-welded large pipes through the Estel/Salzgitter Large-Pipe Agency in Duesseldorf. An initial order for pipes dating back to July 1981 and involving 100,000 tons of large pipes will expire upon completion of deliveries in the near future.

Group Extends USSR Visit

LD162130 Hamburg DPA in German 1939 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Moscow, 16 Feb (DPA) -- Horst Schueler, executive member of the Kreditanstalt Fuer Wiederaufbau, is staying in Moscow in order to talk about further Soviet orders together with the Bonn state finance secretary, Karl Haehser, in his capacity as Chairman, Supervisory Board of Saltzgitter, and that company's president, Ernst Pieper.

German circles in Moscow said on Tuesday that these were "semiofficial contacts", which also included a journey to Leningrad. The group will attempt to prepare agreements in the fields of chemicals and construction. Over and above this, it was intended that these contacts represent a "political signal" to counter the impression that German enterprises were receiving too few orders in the wake of the recent natural gas pipeline deal.

L'HUMANITE TEXT OF MARCHAIS PCF CONGRESS REPORT

PM101237 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 4 Feb 82 pp 3, 9

[Apparent text of report by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais to the 24th PCF Congress 3 February; third and final installment]

[Text] Taking Account of the Starting Points and the International Environment

Second, it is important, in each case, to take account of the starting points and the international environment. For instance in 1913 only 6 percent of the Russian population was living in cities comprising more than 100,000 inhabitants; three-fourths of the people were illiterate; 3 percent of the children received education beyond the primary stage; some of the peoples who now form the Soviet Union had not progressed beyond the most extreme underdevelopment. At a recent meeting in support of Cuba, I described the state of that Caribbean island just 22 years ago, and the progress it has made since then. I could give many more examples, even the example of that part of Germany, which was developed, but scarred by Nazism, ravaged by war, and cut off from its natural foundations, which is now flourishing in a way recognized by all. Sixty-five years, ane even 22 years, seems a great deal in a human life. But it is a very short time when you consider the incredible innovations of the socialist undertaking. It is true that history is moving faster than in previous centuries; that is due to scientific and technical progress and to the fact that since 1917 vast people's masses have become actors on the historical stage. But time cannot be hurried to an excessive degree. It is one of the most general laws of nature and of society that nothing can be born from nothing, that the new stems from what already exists and continues to be influenced by it for a long time. Human beings are not things to be maneuvered and changed at will. It takes time to change habits and thinking to train abilities, arouse the spirit of initiative and transform human relationships. It is very difficult for a people to make the transition from Muzhik to Sputnik. Surely trying to "force the pace," to go faster than is possible and tolerable is precisely one of the causes of some problems in the socialist countries. Therefore, let us take care not to put the cart before the horse, even in our thoughts, and not to set up our particular period as a scale by which to measure historical time. This is particularly important since the results obtained have been obtained despite civil wars, despite foreign interventions or threats, despite World War II and, at the present time, despite the burden of the arms race which is caused by imperialist policy.

Imperialism Is Not Qualified To Talk of Freedom

But, you may ask, is not the building of socialism too costly from the human viewpoint? I have already said that capitalism's champions show no lack of effrontery when they weep over the fate of those workers who are building socialism, over the fate of colonized people when they break their chains, while the development of capitalism, and, today, its crisis, are accompanied everywhere by a procession of almost indescribable crimes. I must add that there is no lack of effrontery on the part of the U.S. President who was the guiding hand behind an anti-Polish television show last weekend which was as ridiculous as it was odious. That disgusting operation was a veritable fiasco. Moreover, how could it have been anything else? How could people have taken seriously the series of declamations on human rights proferred by Reagan, the representative of the U.S. imperialism of apocalypse now, which laid waste to Vietnam, killing 2 million of its sons and daughters and dropping on that country twice as many bombs as were dropped on all the countries involved in World War II, using napalm and defoliants to destroy almost half of its crops and forests; of that U.S. imperialism which today is still continuing to massacre people in El Salvador, Guatemala and Haiti, and to support all the world's dictatorships and corrupt regimes?

And who stood beside Reagan as he intoned his hymn to freedom? Margaret Thatcher, who murdered Bobby Sands and his Irish comrades; a spokesman for the fascist General Evren, the Turkish people's oppressor whose crimes were highlighted once again a few days ago by the heart-rending report of the young woman who revealed that she had been tortured for days and raped in the presence of her husband because she was suspected of being a communist.

In view of such cynicism, impudence and hypocrisy, I say to those jewels of capitalism; "No, madam and gentlemen, it is certainly not for you to talk of freedom!" Of course all this cannot exempt us from an examination of the situation in the socialist countries in the light of this question.

The Building of Socialism Is a Long Process

First let us point out that socialist countries are not the hell people would have us believe. Our clear attitude toward any attack on freedoms in socialist countries, the expression of our disagreement with our comrades on that subject do not and will never lead us to draw an apocalyptic caricature which is based solely on this following idea; anything rather than socialism. Let us make it clear that anything means capitalism, imperialism, colonial exploitation, overexploitation of the workers, the crisis, lack of prospects. Let us go further. The mistakes and errors, however tragic they might be, certainly do not mean that there is an inevitable "social cost," a price to be paid for building socialism. These mistakes and errors are not in the nature of socialism. Quite the reverse, as we have already said, they constitute a handicap for it. That is the fundamental difference between capitalism and socialism. We also reject the idea that socialism is only suitable for backward countries which need to be industrialized by forced marches. It is true that for countries suffering from underdevelopment the future belongs to those who, each in his own way, are aiming, or will aim, for socialism. But all examples, starting from Soviet history, prove that economic, cultural and political backwardness and underdevelopment make the necessary building of socialism even more difficult, and provide a heavy and lasting burden. The inevitable delays should in no way allow us -- quite the reverse -- to lose sight of the fact that socialism is only fully meaningful if it is used to solve the everyday problems of the workers and the people as quickly as possible, from year to year, if it brings them increasing numbers of practical improvements which move toward justice, well-being and progress as quickly as possible. The better the starting point, the easier that is.

All that prevents us from making simplistic judgements. Socialism is being built and is developing in various countries. For a people like ours this demonstrates that socialism is possible and that it brings people a great deal. But nonetheless, the level of production, productivity, the quality of work, the standard of living and certain aspects of social relations prevent us from saying: "That is your own future, you just have to copy it." Why, then, should we fix stages. Why, for instance, should existing socialism be described as "developed socialism," when socialism everywhere is in the process of being built, when the socialist countries are developed to varying degrees and when a long process is involved in all cases? Having asked that, there is absolutely no justification for saying that the peoples who are building socialism are stagnating, incapable of progressing, powerless to solve their present problems by their own efforts and in their way. That is an obviously ridiculous argument as soon as you take it to its logical conclusion: Indeed were those peoples wrong to take this course and should they go back to capitalism?

I would like to add that we are in no position to dictate to the peoples who are building socialism. No cause in the world has aroused so much tenacity, loyalty, and determination than they have shown in carrying out and continuing their revolutions. We have confidence in those peoples' energy, intelligence and sense of responsibility.

The Problems Posed in Socialist Societies Today

It is a fact that socialist countries are today confronting difficulties which are no mere relics of old errors. They result, on the one hand, from the problems of their international environment, particularly the repercussions of the capitalist crisis. But they also arise from contradictions caused by the internal development of these socialist societies themselves. These problems emerge, moreover, in different forms in different countries: They are not the same in Romania and Yugoslavia, in Vietnam and the Soviet Union, in China and Poland. So it is essential for these countries to scale new heights on the basis of the transformations and gains which they have accumulated.

This presupposes that these societies face up to the central question of the democratization of social, economic and political life, which our 23d congress described as the universal demand inherent in socialism.

Does this mean that there is no democracy in those countries and that this is the source of all the trouble? No, we believe -- as I have said -- that socialist societies have gains and opportunities which enable them to develop the full range of individual and collective freedoms, economic and social rights, rights to culture and education and various aspects of the people's sovereignty and of participation. This undoubtedly presupposes profound, tenacious efforts.

But, as important as this is, we do not confine ourselves to this one dimension in our view of the problems facing socialist societies today. These societies, it seems to us, must respond to a triple challenge: mastering economic efficiency, ensuring social progress and developing democratic participation. For them, it is a question of ensuring a better relationship between the urgent needs of production, the satisfaction of diverse social needs and the aspiration to participation by the broadest sectors of society. They must make the adaptations required by, for instance, a new kind of growth and the persistence of outmoded economic outlooks, overall planning and the call for initiative from the bottom, good control of overall production and democratic management, the harmonization of collective needs and individual aspirations and the adaptation of participation structures to the cultural level of the population. Much will depend on how these questions are answered in the socialist countries. We are convinced that by finding solutions to the problems facing them, those countries will experience new development. From now on we will follow with interest the research and innovations which are in progress in many socialist countries under very diverse forms.

Our Attitude Toward Poland

Conversely, where these necessary adaptations are not brought into play in good time, they may meet with situations involving obstruction, tension and crisis. This is the case in Poland. I recall how in Summer 1980 we expressed our sympathy for the efforts being made in that country with a view to overcoming the grave errors of the past and developing socialism. In doing this we stressed the link which exists between social progress, economic efficiency and the deepening of democracy. Difficulties and exacerbations trammeled this process. We regret this bitterly. In mid-December Poland underwent exceptional measures involving the suspension of basic freedoms, arrests, internments and deaths -- facts which have been shattering for us, who are so deeply attached to socialist Poland. Our attitude was in no way to favor internal confrontation or the internationalization of the conflict, while hoping for the speediest possible implementation of the elements of a peaceful, democratic outcome promoting national concord and the implementation of the economic, social and democratic reforms necessary to socialism's advance.

Life tends to confirm that our stance was correct and reasonable. This emerges, in particular, from the answer from Comrade Jaruzelski, secretary of the PZPR, to the letter I sent him on 23 December on behalf of our party's politburo.

The Class Struggle Is Worldwide

In the discussion forum one comrade wrote: "The enemy is trying to make us rid ourselves of the 'burden' of the socialist countries by purely and simply forgetting about them, which would certainly be a giant stride for the idea -- such a great stake in the class struggle -- that socialism does not exist or is only an impossible dream." That comrade is right.

Whether people like it or not, the class struggle is worldwide. In this struggle the socialist countries play an essential part. Through their weight and influence in the world they prevent the warmongers from resorting to a nuclear adventure. They have -- not without difficulty -- ensured the establishment of relations of peaceful coexistence in international relations. They are a guarantee of peace. At the same time the peoples have everything to gain from the development of cooperation and economic, trade, scientific and cultural exchanges with them. Finally, they are a prop for liberation struggles throughout the world, and in particular for national liberation struggles.

Our own strategy has a foundation in world reality, in the change which has taken place in the correlation of forces in favor of socialism, independence and peace. To forget this and seek to isolate our struggle from that of other forces in the world which are opposed to capitalism and for socialism would be suicidal.

For all that, there is nothing unconditional about our attitude of solidarity with the fraternal parties in power. We reserve and intend to reserve for the future our right to criticize. Fundamental differences may exist between us. These differences are recognized, as the important joint declaration of January 1980 between our party and the CPSU stressed. We say what we have to say, as a responsible party, in the course of calm debates, without having the least desire to impose our policy as a "model" or to preach to anyone.

Solidarity With Communist Parties in Capitalist Countries

/Our solidarity also goes out to communist parties in capitalist countries./ Over and above the very real national diversity, these countries are in crisis. This crisis means simultaneous economic recession, industrial collapse, social regression, authoritarianism and, part of the same process, a growing rejection of social and political consensus, the questioning of models of collaboration between classes and the joint struggles against austerity and unemployment and for democratic and social renewal. A link is becoming increasingly firmly established between these struggles and those which are opposed to the escalation of the arms race. The mighty wave of demonstrations against plans for installing new NATO nuclear missiles in Western Europe and for disarmament is the dominant feature of the period we live in.

We reaffirm the importance of class solidarity uniting European working class forces and of the convergence of the struggles of European working people for social progress, peace and cooperation. Within this framework we place great value on our solidarity with communist parties, which is an essential component and condition of the success of the class struggle. We rejoice in the positive evolution of our relations with communist parties in general -- with those revolutionary parties which have an irreplaceable role to play in winning the class battle and with which we share a common history, struggles and objectives. Our relations are doing more and more to take into account the diverse conditions in which we are all acting. This diversity reflects the specific features of each country, its history, traditions, level of development, needs. It is, to us, a beneficial factor indicating a closer adaptation of national realities, imbued with rich opportunities, original practices, new thoughts based on concrete conditions, on the changes which are taking place in each country and on an international plane.

The diversity of experience of the struggle, far from leading to the isolation of our fight, helps to strengthen the influence of revolutionary ideas and reciprocal solidarity on clear foundations. It makes it possible to define important common goals and seek flexible, operational forms of joint action in order to pursue these goals.

Eurocommunism

Eurocommunism has been described as the convergent progress of several communist parties in capitalist countries, including our own. It is essentially a matter of seeking routes to socialism which accord with the conditions, traditions, needs and aspirations of each of our countries, as well as with the new conditions of the correlation of forces, the experience of the revolutionary movement in all countries and all contemporary changes in general. All these changes and developments constantly strengthen the democratic demand which is inherent in socialism.

As this report shows, the democratic path toward democratic socialism is more than ever ours. We remain deeply attached to this quest. Of course, there has hever been any question of replacing one center of the communist movement by another, albeit regional. This form of relations between parties is out of date. For us, Eurocommunism is one expression of the increasing diversity of the world revolutionary movement. It introduces an enriching element. But this diversity can in no case be identified with division, in our view. On the contrary, we tend toward solidarity by seeking every possible convergence in everyone's independence and originality. Attentive as we are to the possibilities for France and the part of the world in which we live, and important as the processes of socialist transformation may be, we see no reason to believe that Western Europe could set itself up as a "model" for world revolution.

The New Internationalism To Suit Our Times

That is indeed the crux of a long-range strategic question. Revolution develops simultaneously as a very varied range of national phenomena and as a world transformation. That is why, as I have recalled, we reject the concept of a world where some people align themselves more or less on one center and others on another center.

Thought and experimentation on the paths of socialism, on building and developing it, are being extended and enlarged. This is happening not only in Europe, but on other continents too, not only in capitalist countries, but in socialist countries too. Good. That pleases us, for this can only enrich and strengthen the struggle for socialism. In this world outlook, as I have shown in the book "Hope Now," [Espoir an Present] international solidarity assumes its broadest dimensions. We consider it useful for solidarity to develop not only with all communist parties, but also with all forces working toward democracy, peace and national and human liberation. This is the new internationalism to suit our time.

Different views exist in the form of the disagreements between communist parties in the world on particular issues. That is only natural. Progress has been made toward the frank and open acknowledgement of these differences and the calm discussion of them in the desire to avoid making them an obstacle to joint action. Acknowledgement of differences and strengthening of reciprocol solidarity go hand-in-hand.

Solidarity With All Anti-Imperialist Forces

/Our solidarity also goes out to all anti-imperialist forces./ It goes out to progressive parties in power, with whom we have deepened our cooperation. With great diversity of forms these parties seek to build a new society of justice and dignity. They are facing many difficulties, the problems of underdevelopment and backwardness inherited from colonialism, imperialist pressures and discrimination. More often than not they are following noncapitalist paths, and some aspire to laying the foundations of a socialist society.

Our solidarity goes out to the peoples of countries still under colonial domination, where the will for national liberation is so strongly expressed; to all forces fighting for their country's economic and social liberation, in Africa, Asia or Latin America. We are in solidarity with revolutionary and progressive parties and movements which undertake these struggles. They use most diverse routes, for instance by combining the mass struggle with the armed struggle. It is up to the people concerned, and them alone, to choose the forms of struggle best suited to their traditions and national conditions. They are assured of our support. We are glad to see the recent confirmation both of these people's part in the liberation struggle on an international scale and of the increasing convergence of interests and actions of revolutionary forces taking part in the movement of national, social and human liberation which characterize our era. This fact is of great significance. It opens up new prospects for the world class struggle.

Reflecting the changing world, the nonaligned movement, which unites about 100 states, expresses their peoples' desire to live in sovereignty, to chose their own path of development, to control their own national wealth and to establish more just international relations. Over and above the diverse political orientations which characterize the member countries, an increasing anti-imperialist orientation is emerging from the movement.

Finally, our party is prepared to give concrete form to all the possibilities for joint action with socialist and social democratic parties, particularly in Europe, for aims which accord with the interests of the peoples concerned, in particular for peace and disarmament. The same concern is behind our attitude toward forces representing Christian circles.

Mankind Is On the March.

Sixty-five years ago, "10 days shook the world."

Since then, it is true, mankind has passed through many dramas, experienced catastrophes, marked time, suffered setbacks. Many perils have still not been definitively removed. Even in the countries which have embarked on the path of socialism there are still many problems to solve.

But mankind is on the march. The way in which this march will proceed cannot be foreseen in detail. Without any doubt, the forces of capitalism will exploit all the means of intimidation and repression left them in order to defend themselves. There is no doubt that they will continue to brandish all manner of bugaboos so as to prevent the future from taking shape. Perhaps, too, in the extreme complexity and difficulty of the march ahead, the peoples themselves will still be groping their way forward and committing errors. Perhaps the forces which, around the world, have the same interests and the same hopes at heart will not always be able to unite as rapidly and as well as they should.

Whatever happens, there will be no miracles. Did not Karl Marx write, after the Paris commune: "The working class did not hope for miracles from the commune. It has no ready-made utopias to introduce by popular decree. It knows that to bring about its own emancipation and, with it, that higher form of life toward which present society is inexorably striving by its very economic structure, it will have to endure long struggles and a whole series of historic processes which will completely transform circumstances and men." And he added: "The working class can content itself with smiling at the vulgar invective of the hack writers and at the sententious patronage of well-intentioned bourgeois theoreticians who utter their ignorant platitudes and their sectarian mutterings in a tone of scientific infallibility."

We Are Living in the Epoch of Revolutions.

This rational optimism is being borne out. Despite everything, mankind's onward march attests to revolutionary progress in the 20th century. Revolutionary progress in the fact that for the first time since prehistoric times, the human race can prevent war for all time. Revolutionary progress in social relationships which make increasingly intolerable the subordination of the activity of all to the profit of a few, the old division of labor all the segregations directed against the peoples and against the young, the monopoly of knowledge and decisions in the hands of minorities. In short, with socialism in the vanguard, this progress takes the form of a tendency toward the ending of all exploitation and all servitude.

Revolutionary progress means the women's movement for equality. And again revolutionary progress means progress in science and technology. Revolutionary progress, finally, is what is taking shape in international relations in a world where the demand for a new order founded on justice, independence, solidarity and democracy is growing.

Yes, mankind is on the march. Yes, we are living in the age of revolution. Nobody knows exactly what mankind's complexion will be like in 100 or 200 years. Suffice it to extrapolate from the trend now begun and two things are certain: provided peace is ensured, mankind will have pushed forward the frontiers of knowledge and it will have been able to provide a broader application of the noble principles of liberty, equality and fraternity for all men and all peoples.

I am certain that many men and women and most of the young people in our country are asking themselves these major questions. Caught up in the crisis, troubled by the number and difficulty of problems and stuck by the incessant browbeating which pushes them toward skepticism, they wonder if they are not living a tale which is "diotic, full of sound and fury." It is to these people, all of them, men and women, that I am addressing on behalf of the French communists when I say: "The revolution is a whole historic period, longer no doubt than Lenin's associates and the founders of our party at the Congress of Tours supposed. But the direction of the 20th century is in no doubt; the world has started moving and is moving in the right direction. There are immense hopes. Much depends on you. The action of each and every one of you can only hasten and ensure the onward march. This world which is advancing needs you: Advance with it, yourselves: You will meet us in this fight."

In order to satisfy the hopes of the French people in advancing along the path of socialism, we must not simply set ourselves this objective. We must provide ourselves with the means to achieve it. For this we need an appropriate tool. The PCF does not claim for itself an exclusive aspiration toward socialism. We know that there are neither reserved seats nor private hunting grounds in the fight for change. There are only responsibilities to be shouldered. We shoulder and will continue to shoulder our responsibilities, these being incumbent on a party which knows now and in the future how to remain loyal to the revolutionary choice of 1920 in the midst of extremely complex circumstances. We do so first because we group together men and women who come from the most varied social milieus, in a word: from the whole world of labor. Our members and the leaders they give themselves at all levels constitute a unique synthesis of working France, thinking France, the France which produces and invents and which is preparing its future right now.

What distinguishes a PCF member from another inhabitant of France? Nothing in particular in terms of everyday life, difficulties, needs and hopes. We are men and women like the vast majority of others. We live among them and in the same way as they do, whatever the tasks entrusted to us. What is probably our prime characteristic is sensitivity to all the problems of the world of labor, a profound knowledge of questions of social life, and the experience and ability to know and defend the interests of the people. Yes, the Communist Party is and will always be the party of working men and women, the party of all the exploited, all the oppressed, the party of all those who want to abolish exploitation and oppression in all its forms.

The Direction of the Communist Action.

We are asked sometimes: "But, what makes the communists tick"? It is not -- and all our history proves this -- either personal ambition or the lure of gain. It is the desire to be and the awareness of being useful. It is the determination to transform society in the direction of justice and liberty, peace and the national interest. Yes, the communists have an ideal. They devote themselves to it passionately. That is why they act, struggle and work in earnest, drawing on their time and their rest. To be an activist means, for communists, not being content to vote periodically or participate episodically -- however important that is -- in actions. To be an activist is to take one's fate in hands and call on one's companions, colleagues and neighbors to do likewise. This commitment enriches and ennobles one's personal life. This is why, despite the efforts its requires, being an activist brings one joy and develops friendships and a deep fraternity. Even though failures hurt communists as any creature with nerves and a heart, their tenacity and militancy do not give way under the weight of events; one can count on these volunteers of hope during the worst difficulties just as during the good times.

It is precisely against this party, against its ability to incarnate the future -- albeit while acknowledging its lags and correcting its faults, as we are endeavoring to do at this moment -- it is against our innovative strategy that the big bosses and all the enemies of change are focusing all their blows. Well, to every man and woman who is wondering, I say: "Don't believe the hateful caricature that is being drawn of us and our policy. See us as we are and not as we are portrayed by our opponents, who are also your opponents. The PCF is not perfect; witness the efforts we are making here to improve ourselves. But rest assured, it benefits from being known at first hand aong with its policy and action as they actually are. It is a party which is indispensable for making the new human world which is knocking on the door of history part of French reality."

The Enterprise, Our First Battlefield

Since the basic confrontation of our time is between the people and capital, our first battlefield is the enterprise. After all, it is in the enterprise that the bosses extract their profits and maintain their privileges by bringing new forms of exploitation into play.

It is within the enterprise that they seek to treat men and women as docile subjects, pawns, not citizens. It is in the enterprise that they seek to preserve -- even if they use new forms to do so -- the burden of the old ways of thinking, outmoded hierarchies, or the gulf between mental and physical labor.

But conversely, the enterprise can and must become a base for social progress. From now on it will occupy a central place in the country's life. It is at the enterprise that millions of men and women, French and immigrant, can unite to struggle against the crisis. It is there that the majority of the nation's vital forces are gathered together in all their diversity -- from the apprentice and the skilled worker to the engineer and the research worker, through all professional workers, employees, technicians and cadres. It is there that scientific and technological change demands the implementation of new forms of design production and cooperation. In short, the enterprise should become, for society as a whole, the source of a more vital democracy, the example and the breeding ground of self-management.

All the country's political and social forces have understood this major stake today. They are all striving to conduct the political struggle, the struggle of ideas within the enterprise. This is particularly true of the bosses, whose figurehead, the National Council of French Employers, has defined itself as the "party of the enterprise" and has allotted itself considerable funds for carrying out this function.

The Primordial Importance of the Enterprise Cell

This only serves to highlight our new responsibilities. As the draft resolution says, "The prime target of the whole party must be to wage the battle at the enterprise and to win it." Everything urges us to pay much attention to the party's life and activity at the enterprise. Not only as a ritual reaffirmation, but in actual deeds. The draft resolution notes a perceptible weakening of our work in enterprises and the loss of several hundred cells. This retreat is all the more detrimental in that our strategy for a democratic advance toward socialism places the action of our enterprise cells in the forefront. It is, indeed, in the activity of the enterprise cell that it is easiest to feel the beating heart of the world of labor in all its diversity, that we can learn about problems and aspirations, that we can perceive the current transformations. It is through the activity of the enterprise cell that we can cast light most clearly on the class content of demands, take part in struggles and demonstrate the importance of the successes achieved, while indicating their limits and the means needed to make further progress.

It is through the activity of the enterprise cell that we can best refute the daily lies put about by the bosses and the media and reject the ideas of fatalism, resignation or class collaboration. It is through the activity of the enterprise cell that we can best bring about simultaneous progress in the gaining of new rights and powers and in the working people's consciousness. It is through that activity that we can help to build up their desire to participate fully in decisions. It is through the activity of the enterprise cell that we can best give an overall perspective to the struggles, make the demand for socialism grow from now on and link social struggles and electoral choice closely.

In a word, the activity of the enterprise cell plays an indispensable part in changing, from day-to-day, the correlation of forces between the people's movement and capital. The party as a whole must draw its conclusions from this: An upsurge in our influence and democratic progress toward socialism depend on the new political practice which we can implement at enterprises.

Communists and the Trade Union Movement

Of course, it is at the same time necessary to strengthen communists' activity within the trade union organization.

As we stressed in the 1979 document to which I have already referred that our party is glad that the independent trade union movement is today in the forefront of the nation's life. We are all the more glad that the most important of the trade union organizations, the CGT, has, in the course of its history, developed "special relations" with our party. This is "for the basic reasons that the two organizations are based on the same class ground." We will spare no efforts to ensure that "constructive relations based on mutual respect and reciprocal trust" continue to deepen and grow richer. Communists belonging to the CGT must step up their activity, while respecting its program and statutes. They must assume the responsibilities merited by their experience, dynamism and devotion and participate effectively in the success of its initiatives.

In more general terms, we want to maintain fruitful relations with all representative trade union organizations, without concealing the affinities, differences or disagreements which exist, but with mutual respect for the nature and independence of each. Having said that, it is really necessary -- to use an expression current among sportsmen -- to "change gears" in party work at enterprises.

Giving a New Dimension, New Style to Our Mass Work

We have to deploy our innovative strategy in a situation which is without precedent for the vast majority of communists. It is, in effect, necessary to make the transition from the practice acquired during long experience of opposition to that of a government party and a full participant in the majority. In these conditions, as I said at the 4 December Central Committee meeting which I mentioned earlier, "There is no cause for surprise if hesitations, uncertainties, even clumsiness are noted here or there. We are in a period of apprenticeship (...) and we are all learning now, from the party cell to the Central Committee." We do not have an a priori formula, no all-purpose plan, no mold. We have to innovate, to leave the beaten track and boldly suggest solutions to the country's problems. These questions have already been the subject of a major debate during preparations for the congress. This quest must be pursued by constantly comparing ideas, suggestions and experience. Here more than in anything else, what counts is not talk, but actions. We all, from top to bottom, have much to do and much to learn.

I have shown that we want to build socialism by a majority movement of our people. So we must give a new dimension, new style to our mass work and improve the quality of our relations with all the working people. We do not want to "hassle" the people's movement or give it orders. On the contrary, we want to persuade, while knowing how to listen. We want to decide and carry out with people, not to act in their stead. To step up our relations with the working people, with all our people, to organize struggles in all fields, rallying as many people as possible, first in order to obtain concrete, tangible, palpable results and at the same time to promote experience and awareness: for us, that is what playing a vanguard role means today.

This means that every party organization, every leader and every communist is faced with a demand which is without any real precedent, at least on this scale: to take the necessary initiative where and when it is necessary, without waiting for a directive "from above." In practice, to make progress, that is the main question.

Our Relations With the Life of Associations

Naturally -- mutatis mutandis -- just as our activity requires fair relations with trade unions, it also needs just relations with the mass movement in all its forms, in particular with the life of associations. In fact, we regard as a valuable peculiarity of the French nation the development of a great diversity of family, social, women's, cultural, sporting and other movements. These movements are a characteristic feature of our country's pluralist democratic life. They enable millions of people to participate autonomously on the basis of the most diverse concerns.

Today the life of associations is undergoing a new upsurge, finding new expression. We wish to develop our relations with it on the basis of mutual respect for the independence and the violation of each and freedom of assessment and criticism. We welcome all meetings, studies, exchanges, convergences. In this spirit we call on communists to maintain a greater presence and be more active within the life of associations.

Progress in Our Ideas, Developing Our Press

As well as being a party of action, we must be a party of information, explanation, communication. Explaining what we want and how we want to achieve it, saying this in a simple but not simplistic way, frankly but not brutally, knowing how to argue, listen, conduct dialogue, persuade -- this is work which we must carry out tirelessly, using all possible channels: those of propaganda, the media and our own press. In our activity, to promote our ideas, we must strive to discuss the real problems, to listen to people's worries while arousing people's attention and providing information and knowledge on facts or ideas which are not known or are distorted. Let us learn to react quickly to the situation. Let us launch new ideas ourselves. Let us make people think. Let us beware of ready-made, over-generalized formulas. And let us never lose sight of the fact that there is no better kind of propaganda than that which results from a direct account, live discussion at work or at home, coming directly to grips with worries and struggles.

Wherever ideas are circulating our ideas must circulate. The battle to obtain pluralism in information and to ensure our party's presence on radio, television, and in the regional press is an essential democratic battle. At the same time we need to develop our press. The communist press is a press of truth: It makes no secret of being committed to the interests it serves, those of the people and the nation. It is a fighting press which reflects and nourishes the people's struggles. It is also an educative press which expresses the whole of our policy. And it is an instrument of constant training, an irreplaceable means of exchanging experiences in the party. Reading our press is essential for each communist's freedom of judgment and action.

The revolutionary press requires revolutionary support. Even if, as democracy requires, improvements are obtained in favor of the public press, all our newspapers, especially L'HUMANITE and L'HUMANITE DIMANCHE still need and will continue to need militant support. Now, despite major progress made over the past 2 years we have not attained the level required by the present situation. Our efforts must also be directed to the distribution of our weekly, REVOLUTION, in order to give it a greater place in the country's political, ideological and cultural life.

A More Sustained Effort for Educating and Informing Communists

In order to create the conditions for a greater capacity for initiative in the party, we must also look after the education of all communists, a better circulation of information and critical exchange of experiences and ideas -- in a word, we must see to a particular intellectual activity of the party which is the fruit of its collective richness. The intellectual activity of the party is also the progress of our theory. In a rich dialogue between researcheers, devoid of any "imprimatur" and any official decree, the Institute for Marxist Research has laid the foundations to enable the rapid advance of scientific socialism which is called for by our strategy, by the progress in our revolutionary comprehension of reality and by the new questions posed by the social transformations. We intend to continue in this direction.

It is all the more necessary since the changes which I have mentioned in this report have not been completed but still continue. In the same spirit -- it is a legitimate demand formulated by numerous communists during the preparations for the congress -- it is fitting to improve and deploy all our potential in the matter of the political and theoretical education of communists. Otherwise, how could they face up to all the complexity of the social movement today?

Our strategy needs a party of a still higher ideological and political standard. This depends, of course, on the personal and irreplaceable responsibility of every communist. But that also implies a much more sustained and systematic effort by the party leadership at all levels.

The Democratic Life of the Party

One of the distinctive revolutionary features of our party is its organization. This ensures effective action for the party, not in the sense that it would form a solid block like reinforced concrete, but because it allows all communists to participate -- in all the diversity of their individual personalities -- in all the aspects of policy-making and action. Of course, in the communist party, once a decision is taken, everyone pulls in the same direction. It must be understood how this happens.

First, the discussion is completely free. The preparation for this congress has just furnished proof of this. I know of no other party which has broader, more realistic or freer discussion within its ranks. Then, the decision is taken democratically, by a majority vote. Each person can keep his own opinion, his judgment or even his doubts or disagreements. But the majority decision has the force of law for everybody's action, as democracy requires. Finally, officials at all levels are elected by a majority vote according to procedures which ensure that controls and the nomination of candidates are as democratic as possible.

That is merely a very simplified summary of what is termed democratic centralism which constitutes the organizational principle to which we are and will remain fundamentally committed. This summary is a particularly simple one because the changes made in our rules by our 23d congress explained this democratic practice in even greater detail and defined new means of ensuring each communist's participation in party policy. For instance, to take just these examples, we have convened the party's National Council twice: on the crucial questions of the enterprises and the intellectuals. In the latter case we organized a preparatory discussion forum in L'HUMANITE. We intend to pursue that course.

Of course we do not, and never will, confuse free discussion, collective drafting and the democratic election of leaderships with artificial chit-chat, the manipulation of "leaders," secret deals, the reduction of members to the role of "hangers-on," and the crystallization of positions which makes debate impossible. That is why we reject the formation of factions or tendencies within the party. This is primarily a question of democracy: It ensures that the action decided upon by the majority at the end of a discussion will be implemented by all. It is also a question of efficiency and of loyalty to the people. It ensures that our party has only one policy and one voice.

This democratic life of our party has already progressed. We want to develop it further, but we are already certain of one thing: Our party does not fear comparison with what is seen elsewhere. It is for that very reason that the bourgeoisie and its media talk in apocalyptic terms in order to distort it.

Strengthening Our Party and the Communist Youth Movement

But try as they may, there is one fact against which they can do nothing. It is this incomparable force: I mean the 710,000 communists and their 27,500 cells. Today the future depends more than ever on these men, women and young people. One of the leaderships' essential tasks and one aspect of democratic centralism is to be constantly concerned with the activity of all the cells in which their grassroots work is carried out. They must do that not in order to hand out praise or criticism but to give each communist practical help in implementing our policy in a creative way. Of course that activity should be aimed at swelling the party's ranks. The record for the end of 1981 is good. With more than 710,000 members, the party has reached its highest membership since the liberation. But our strategic choices lead us to step up our efforts in this sphere. I must add that the situation opened up by the leftwing victory and the communists' participation in government give us new possibilities.

We must actually convince the millions of men, women and young people who took up our people's great hope as their own last spring that it is among us that they will really be able to act to realize that hope.

We must also ensure the expansion of the French Communist Youth Movement. As the main channel of communist youth activity, it constitutes a very rich potential of devotion and initiative, close to the lives of young people, their concerns and their hopes. In the past 2 years, with the party's determined support, it has strengthened its organization. Its 1,000 circles, in working class districts, secondary schools, and universities constitute a valuable achievement. They are centers of effective and original struggles, of action decided by the young people themselves, and also joyful places in which to meet and exchange ideas. This effort must be pursued and new circles formed in order to help young people to take part in the great debates of our time and to determine their future themselves.

Yes, Building

Comrades, our congress is taking place under this slogan: "Building a French Brand of Socialism." The poster which proclaims this to all the French people is inspired by the painting by Fernand Leger [French cubist painter], "The Builders."

Yes, building. We have confidence in mankind which is marching, through countless sufferings and joys, toward forms of material and spiritual life which we can only partly glimpse because we are still powerless to imagine their full revolutionary scope. We want to unite all our people's vital forces so that they can be given the most just, secure and free socialist society which corresponds to their needs in our time. We will not rest until we have helped to give France, our nation, a new, peaceful, noble and just greatness. We want to be practical, efficient and responsible builders constantly improving and satisfying each aspiration and each need which springs up among the people. Yes, we are builders and the edifice on which we are working is a French brand of socialism.

LEMOINE, DELEGATION ATTEND WEU SYMPOSIUM

[Text] London -- The French Government has surprised and even slightly irritated its partners by sending Mr Georges Lemoine, secretary of state at the Ministry of Defense, accompanied by a large delegation, to the Western European Union [WEU] Symposium on International Aeronautical Consortiums which opened in London on Tuesday, 9 February. (Footnote: The WEU was formed in 1955 and its members are the FRG, Belgium, France, Great Britain, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.) By making this gesture the government wanted to show its special interest in the WEU, "just about the only political and legal organization," Mr Lemoine said, "enabling us Europeans to discuss problems of defense, armaments and security among ourselves." The secretary of state thus went back to the theme of his 1 December speech to the WEU assembly (LE MONDE of 3 December).

For Mr Lemoine, wanting to end Europe's technological dependence on the United States is not contrary to the objectives of the Atlantic alliance. The technological breaking up of Europe "provoking the discouragement of manufacturers and the demobilization of enterprises would lead to a weakening of the defense capacity of the alliance as a whole, and would be contrary to higher U.S. interests and also to the very profound interests of our old Europe," the secretary of state said. Mr Lemoine also stressed the need not to allow "little" European states to believe that only the United States is in a position to meet their arms requirements. France, he said, is behind those countries "which are asking the 'big' Europeans to transfer a minimum of technology to help them with their developing industry."

FOREIGN MINISTER COLOMBO DEPARTS FOR U.S. 16 FEB

LD161850 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Minister of Foreign Affairs Emilio Colombo has left for the United States. He is scheduled to meet in New York tomorrow with the new United Nations secretary general, Perez de Cuellar. On Thursday, 18 February Colombo will be giving a talk at Georgetown University in Washington on "The Present State of Euroamerican Relations."

PCI'S NATTA ON GROWING RIFT WITH CPSU

PM121221 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 28 Jan 82 p 3

[Alberto Stabile interview with PCI Directorate Member Alessandro Natta: "Now Things Have Gone Too Far, but We Did Not Applaud Moscow in 1956 Either"]

[Excerpt] Rome -- [Question] Deputy Natta, will there be an Italian communist delegation at Suslov's funeral?

[Answer] I do not believe so. It does not seem to me that any special character has been given to the funeral. In any case we have not received any invitation or any other communication. We sent a condolence telegram on our own initiative....

[Question] In your message you recall the Suslov who built Soviet society. But what is your verdict on Suslov's role in the development of what you have called the USSR's "power politics?"

[Answer] Since it does not seem to me that there has been any dialectic within the Soviet leadership group, I must assume that Suslov's role in the decisions taken by the CPSU's leadership bodies, in foreign policy actions, was that of someone who shared responsibility for them. There is no doubt that people are better acquainted with Suslov's role in the leadership of the Soviet state and particularly in its ideological orientation, as custodian of that line. So he was of considerable importance in the support and defense of the principles that we are now challenging.

[Question] Which, for instance?

[Answer] It is enough to cite the assertion of a single model of socialist society with all that this has entailed in the conception of relations among communist parties -- that is, the idea that there must be a center of inspiration, a leading party, a seat of orthodoxy to whose guidelines the other communist parties must submit. I believe he also played a role in the construction and contraction of Marx' thought, which we believe has been reduced to a dogmatic schema, a kind of ideological credo.

[Question] In a speech to the last Polish Communist Party Congress, the Soviet ideologue said: "The increasing danger posed by social-reformism, by rightwing revisionism and by opportunism which, while preaching a human and democratic form of socialism, seek to overshadow really existing socialism, must be combated without quarter and with the utmost vigor." It seems to me that this remark could now be addressed directly to you.

[Answer] It is one of those assertions that we absolutely cannot agree with and that motivate our latest critical assessment. What does revisionism mean? Every verdict conceals the facts.

Even the quest for their own path to socialism carried out by the Yugoslavs was labeled "revisionism." It is the same approach on which the PRAVDA article is based: An apodictic assertion followed by a conclusion, such as: "The USSR is the center of socialism; if you agree, all right; if you criticize it, you are out." Our first aim was to combat this attitude. So much for sermons: We believe that a commitment must be made to the quest for a more democratic form of socialism, and the events in Poland confirm us in this decision.

[Question] Why, many people are wondering, did the break between the PCI and the CPSU take place now and not in 1956, when some Italian communists did revolt against Moscow's hegemony?

[Answer] This question of historical processes is a major one. For one thing, I believe that the present turning point is a development of the approach laid down by our eighth congress. Since then we have never had any lapses or backtracking in our line, and I am thinking of the period of research that began in 1956, our intervention in the China-USSR polemic, the Yalta memorandum and so forth. But why now? Because this time things have gone too far and because what has happened in Poland is of such importance (its historical and political causes are so profound) that our assessment could not fail to embrace an entire phase of history and the experience of the Soviet Union itself.

[Question] At that time, following the events in Hungary, many party members were forced to leave a party which, instead of proceeding with criticisms of the USSR, preferred to close in on itself. Can it now be said that those members were right?

[Answer] I am not sure. I am not saying that those who disagreed at that time were wrong to do so or were completely mistaken. I believe that our stance was misunderstood. It was no approval or uncritical support or an act of pure and simple obedience. I say that the stance expressed as "acknowledgement of a painful necessity" stemmed from a profound and turbulent analysis which already embodied some elements of our present assessments.

[Question] Your critique of the USSR includes, on the one hand, mention of the innovative thrust that emerged with the 20th Congress and, on the other, an underlining of the delays, slowness and regressions that eventually neutralized those innovations and even revived the "personality cult." What are the causes of this regression?

[Answer] The 20th Congress represented not only a necessary break: It also represented the enunciation of a political orientation of great importance -- and not only for the communist bloc. However, although some problems were tackled -- I am referring to the problem of the so-called restoration of socialist legality and the personality cult -- there was no thorough quest for the causes of the degenerations that brought about the events, including some bloodthirsty ones, of the Stalinist era. These shortcomings concerned the issues of relations between party and state and between party and society, the organization of society and the role of the trade union.

[Question] Precisely. We are wondering how it was possible, under the influence of a tide such as the one unleashed in Summer 1980, for one trade union to be literally dissolved and for another to emerge.

[Question] The Polish United Workers Party was virtually dissolved too.

[Answer] Indeed. And I believe that the serious point was not to have believed that the party was everything so much as to have believed that the party was merely a small cog wheel of the state, in other words, nothing. No, I do not believe that it is we who have confused Lenin's living words: The party is a political organization, not an ensemble of police stations, a machine at the service of the state.

[Question] Do you believe that the PCI's pro-Soviet wing can continue to accept these assertions, or is it not permissible to forecast an internal split?

[Answer] The presence of comrades who disagree with this line has not led to any embarrassments or circumlocutions. Indeed, we believe that the stances adopted by a very large majority at the latest Central Committee meeting can form the basis not only for a unity of intent, but also for on impetus and for vigorous action. As for the hypothesis of an internal split, which some people fear, I see no signs indicative of disassociations -- and when I say disassociations I mean outright splits.

[Question] But we have seen at the regional congresses that the grassroots are disoriented and confused, especially since the abandonment of the Soviet model...

[Answer] I do not believe that there is a belief in the PCI grassroots that the USSR is the model. There might be regard for the Soviet Union's political weight...

[Question] And maybe something more: There is an ideological bond with distant roots....

[Answer] I do not believe that this bond is on the scale of an umbilical cord that needs to be cut. There could be comrades who issue a positive verdict on this or that aspect of Soviet policy, but this is not the point on which the debate is centered: It is the opening of a new phase in the struggle for socialism.

[Question] Let us discuss the reactions of the political world. [DC Secretary] Piccoli has seemed to value your swing highly, but believes that you should strive to find your own political identity. What is your reply?

[Answer] I do not believe that we need to make any major effort in that direction. We have covered considerable ground over the years: "Third Way" and the New Internationalism are not innovations. If anything, we have put them to the test of comparison and confrontation with others. At the same time we are aware that we have also taken a very significant further step. Therefore, we must appreciate the acknowledgement and abandonment of prejudices (and preconditions) on the part of other political forces. Obviously nobody can believe that a few acknowledgments are enough to make us attenuate our opposition or alter our policy. The alternative [government proposal] is not a decision stemming from Poland: It is an option reached back in 1980.

PAJETTA CONDEMNS PRAVDA ARTICLE ATTACKING PCI

PM111635 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 25 Jan 82 pp 1-2

[Text] Rome -- "This morning I first heard of this attack by PRAVDA on The PCI. And when I say 'attack,' I wish to emphasize the significance of that term; I do not say criticism, comparison of ideas; I do not even say opposition. It is an attack which has the tone of aggression and which requires from us today a firm response, and also a thorough reflection.

With these words Giancarlo Pajetta began his concluding speech at the Lazio communists' regional congress yesterday. "I would not have wished to devote my speech predominantly to international issues," he added. "I would have preferred to talk especially about other political problems which you have raised in these 3 days of debate. But the document published by the CPSU daily -- of which I have so far only been able to read some passages -- forces me to change the speech which I prepared."

At this point Pajetta dwelt at length on the problems of the international crisis, starting from the tragic Polish events, and on the stances adopted by the Italian Communists. "We were certainly expecting a critical response from the Soviet Union following our statements and analyses," he said, "and we would have replied, as is our habit, in the frankest and clearest manner' certainly not using the language and the tone used against us by RUDE PRAVO. It is not our habit. And instead, criticisms did not arrive; this attack on the Italian Communists, filled with insults and bad faith, has arrived, the term 'sacrilege' is used. The French News Agency report which I have here before me speaks even of 'blasphemy.'

"As you can see, we are in the world of theology rather than in that of reason." The congress underlined these remarks by Pajetta with prolonged applause. The auditorium of the Atlantic movie theater was crowded. In addition to the delegates, there were hundreds of comrades taking part in this last day of debate. There was further applause from the entire auditorium whenever Pajetta reasserted the correctness and the force of the PCI's judgments and political analysis.

Pajetta continued: "In the current international situation, PRAVDA writes, the stances adopted by the Italian Communists are tantamount -- according to the passage of that article I have been able to read -- to a grave blow against the peoples' struggle for peace. According to the Soviets, it is an attempt to weaken the influence of the principal force engaged in this struggle; the force of the countries of victorious socialism. This represents -- in PRAVDA's opinion -- even direct assistance to imperialism and its attempt to weaken socialism, loosen it and undermine it ideologically. These are very grave assertions, and I also find them very sad; I feel deeply sorry, because I no longer believed it possible, following the 20th congress, that this language could be used against a communist party. At the Berlin conference, only a few years ago, we secured recognition in the final document of every communist party's right to independence and independence of judgement. We secured the inclusion in that document of a sentence which stipulated that criticizing the Soviet Union was not to be regarded as an act of anticommunism.

"Tomorrow," Pajetta added, "we will publish this PRAVDA article in full in L'UNITA. All our comrades will be able to become acquainted with that document. I believe that if the Soviet comrades had published in PRAVDA the stances adopted by our party after the Polish events and the PCI Directorate's document, perhaps it would have been more difficult for them now to use these tones, respond to the criticisms in this way and misinform to this extent the Soviet comrades and citizens, who are entitled to know what we believe before learning that their leaders do not like what we believe, and condemn and combat it so severely. In our opinion, an article like this and these actions do not help debate. In our opinion, debate is something else." There was further, very prolonged applause in the auditorium.

"Somebody has already asked me this morning," Pajetta continued, "whether we regard this PRAVDA article as an excommunication. I replied that I do not know whether excommunications are still used in the Vatican, but in any event, rest assured, there is no communist Vatican, and nobody can excommunicate us.

"We have always accustomed our comrades to debate and reflection. This time, too, they will know how to debate and reflect on the PRAVDA article. But so far I believe that I can say that the document leads us to believe that we have not exaggerated in speaking of a power policy, referring to the USSR -- or rather, one of arrogance -- and that perhaps here is the proof that matters are graver and worse than we believed and said.

"Of course, we will reply to PRAVDA's attack. We will reply because it is our duty and also because we have fraternal assistance to lend. Our fraternal assistance lies in our resistance and in our ability to help people to reason and reflect, using reason and reflection.

"This is why we advocate the policy of detente, this is why we are opposed to the policies of economic retaliation, this is why our aim remains a policy of peace which will help everybody examine reality for what it is and not be dragged into a whirlpool of polemical retaliation, exacerbations, threats and blackmail, which at a time like this could be grave for everybody.

"In raising the problem of the new internationalism," Pajetta added at this point, "we are following the teaching of Togliatti that unity is possible only within respect for differences. It is a concept which we extend to the socialist parties and to the liberation movements, and also to those who do not bear the stamp of the Cominterm but do not even ideologically espouse Marx and Lenin. As regards our party's individuality, its autonomy, its independence -- in a word, its diversity -- we will defend it and make it respected by everybody.

"We will reply to PRAVDA's attacks like Italian communists; there is no doubt about that. If the forces of imperialism believe that we will give them respite just because they are writing in this way in Moscow, we will disappoint them, you may rest assured." "We will speak as comrades to comrades with all communist parties," Pajetta concluded, "we will defend our stances, we will demand a reply to our questions. And we will know how to demonstrate to our friends in the liberation movements on whose side we are; we will know how to demonstrate this by our activity to precisely those movements which PRAVDA is now accusing us of betraying. We will do so with our great strength -- with the great strength of a strong, sound and intelligent communist party.

POPE WARNS AFRICAN PRIESTS AWAY FROM POLITICS

AU132130 Rome ANSA in English 1942 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Enugu (Nigeria), 13 Feb (ANSA) -- Pope John Paul II, speaking to seminarians in this capital city of the Nigerian state of Anambra, this afternoon warned the future Roman Catholic priests about the temptations of abandoning the vow of celibacy and of becoming involved in political militancy.

The pontiff declared that [words indistinct] effort, you must fight to resist all temptations that may present themselves in your lives, such as, for example, neglecting [words indistinct] ability, unavailability, overly frequent trips and the dissipation of apostolic energies."

The pope also referred to temptations involving celibacy and seeking an elevated position in society. He went on to insist that political parties are not for priests and urged members of the Roman Catholic clergy to "do nothing without your bishop or, worse still, against him" as regards work and study outside the diocese.

Before leaving Onitsha, one hundred kilometers to the south, to come to Enugu, John Paul toured the hospital (?of) Carlo Borromeo, built by contributions from Milan, whose patron saint is San Carlo.

SOARES: 'SOVIETS PLAN TO DESTABILIZE PENINSULA'

PM111527 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 5 Feb 82 p 15

[Alberto Miguez interview in Lisbon with Portuguese Socialist Party (PS) Secretary General Mario Soares: "There Is a Soviet Plan To Destabilize Iberian Peninsula" -- date of interview not given]

[Text] Lisbon -- Portuguese Socialist leader Mario Soares believes that there is a "Soviet plan to destabilize the Iberian Peninsula" whose bridgehead is the PCP. Soares also believes that the Pinto Balsemao government is faring "atrociously," and that there should therefore be an early election to change the government. In a lengthy and sometimes strained interview Soares reiterated that he and his friends in the PS remain the alternative to the current government. He also said that he was dismissed by the president of the republic over 3 years ago "because of rightwing pressures," and that the Socialists would cause the economic crisis to be paid for by "everybody and not just the workers."

Many deputies of the current majority believe, Soares said, that a new election is necessary and that the government must be changed, "although afterward, in parliament, they vote in favor of the cabinet." "There are sections of Portuguese society which are going hungry," the Socialist leader also stated in a dramatic tone, "because the government's democratic policy has ended the subsidies for essential commodities and increased the costs of social security for contributors. This government is at the service of the wealthiest classes and is seeking to destroy all the social reforms effected by the Socialists when we were in power."

Socialist Defeat

"So how is it possible that you were defeated electorally?" I asked rather ingenuously.

"Because the Democratic Alliance deceived the people with promises which it is not keeping and will not keep," Soares replied as quick as lightning. The "Soviet plan to destabilize the Iberian Peninsula," to which the PS secretary general referred several times, involves provoking delicate situations in the social and economic field which would lead to a real insurrection: The instrument for that plan is the PCP.

"And the PCE?" I asked again, equipped with another touch of ingenuousness.

[Answer] Not the PCE, because it is Eurocommunist, and the Portuguese communists' principal external aim is the attack Carrillo and Berlinguer....

[Question] But how could Dr Alvaro Cunhal destabilize Spanish democracy?

[Answer] Indirectly. The destabilization in Portugal would lead to destabilization in Spain.

Impressions Concerning Spain's Joining NATO

However, Mr Soares provided no further information which might clarify the extent of the foreign conspiracy. The most amusing moment of the interview came when the Socialist leader talked about bilateral issues -- that is, Spanish-Portuguese issues. He reiterated that Portugal should join the Common Market before its peninsular neighbor because "It sought this earlier and because it poses fewer problems than Spain." But it was impossible to make him give clear answers concerning Spain's joining NATO.

"I understand Felipe Gonzalez' stance very well: His arguments seem to me valid, although we -- who are founder members of NATO -- are in favor of it."

[Question] But what is your party's stance on Spain's joining the alliance?

[Answer] That is a Spanish internal problem on which we have no reason to express an opinion.

[Question] However, you will have to express an opinion immediately, since your party will be summoned within a few hours by the government (like all the other parliamentary parties) to be consulted about this issue, before it is debated in parliament and afterward by the government.

[Answer] I did not know that. At any rate, I could not express an opinion now because I lack sufficient information....

[Question] What information? It is a matter of saying whether or not you are in favor of our joining the Atlantic Alliance....

[Answer] Well, when I am asked, I will say.

[Question] So you have no clear stance?

[Answer] We have no need to put forward our stance now. Obviously, Spain's joining NATO poses some problems which are known to everybody....

[Question] For instance?

[Answer] Well, for instance, the setting up of a unified Iberian command, led by Spain.

[Question] Nobody in Spain has declared himself in favor of that alternative.

[Answer] Yes, but at a certain moment a feeler was put out....

[Question] And so you cannot specify the Portuguese PS' stance on Spain's joining NATO....

[Answer] Not for the present.

Prepared To Be Prime Mininster

Soares intimated throughout the interview that he is prepared to be prime minister and that that remains for him the essential aim. He angrily rejected the more or less veiled suggestions of incompetence and unrealism during his respective terms of office, repeated that President Eanes must be "the president of all the Portuguese people" and not interfere in the "party struggle," and attacked the government with heavy artillery. But these attacks lacked conviction: An important Portuguese political personality had told me a few hours earlier that "Mario Soares' gunshots are mere formal volleys." Impervious to despondency, Soares remains one of the most curious and singular figures in the neighboring country's political history: He is a popular leader who communicates easily with the masses, has considerable difficulties with almost all his colleagues (the list of his former friends is extremely long and lengthening daily) and maintains over the years a certain aggressiveness and a certain critical unorthodoxy which do him credit. Above all he continues stubbornly and constantly to admire Mario Soares.

FINLAND

AGREEMENT REACHED ON DISTRIBUTION OF PORTFOLIOS

LD161558 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1030 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The Social Democrats, the Center Party, the Finnish People's Democratic League [SKDL] and the Swedish People's Party reached agreement a moment ago on the distribution of the portfolios in the four-party majority government. According to the agreement, the Social Democrats will have, in addition to the post of prime minister, the portfolios of the second minister of finance, second minister of education, first minister of the interior and first minister of health and social affairs. The Center Party will have the portfolios of first minister of finance, second minister of the interior and second minister of health and social affairs. Center Party members will also continue in the new government in the posts of defense minister and minister of agriculture. As a new ministry the party is gaining the post of minister of trade and industry. For the SKDL the present post of second minister of education is changing to the post of first minister of education. The People's Democrats will also continue holding the posts of minister of labor and minister of communications.

According to the agreement the Swedish People's Party will have the portfolios of foreign minister and minister of justice. It is expected that the decisions on the choice of individuals for the ministerial posts will become clear during today and tomorrow. The elections will still be discussed by the parties' governing bodies. The relative strength in the government remains unchanged between the leftwing and the non-socialists. Both groups will have eight posts, but an independent professional minister, the foreign trade minister, Esko Rokola, who will continue in the new government, will tilt the strength toward the non-socialists.

The working group discussing the government program has not yet reached agreement on the dispute over the reduction of the national pension payments. The working group will continue its work until 1500. After that the prime minister-designate, the Social Democratic chairman, Kalevi Sorsa, will make his own conciliation proposal in the dispute if the parties have not reached agreement before that. A possible conciliation proposal would be submitted for approval or rejection to the deciding bodies of the parties. The deciding bodies will meet to discuss the results of the government talks tomorrow.

1,320 POLES SEEK POLITICAL ASYLUM IN SWEDEN

NC121115 Paris AFP in English 1101 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] Stockholm, 12 Feb (AFP) -- A total of 1,320 Poles, most of whom were in Sweden when martial law was declared in Poland on December 13, have requested political asylum here, the Swedish Immigration Office said today. A communique said that the office had already granted 450 requests. The others were all expected to be approved, as the government decided on February 1 that no Polish nationals wanting to remain here would be sent home. Some 4,000 Poles are currently living in Sweden.

Meanwhile port authorities at Karlskrona, in the south, said that the captain of a Polish trawler had asked for political asylum after docking in the Swedish port with the excuse of a breakdown. The authorities said that four crew members were still on board, but might also opt to stay in Sweden. They added that the Polish Embassy here had been informed of the case, as the trawler's master was the only person on board qualified to take the vessel home.

GREEK PAPER CLAIMS U.S. EQUIPMENT IN CYPRUS

NC161113 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 16 Feb 82 pp 1, 7

[Text] A great variety of special equipment from U.S. bases in Iran that was stored on Greek soil has recently been transported to Cyprus by the "Military Air Cargo Unit" that is permanently stationed in the FRG. According to exclusive information available to the Athens newspaper ETHNOS, the categories of this materiel are long-range detection systems, sensitive transmitters and very accurate receivers, electronic equipment for sending and receiving signals, information analyzers, teletype code scramblers and other components that constituted the basic equipment of the U.S. installations in Iran.

The paper adds: As it is indicated, the transfer of this strategic equipment to Cyprus was done on the basis of the U.S. privileges provided under the 1953 U.S. treaty that the Greek side neither changed nor denounced. Briefly, it is being said that almost all of the electronic equipment of the U.S. bases in Iran was moved to Greek territory in February 1979 when the previous government gave permission for restationing, at any airport in the country, of the U.S. military aircraft that have transported the technical and scientific personnel of the above installations.

The Americans, therefore, grasped the opportunity of this formal permission offered by the government and easily transported to Crete and the Elevsis "558 base", a large percentage of their electronic equipment from Iran and, particularly, that from the (Behshahr) Base, which was the most important maintenance center in Central Asia. Now, in accordance with the Pentagon's strategic needs, this special materiel has been transported to Cyprus to meet the U.S. needs there. Moreover, Moscow Radio's recent denouncement (editor's note: This was published in KHARAVYI last Thursday) that the Americans transported military spying radioelectronic systems to the Dhekelia and Akrotiri bases in Cyprus is not irrelevant. The radio added that U.S. spying aircraft with strong detection mechanisms surveil Soviet territory. However, to the British and U.S. installations in Cyprus must be added the strong RAF radar station in Troodhos, which has recently been placed under joint British-U.S. administration.

The ETHNOS report concludes: It should also be noted that the Troodhos radar station is one of the strongest in the world and, inconjunction with the one at Okinawa, covers the whole area between Cyprus and Japan.

Government Denies Knowledge

[Text] The spokesman yesterday said the Cyprus Government has no information about transfer of any electronic equipment by the Americans from their bases in Greece to the British bases in Cyprus. The report was published in the Athens paper ETHNOS blaming past Greek governments for providing excessive freedom to Americans in Greece.

Meanwhile the Turks have denied that the American monitoring station at Karavas was restored by technicians who arrived from Turkey. The Turkish Cypriots said the reports were circulated by Greek quarters in order to discredit the Turkish Cypriot administration among the non-aligned and to cover up the freedom provided for Americans on the British bases in the south.

TURKISH STATEMENT BLAMES GREEKS FOR INCIDENT

NC150810 Nicosia KIBRIS in English 11 Feb 82 p 16

[Text] The spokesman of the TFSC Foreign Ministry regrets the serious flying incident which took place on 3rd February and which could have caused a tragedy. He particularly regrets that, after giving wrong directions to the captain of the Indian military plane, Greek Cypriot officials maliciously accused Turkish Cypriots for what happened.

The text of the spokesman's statement follows: "On Wednesday, February 3rd, 1982, at about 1610 hours, an unidentified grey plane was seen flying very low over our military positions in Akincilar [Greek Name Louroujina] village. After it was confirmed that the plane, which made no contact with Ercan flying control, was violating Turkish Cypriot airspace, a few warning shots were fired by a rifle. The calmness of the Turkish Cypriot soldiers, and their reaction of this incident with only warning shots, undoubtedly prevented more serious results.

"Aviation officials of the Greek Cypriot administration had deliberately given wrong instructions to the captain of the Indian plane thus causing it to fly very low over our military positions and violating our airspace. We immediately protested about this violation to the Greek Cypriot side through the UN peace force in Cyprus.

AL-ASAD THANKS KIPRIANOU FOR UNGA SUPPORT

NC151149 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] In a message to President Kiprianou, Syrian President Hafiz al-Asad expresses thanks and appreciation for Cyprus' important support during the debate on the Golan Heights question at the UN General Assembly special session. President al-Asad adds: Cyprus' attitude has contributed considerably to the adoption of the resolution, which condemns Israel for the annexation of the Golan Heights. In his message, President al-Asad stresses that the policy being followed by the Cypriot Government will contribute not only to the further strengthening and consolidation of relations between Cyprus and Syria, but also to those with all the other Arab states.

SOCIALIST INTERNATIONAL DELEGATION ARRIVES

NC141857 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 14 Feb 82

[Text] A six-member delegation of the Socialist International arrived today in Cyprus on a 7-day briefing visit. It is headed by Mrs Joe Richardson of the British Labor Party who is a member of Parliament. The delegation, in which representatives from the British Labor Party and the Socialist Parties of France, Denmark and Italy participate, will be received by President of the Republic Kiprianou. The delegation will also have various other contacts and will visit refugee camps and settlements.

TURKMEN COMMENTS ON COUNTRY'S FOREIGN POLICY

TA161659 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1605 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 16 Feb (AA) -- Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said Turkey's basic policy of support for the Arab cause at the United Nations was unchanged. He made the statement at a press conference Tuesday where he was asked questions on various foreign policy issues after he made an initial statement about his recent participation at the Madrid conference and the Wehrkunde meeting of personalities from NATO member-countries in Munich.

The foreign minister regretted that Turkey felt obliged nevertheless to abstain during the UN General Assembly voting to condemn Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights. He explained Turkey would have voted for the major part of the resolution without any hesitation had it been to the [words indistinct] (?the resolution) "presented difficulties" for the "delicate balances" in Turkish foreign policy: She had to abstain, as explained also in the Turkish permanent representative's address to the General Assembly.

Turkmen rejected the suggestion that Turkey's abstention might have an adverse effect on relations with Arab countries as had her voting on Algeria's independence in the past. "There is no doubt about where we stand concerning the Golan Heights," he said, "we consider the Israeli decision to annex null and void, and we condemn Israel's aggressive policy."

Asked if an earlier abstention by Turkey during the voting on a UN resolution concerning human rights in Latin America indicated a modification of Turkish foreign policy, Turkmen said he believed that resolution had certain "differences" as compared to resolutions of past years.

It is impossible to instruct our permanent representative beforehand on all potential topics that might come up at the General Assembly, the foreign minister said, "and the representative may use his discretion within the framework of standing orders of a general nature."

The way the permanent representative abstained should not be construed as a change in Turkish foreign policy, he said, adding, "There is complete harmony between our ministry and our representative at the United Nations."

Turkmen reiterated his government's desire to maintain "goodneighborly relations" with the Soviet Union. Commentary appearing in the Soviet press, however, contradicted the avowed importance the Soviet Government attaches to such good relations, he added. "I maintain the conviction," he added, "that the Soviet Union will continue to follow a stable and careful policy" towards Turkey.

Turkish authorities were "examining" all aspects of the recent announcement by the Greek energy minister that they would start exploring for oil in the area of the Aegean. "Evidently we shall not make the slightest concession from our rights and interests over the Aegean continental shelf," he declared.

Noting if an agreement is violated by one party, the other party may automatically violate that agreement, Turkmen hoped things would not go that far. The agreement reached at Bern by which Turkey and Greece decided not to conduct activity in the disputed area until the Aegean issue was solved was "an element of stability" in relations between Greece and Turkey, and it would be in Greece's own interests to maintain it.

Asked to comment on reports that Greece had invited Soviet vessels to call at Aegean ports, Turkmen said it was no secret that Greece's NATO policy was a cause for concern among the allies.

The Rogers Plan was being discussed directly between NATO commanders at the national military authorities involved, Turkmen said, adding he had exchanged views with Gen Bernard Rogers of NATO on the question at Munich.

On Greece's efforts to extend international waters to 12 miles, Foreign Minister Turkmen said Turkey had clearly indicated that she would reciprocate against any unilateral action or fait accompli.

Turkey would welcome a Federal German initiative to help resume the dialogue between Turkey and Greece, but added no request had come from Federal Germany in this respect.

At his press conference Tuesday, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said he had a chance to get together separately or in groups with several European colleagues during the Madrid conference and at the conference on defence technology at Munich last week.

Referring to certain press reports, Turkmen explained that in Madrid, he had not requested any interviews with the king or prime minister of Spain, as his stay in Madrid was not an official visit to Spain. He had met with the Spanish foreign minister and the U.S. secretary of state separately, he added.

Secretary of State Alexander Haig wanted to visit Turkey soon, Turkmen said, probably some time this year.

The announced U.S. aid of $815 million was "not satisfactory," Turkmen said, particularly from the viewpoint of Turkey's military needs. He declined to comment on a report the Federal German Foreign Ministry is expected to present to its parliament on the grounds that this was an "internal affair" of Federal Germany. German officials, however, had given him the impression that the report would be favorable.

Turkmen believed Norwegian authorities were "aware of the irrationality" of their recent action in withholding a prearranged arms shipment to Turkey. That was why, he believed, Norway had not yet answered Turkey's previous note.

Turkey kept up her efforts of mediation in the Iran-Iraq war through the Islamic conference goodwill mission, but had not made an additional attempt at mediation, the foreign minister announced.

U.S. SENATOR TOWER PAYS VISIT, MEETS OFFICIALS

TA161043 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Chairman of the U.S. Senate Armed Forces Committee Senator John Tower has concluded his contacts in Ankara. He was received at 0900 by National Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken. National Defense Ministry Under Secretary Gen Celal Bulutlar was also present at the meeting. At 1000, Tower was received by Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen. Joint defense issues and international problems were discussed at these meetings.

Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu received the senator at 1030. In a statement before the meeting, Ulusu said that joint defense issues will constitute the bulk of the talks. Expressing the belief that bilateral talks will create an opportunity to further and to improve the relations between the two countries in all fields, Ulusu said: We will make an assessment of the political and economic developments that have occurred in the world and in our region since last year.

Tower said that the United States views Turkey as a loyal and stable ally within NATO and that it appreciates Turkey's contribution to world peace. Noting that every possible aid will be extended to help Turkey's various problems, Tower added that aid will be revived for the modernization of the Turkish Armed Forces and for a healthier structure in the Turkish economy. Head of State Kenan Evren received Tower at 1130 and conferred with him for some time.

News Conference Held

TA161715 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1615 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 16 Feb (AA) -- U.S. Senator John G. Tower (Rep. Texas) said the U.S. would extend $465 million of military aid and $350 million economic aid to Turkey in 1982. The chairman of the U.S. Senate Armed Forces Committee said at a press conference after conferring with Turkish leaders in Ankara Tuesday, Turkey was above all a part of Europe and an important NATO ally. As she was also a member of the Islamic Conference, she could bring all parties together, the senator said. He did not discuss the Turkish-Greek dispute with Turkish statesmen, he said, as this was a matter to be settled between the two countries. The United States had welcomed Turkey's impartiality at the UN voting, Senator Tower said. The posture of participants at the recent Wehrkunde meeting in Munich had been "positive," he added.

COMMUNIST PARTY DENOUNCES UPCOMING TRIALS

TA140901 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 14 Feb 82

[Statement by the Turkish Communist Party Central Anatolia Regional Committee, date not specified -- read by announcer]

[Text] Citizens, the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] trial will begin within the coming days at the Ankara courts of the military dictatorship. Another trial has already started in Golcuk. Preparations are being announced in other regions as well. Reactionsim is preparing to try through false testimony to throw into dungeons the progressives it has failed to massacre in the streets, to destroy through torture and to discourage through terror. The junta that has assumed power with the claim of preventing terror and securing the Ataturk principles is, on the one hand, releasing the administrators of the Nationalist Action Party [NAP], the center of terror, and the bloody fascist murderers, and on the other hand, is closing down democratic organizations such as the Turkish Teachers' Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER] which is protesting the murders of NAP. The administators are being heavily punished, the members are being condemned to exile, unemployment and hunger. The junta is trying the administrators of the Conferation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK], who voice their opposition against the massacres, under state of war conditions. Turkes' uncompleted task has been taken over by the prosecutor, Takkeci. He demands the death sentences for workers' leaders. The junta, which has created an atmosphere of oppression through massacres and executions, has brought hunger and poverty to the toilers and unlimited opportunities for exploitation to imperialism and the monopolies by applying the IMF decisions. The junta has signed a new slavery agreement under the name of a joint defense group and has made Turkey a tool of U.S. and NATO adventurist policy. It is actually the junta that should be prosecuted for having committed these crimes against our people and our national independence. Therefore, the reactionary press is granted the permission to [words indistinct]. The trials, the defense and the truth are being concealed from our people and censure is being imposed.

Citizens, the TCP is the only illegal Communist Party in Europe. The bourgeoisie has for the last 60 years been attempting to put on trial the TCP which is now being tried by the military dictatorship. The TCP for the last 60 years has been the plaintiff and not the defendant. The TCP was born from the heart of the people during the war of national liberation. It has been struggling for national independence and the people's welfare for the last 61 years. The junta is trying to conceal this fact through accusations of terrorism. The TCP is the merciless enemy of imperialism and reactionism which are the source of terror. Even the military prosecutor had to admit in the indictment that the TCP was not involved in terror, that its expenditures were covered by members fees and that it was a disciplined party active on a national scale and in all regions. What then is the accusation and why the trial? The reactionary military dictatorship is attacking the TCP because it is guiding the toiling people's struggle for national independence, peace, employment, land and freedom. Progressives, patriots, democrats, those who want a happy existence and a national democratic constitution for our toiling people and those who support the just demands of the masses are being tried in Golcuk, Ankara and other regions. All efforts exerted by reactionism are in vain. The TCP is alive and struggling. Neither the reactionary press' outcries concerning the destruction of the TCP nor the tortures, sham trials and rumors on splits within the TCP -- aimed at encouraging the formation of factions -- can change this truth. The TCP cannot be torn away from our people and the world communist movement. The TCP, through its steel discipline, its unshakable unity and its clear and open policy, is part of the struggle of the masses and will stand by the masses.

Workers, toilers, intellectuals, patriotic soldiers and officers, let us raise our voice for the release of political prisoners and for the reopening of democratic organizations. Let us express our solidarity with the progressive democratic and patriotic detainees. Listen to the voice of the Turkish Communist Party. Let us break the censor of the junta and let us spread the truths. Let us unite for a national democratic constitution.

[Signed] TCP Central Anatolia Regional Committee.

Trial Begins

TA151843 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1615 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 15 Feb (AA) -- The 205 members of the illegal Communist Party of Turkey "TCP" appeared before an Ankara martial law court Monday for the first hearing of their trial on charges of violating Article 141 of the Penal Code, of obtaining information "that should have remained confidential in the interest of the state," of contempt of the president, arranging false identity cards, and violation of other laws. The first day of the trial was devoted to establishing the identity of the individual defendants, for whom the military prosecutor is demanding prison sentences ranging from 5 to 15 years. The minimum sentence required for 12 of the defendants is 8 years.

DEATH SENTENCE SOUGHT FOR 10 LEFTISTS

TA151828 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1643 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] Erzincan, 15 Feb, (AA) -- The trial of 112 members of the illegal Leftist Revolutionary Path [DEV-YOL] organization active in the Golkoy District of Ordu Province has begun at a martial law court in Erzincan. The military prosecutor is demanding the death penalty for 10 of the defendants on charges of having violated Article 146/1 of the Turkish Penal Code.

DEFENSE, FOREIGN MINISTERS CITED ON NUCLEAR ARMS

[Text] The Hague, 12 Feb -- The fall defense budget will not give any indication of the government's final decision about the number of nuclear-armed units The Netherlands will keep or about the structure of Netherlands defenses in the next 10 years. It is possible, however, that there will be a decision whether or not to maintain the nuclear potential of the Netherlands fleet air arm's patrol aircraft.

Defense Minister van Mierlo, who made these announcements in the debate on the NATO sections of the Defense and Foreign Affairs Ministries' budgets, pointed out that the last Neptune patrol aircraft would be taken out of service in August. The first three replacement Orions would then be brought into operation. Then, for technical reasons, it will be necessary to make some decision about these aircraft's nuclear capacity (involving depth charges, for example), Van Mierlo said. However, any such decision would have to be debated with the chamber before any decision was made.

As far as any structural features contained in the budget were concerned, the minister said that informal consultations with the Netherlands' NATO partners would take place this summer about Netherlands' contributions to conventional and nuclear defenses. As a result, the next budget will contain a full inventory in both fields "with priorities decided by the government." After a debate with the States General formal consultations with NATO would then be able to begin.

Van Mierlo told Labor Party chamber member De Vries that he did not expect a nuclear-free Europe in the foreseeable future. He also said that he "greatly doubted" the military usefulness of the deterrent effect of so-called short-range nuclear arms (nuclear artillery, and so on). Van Mierlo was even less inclined than Foreign Minister van der Stoel to answer questions about when The Netherlands would decide on the deployment of cruise missiles on Netherlands territory. (Labor Party representative De Vries had asked the cabinet to end its record of avoiding such a decision.) Van Mierlo had little inclination -- as has been suggested by Labor Party circles -- to refuse to allow the inspection teams who will come to prepare for the deployment of cruise missiles in the Netherlands from the end of 1983 to enter the country. It would by no means be possible to deduce a decision by the Netherlands Government from their presence in the country, he said.

Minister van der Stoel said that he was a supporter of greater European cooperation within NATO -- for example, through the forum of the EEC or European foreign policy coordination -- but only when this strengthened transatlantic relations with the United States and did not weaken them. He spoke of a "fundamental congruence of interest" between the United States and its European partners, "and not only in the field of security. Proper consultation is necessary: The discussion with Washington about arms limitation talks, which finally began in Geneva, showed the importance of a common European approach."

Van der Stoel warned against too much pessimism about the talks with Moscow. He said that there were close connections between these negotiations on medium-range weapons and the negotiations on intercontinental nuclear systems which will be discussed in the START talks in Geneva.

SPD/FDP COALITION SEEN AS 'BRITTLE ALLIANCE'

DW171103 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 17 Feb 82 p 3

[Commentary signed RR: "Brittle Alliance"]

[Text] Warning lights are flashing as if an oriental potentate were racing through the country with his entourage. Wherever you looked in past days signals were indicating the tension in the Bonn coalition, demonstrating how brittle the Social-Liberal coalition has become. The tone is irritating. Warnings are being uttered, the partners accuse each other and an additional burden emanates from political differences in their own ranks. The most recent contribution was made by North-Rhine Westphalian minister of agriculture, Hans-Otto Baumer, who said something most natural at a time when even banalities can become explosive: He said in a RHEINISCHE POST interview that the coalition must not be maintained at any price. The Bezirk chairman of the Lower Rhine area is certainly not somebody who is suspected of complicating matters for the chancellor. But if he, too, feels called upon to outline the limits of social democratic suffering, it shows in an impressive way how hard it is for the party to cope with the employment program. Baumer and others aim for the FDP, and so they belong objectively to those who "nag" the compromise "to pieces", as Herbert Wehner has called this action of Social Democrats according to DER SPIEGEL, but some people do it only to open the valve of the boiling kettle. Letting off steam as a strategy for survival? How long can something like that work?

ECONOMICS MINISTER COMMENTS ON POLISH SANCTIONS

LD181024 Hamburg DPA in German 0925 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 18 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff flew to the United States today for a series of talks with leading U.S. Government and economic representatives. Before his departure the minister again explained the West German attitude toward U.S. demands for far-reaching economic sanctions against the USSR and Poland. All future agreements and the continuation of trade relations would be reviewed, said Lambsdorff in an interview with DPA. The Federal Government will, however, stay with the (?European) gas-pipeline deal with the Soviet Union. Any obstruction of U.S. supplies or the granting of licenses to German firms for the construction of the gas pipeline from western Siberia to Europe is "not permissible" from the Federal Government's point of view because these had already been agreed prior to events in Poland.

With regard to sanctions against Poland and the USSR, Lambsdorff said: "The Soviet Union must clearly know that there are limits to the continuation of the process of detente when, first in Afghanistan and now in Poland, it is playing an important role in events there." Such massive violation of the rights laid down in the CSCE Final Act as is happening in Poland could "not be swallowed without any reaction at all." The process of detente in Europe, of which the CSCE is a very essential part, must, however, be continued. "In the economic sector," said Lambsdorff, "the Soviet Union must and can count on concluded agreements being upheld by its partners in agreements." With regard to U.S. thoughts about restricting the transfer of technological know-how to the Soviet Union, Lambsdorff said the question is whether there is any point in this. "A country that can build Sputniks and launch them into orbit will no doubt be able to construct rotors and turbines for gas pumping stations." Moreover, exprience has shown that 'although economic sanctions led to discomfort and restrictions in the country concerned, at the same time they provided it with the incentive to make itself indpendent of imports from third countries through developments and products of its own."

With regard to U.S. considerations about not purchasing any more arms manufactured outside the United States, the economics minister said: "That is a clear violation of GATT and arms cooperation agreements within the alliance." The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) was agreed between governments on 1 January 1948. There are now 83 full member-states.

Lambsdorff is planning to hold a thorough discussion with the United States on future economic and finance policy. He expressed confidence in this respect that, despite the current situation on the currency markets, if the West German balance on current account continues its favorable development, the Federal Bank will have "more maneuverability" for lowering interest rates. In the view of the minister, however, U.S. interest rates will probably remain high in 1982. In general Lambsdorff regards present relations with Washington as burdened by a number of misunderstandings between the alliance partners which have become aggravated, if anything, in the recent past. There is certainly irritation in the United States concerning the German peace movement. "All this is interpreted very quickly and very rashly by some Americans as weakness, or even cowardice, as lacking the will for defense," said Lambsdorff. "Too little account is taken by both sides of the fact that we continue to be guided as before by the same basic values."

BECKER OUTLINES INCREASED MEASURES AGAINST USSR

LD171520 Hamburg DPA in German 1452 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 17 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Government has stepped up its pressure on Moscow regarding Polish martial law and has decided to limit from now on political trips to the Soviet Union. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker, who explained the measures to the federal press conference today after the cabinet session, described them as the Federal Republic's part in the "political signals" decided by NATO. In addition to the strict application of restrictions on the movements of official Soviet representatives in the Federal Republic, which were announced last week, Becker announced that "exchange meetings with official Soviet authorities would be adapted to fit the situation." In addition, no further Soviet consultates general would be set up in the Federal Republic. Restrictions are also to apply for "representative meetings" held by the Polish military regime.

The talks on the scientific-technological framework agreement and on the shipping agreement will be postponed, as will those on the inland shipping agreement. The German-Soviet agreement on cooperation in the economic sector will be "implemented more strictly." Furthermore, the Federal Republic will "participate in trade measures by the European Community."

The government spokesman explained that the restriction of contacts would range from politicians in high positions "down to state secretaries." This group of people should in future give especially careful consideration to the matter before accepting invitations to political and specialist talks in the Soviet Union. Becker said that in this respect these "political signals" on the part of the Federal Government would remain in force until the situation in Poland improves.

By means of this list, the Federal Government is demonstrating its participation in NATO's January decisions and is joining in sending stronger political signals in Moscow's direction. Becker drew attention to the fact that similar "signals" -- except for in the United States -- but have not yet been announced. The government spokesman expressly confirmed that all the measures also apply to the members of the so-called economic commission which is responsible at government level for economic contacts. It was once again made clear at the cabinet session that the Federal Government undertakes the commitment not to undermine other measures by allied states against Moscow.

The restrictions on Soviet diplomats in the Federal Republic correspond with those for western diplomats in Moscow. Accordingly, members of the Soviet Embassy in Bonn -- with the sole exception of the ambassador himself -- may only move freely in the area of Bonn/Cologne and on the highway routes to Frankfurt Airport. Other trips must be registered beforehand at the Foreign Ministry, which may raise objections. Similar rules also apply to members of the Soviet consulates and the Soviet Trade Mission in Cologne. Until now, however, these restrictions have been handled generously.

FIRM GIVEN PERMIT TO RECEIVE SOVIET GAS

LD171910 Hamburg DPA in German 1642 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 17 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Office for Trade and Industry can now give a formal green light to the Ruhrgas AG, of Essen -- which participates on the German side in the West European gas pipeline deal with the USSR -- to receive the gas. The Federal Cabinet today issued the office the necessary permit under the foreign trade and payments order.

GOVERNMENT HAS 'NO COMMENT' ON WEHNER'S TRIP

LD171722 Hamburg DPA in German 1618 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 17 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Government does not intend to comment publicly on the forthcoming visit to Warsaw for political talks by the chairman of the SPD Lower House Group, Herbert Wehner. "The Federal Government refrains from making any judgment and any comment," Government Spokesman Kurt Becker said at a news conference in Bonn today. He said that the government has "taken note" of Wehner's intention to make the trip. By reacting in this way, the government has made it clear -- as Wehner himself has done previously -- that the SPD politician is acting on his own initiative in seeking contacts for talks in Warsaw. Informed sources confirmed again today that Wehner had informed Chancellor Schmidt, SPD Chairman Brandt and Federal Foreign Minister Genscher of his intention to go to Warsaw before it became publicly known on Monday. However, Government Spokesman Becker said at the time that when Wehner announced his forthcoming trip, government leaders had not yet been approached.

FRG COMMENTATOR ON GENEVA DISARMAMENT TALKS

[Commendary signed G-N.: "Unequal Security"]

[Text] The secrecy of the Geneva medium-range arms negotiations did not last long. Two and a half months after the opening TASS called the American disarmament suggestion (with zero solution) as "totally unrealistic." One day later the U.S. Department of State publicly rejected the "Soviet proposal." It is obvious that except for an exchange of comments on details of both suggestions nothing has moved in Geneva. The negotiations on medium-range missiles are in a crisis. Maybe they are facing collapse.

Western politicians have been telling the Soviet leaders for 3 years that their new medium-range arms have changed the situation in a particularly threatening way. The Russians have been deaf to such warnings for 3 years; they have continued their armament and made suggestions such as moratoriums and unequal curtailments which would have weakened the Western position and made the Soviet Union the sole possessor of this new means of threat. Moscow has been maintaining since last summer that there is no imbalance because both sides have about 1,000 such warheads each in Europe. That is a mathematical trick. Moscow adds up Western arms with a range of more than 1,000 kilometers and less than that, comparing them with its own medium-range missiles with a range of 4,000 and 5,000 kilometers. But if you compare similar categories, which would be proper, the Soviet Union has a medium-range missile superiority of at least 950 warheads compared with 162 Western warheads, and with regard to arms with a range of less than 1,000 kilometers, a superiority of 1,400 compared with 870 (including French and British arms). This fact has been clearly outlined to the Soviet leadership in past months. It does not contest the figures, but only the way of counting.

This is nothing mechanical of secondary importance. The intention to count all arms on the one side which could reach Soviet territory while not doing the same with regard to Western Europe is not the result of Soviet ignorance, it is a clear political intention. The Soviet Union wants to achieve security for itself and insecurity for Western Europe. It wants to have this confirmed in Geneva, but with a program of unequal security the Soviet leadership is ruining every chance of disarmament in Europe.

HERNU: 'LOYAL TO INTERNATIONAL COMMITMENTS'

DW161053 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 16 Feb 82 p 2

[Correspondent Lutz Krusche interview with French Defense Minister Charles Hernu in PARIS]

[Text] Paris, 15 February -- [Question] Mr Minister, for 8 months now France has had a Socialist defense minister who started his work with great zeal. Could you explain to a foreigner what France's new defense concept is like, or rather which new defense philosophy has been intoroduced since the election loss of the political right?

[Answer] The government which emerged from the last elections is surely one of changes, of amendments. This is the mandate which it was given by the voters who had received concrete proposals -- what I have in mind in particular are the 110 points of Francois Mitterrand during the presidential election campaign. But there is one point which requires invariability: the commandments of defense in view of the multiple and complex threats by the modern world. The premier drew attention to this in a speech on principles delivered to the "Institut des Hautes Etudes de la Defense Nationale," saying that defense and security represent commandments which outlive political elections. Let me add that France will continue developing its own strategy of deterrence, simultaneously reamining loyal to its international commitments.

[Question] A question which is bound to interest all Germans: Where, geographically speaking, does France's defense begin as far as your government is concerned?

[Answer] Let me start with a general statement which dates back to Thucydides, meaning not just yesterday: In the case of conflict there is but one certainty, and this certainty is that nothing will develop in the manner foreseen by the strategists. Hence, it is necessary to avoid fixing rigid boundaries or inflexible plans in advance. On the contrary, it is necessary to count on the factor of uncertainty to intensify deterrence. Thus I will confine myself to the public statement: A serious threat to the states allied with France would seriously affect France's security. This, by the way, is the reason why the responsible people of French politics -- from the president, himself, down -- insist so much on the need to prevent an imbalance from emerging between the two most armed powers. After all, the security of the European partners depends on a balance of forces.

[Question] Mr Minister, the president and you, yourself, have made it clear on several occasions that any return of France into NATO military integration is out of the question. On the other hand, Paris the other day indicated interest in an upgrading of the West European Union, the WEU. Could you be more specific about it?

[Answer] You justly recall our refusal to return into NATO military integration. France as a member of the Atlantic Alliance indeed is loyal to its commitments, yet it also is sovereign in having autonomy of decisions and leeway of freedom resting on its own nuclear deterrence. As far as the WEU is concerned, you are right, we did indicate interest in upgrading that organization, in particular its parliamentary assembly. There are two major reasons for this: First, there is the Treaty of Brussels which contains an important clause with regard to mutual military assistance. It is especially under this aspect that we refer to this treaty. Besides, and it is necessary to stress this point, the WEU is the only organization in which the Europeans can bring up for discussion their common defense problems. This is true in theory -- as provided for by the treaties -- but also in practice because, unlike the European Community, the WEU exclusively comprises allied states. The Europeans must be able to talk about their own affairs. Pacifism, for instance, is an issue which affects our countries and peoples. I see one place where these problems can be brought up for discussion, and that is the WEU.

[Question] For years the French Pluto missiles stationed in Alsace have been irritating the German people, simply because by their targeting and range they aim only at the Federal Republic. Will your government change this state of affairs and consult Bonn in connection with the planned replacement of the Pluto missiles?

[Answer] The "Plutos" are systems whose range is comparable to that of the U.S. "Lance" missiles -- I am told that they are even slightly superior to the latter -- which are now stationed in various European countries in great numbers. The Pluto missile soon will have a successor. The French Defense Council just recently decided that the future weapons system should have a range of at least 250 km.

[Question] Mr Minister, are you quite generally seeking closer cooperation with the Federal Republic in defense matters?

[Answer] Without hesitating and quite unequivocally I answer your question with a "Oui": Since the 1950's German-French friendship has been the supporting pillar of stability in Western Europe. Cooperation in the field of armaments for our armed forces is an important element of this understanding. In this connection it is necessary for me to note that French-German programs -- Poland, Milan, Hot, Alpha Jet and others -- are not only important political symbols, but also industrially and financially profitable operations for both partners. I will not deny that we desire an early start of cooperation with respect to future projects: What I mean, of course, is the application of the agreement concluded between our two governments in February 1980 involving the French-German tank. Moreover -- and this is highly important -- there is also the project of the antitank helicopter, because this type of weapons system is destined to play an enhanced role in modern armies. I think that the forthcoming German-French summit meeting [scheduled for 24/25 February] will produce some headway with respect to these two projects to which the French Government attaches quite a special significance.

PS OFFICIAL SCORES EASTERN EUROPEAN REGIMES

PM161143 Paris LE MATIN in French 6-7 Feb 82 p 2

[Didier Buffin interview with Jacques Huntzinger, in charge of international relations for the PS National Secretariat: "Strenuously Denouncing the East Bloc Regimes" -- date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] The PS leadership considers that the regimes of East Europe "have nothing in common with socialism." Why assert such a categorical stance as this today?

[Answer] One of the reasons for this declaration is to recall the PS' unwavering doctrine on the East bloc regimes. They are in effect not socialist. This analysis was clearly confirmed in the 1979 Socialist Plan [program statement], but at the time nobody took particular notice of it. What is this analysis? At the outset there was a social revolution in Russia, and in Central Europe too, between the two wars and after World War II. The regimes were established by the communist parties. But the ruling communist parties have blocked the building of socialism, while still effecting positive reforms in the economic and social sphere. With the monopoly of power in their hands, they have prevented any system of public liberty, thus creating dictatorships. These communist parties have ossified and become cut off from the masses, becoming increasingly less representative of their country's working class. So the people's forces have expressed themselves by other means; by the workers revolt (Berlin 1953), by the attempts at internal freedom in the parties (Prague 1968) and by the reappraisal of the trade union and political institutions (Poland in 1980).

We have been saying that for a long time, but the situation in Poland evidences such a seizing up of the regimes of East Europe that they must be vigorously denounced -- in the interest of socialism, because nobody today must confuse East Europe and socialism any more; in the interest also of peace, because the seeds of explosion much more dangerous for Europe than the SS-20 and Pershing missiles are to be found in these regimes.

[Question] It is no mere chance that the PS is restating these stances at the time of the 24th PCF Congress....

[Answer] It so happens that this declaration was adopted by the executive bureau the very day the PCF Congress opened. In fact, it originates directly from the aggravation of the Polish people's situation and the recent events in Gdansk. The promises made by Jaruzelski have not been kept. He had promised to lift martial law, progressively liberate the detainees and to return life to normal. Nothing has been done. Poland is engaged in a process of normalization Czechoslovakia-style, minus the Soviet tanks... It is a question of effecting normalization cautiously: The Soviet Union learned lessons from 1968. The military coup in Poland was prepared meticulously over weeks and months, then the machinery of repression was set in motion. Some people still delude themselves about the so-called moderation of Jaruzelski and his crew, but the PS has no more illusions.

[Question] Is this analysis to be understood as a response to the report presented by Georges Marchais at the 24th congress?

[Answer] It is an element of the response to the propositions made at the 24th PCF Congress. It is true that the importance of the delegations from the big communist parties of East Europe, that the ovation given to the representatives of the Soviet and Polish Communist Parties, that the perception of the identity of views between the internationalism of the Soviet Communist Party and certain analyses contained in the report by Georges Marchais, as well as Maxime Gremetz' speech, may allow us to think that the PCF is not the last great Western communist party close to the international communist movement.

[Question] A party with an allegiance to the Soviet Union come what may?

[Answer] The analysis we can make of the current situation of the PCF must take account of the reality which I have just described to you. After the schism of the PCI, the serious crisis experienced by the PCF and the distancing of most the communist parties of Northern Europe from the CPSU, we are forced to admit that the PCF is increasingly isolated in West Europe in terms of its foreign policy stances (Afghanistan, Poland, the nature of the socialist regimes). This is a longstanding situation. It is simply an expression of the relative contradiction of a communist party participating in a leftwing government with integrity, but hampered by its international ties.

[Question] Are you about to launch a debate on the relations between the PCF and East Europe, as demanded by [PS National Secretary] Jean Poperen recently?

[Answer] I do not think there will be a debate. The reality is taken into account by the PS when it analyzes the PCF's situation. Its present difficulties and even its contradictions in no way prevent the implementation of the government accord established between the socialists and communists last June. This accord involves the parties.

[Question] Are you not afraid that the PS will be accused of doubletalk, between your taking of stances and the signing of the Soviet gas contract, and the reception of the Polish foreign minister by [External Relations Minister] Claude Cheysson in Paris?

[Answer] I don't regard this as doubletalk. There is a government policy and there is only beginning: economic activity is blocked, the population will not always remain passive. So we can expect a possible dramatization of the situation leading to much stronger reactions on the part of Western governments and the French Government. The government must think of all the consequences of the decisions it takes on the Polish affair, because war and peace are at stake. If we refuse Soviet gas today, to what extent would we have to react tomorrow if the repression became bloody and Soviet troops intervened? The PS does not have these responsibilities. Its role is political and ideological. This role is to help France become the homeland of socialism in Europe.

MITTERRAND VIEWS ROLE OF NATIONALIZED INDUSTRIES

LD171754 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] According to Francois Mitterrand, the nationalized industries will be enterprises like others, with bosses like others. That means responsibility, motivation, competition, job creation, and above all, priority to the industrial sector. The Council of Ministers session has just ended. The Elysee spokesman, Pierre Beregovoy, reports the president's intentions:

[Begin Beregovoy recording] The president of the republic declared that industrial enterprises and the national banks must not be appendages of the administration. Their autonomy of decision and action must be total. The necessary controls will be effected. Thus, the nationalized sector will carry out its activities by respecting the rules of loyal competition. I will watch over all this personally, declared President Mitterrand, and I invite the government to conform strictly to this. Finally, I count on these enterprises' developing new social relations and their becoming places of significant progress for workers' training and conditions. [end recording]

GOVERNMENT TO OFFER RECONSTRUCTION AID TO CHAD

AB180837 Paris AFP in English 0717 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Paris, 18 Feb (AFP) -- The French Government, placed in a difficult position by Chad's rejection of OAU proposals for a cease-fire and elections there, said Wednesday it had "taken note with interest" of the proposals but still plans to offer reconstruction aid to its former colony.

Following a report to cabinet members by the minister of external relations and cooperation, a spokesman said the government "reaffirmed its attachment to the principles of unity, territorial integrity and the independence of Chad," which has been torn by civil war since February 1979. The spokesman said France wanted to contribute, "through (?active) cooperation with Chadian authorities, in the reconstruction of the country."

Government sources said France would send aid of 80 million francs (13.3 million dollars) this year, up from 55 million francs last year. The government declaration was the first official French reaction to the recommendations of the Organization of African Unity's committee on Chad, which met earlier this month in Nairobi.

Chadian President Goukouni Oueddei rejected the OAU proposals, placing France in an awkward position since it had based its continued aid to the north-central African country on the OAU's recognition of the Chad Government. Observers said the French statement Wednesday appeared to be an attempt to recognize the stance of the pan-African organization while reaffirming plans to continue supporting Goukouni.

Government sources here note that, while the OAU disagrees with Goukouni on the means to establish peace in Chad, it has not withdrawn its support of his government. The sources said that France plans no peace initiative of its own in Chad. Despite French economic and military aid to the government, the rebel forces of former Defense Minister Hissene Habre have taken control of about two-thirds of the country -- a fact which observers said has caused some embarrassment in Paris.

SEYCHELLES PRESIDENT TALKS WITH MITTERRAND

AB161929 Paris AFP in French 1637 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Paris, 16 Feb (AFP) -- French-Seychelles relations are quite good, France Albert Rene, president of the Seychelles Republic, confirmed on Tuesday afternoon when leaving Francois Mitterrand, whom he was meeting for the first time.

In fact, he announced the opening of "a new era" in cooperation between the two countries and stated that their talks were "very warm."

Cooperation between the two countries went through a difficult period and gradually improved, especially since Mr Mitterrand came to power in France in May 1981. The attempted coup on the Mahe Island in November 1981 by a group of mercenaries from South Africa gave France the opportunity to make a gesture of solidarity toward the Seychelles Government. Three warships, including two Avisos, were sent by Paris to the Port of Victoria while two reconnaissance planes of the navy landed at the Mahe International Airport, where violent clashes took place between mercenaries and Seychelles defense forces.

The problem of Seychelles economic development was discussed during talks and lunch at the Elysee on Tuesday attended by Claude Cheysson minister of external relations, Jean-Pierre Cot, minister of cooperation and development; and Louis Le Pensec, minister of maritime affairs,

The main subjects discussed were fishing and construction, but cultural and political problems in that region of the world as well as the situation in the closest countries such as Madagascar, India, and the Horn of Africa were also raised.

President Rene, whose visit to France will last several more days, will meet Jean-Pierre Cot and Mr Cheyyson as well as Minister of Defense Charles Hernu and Minister of Maritime Affairs Le Pensec. He will also hold talks with Guy Penne, the French President's adviser on African and Malagasy affairs, whom he received in Victoria in October 1981.

Observers believe that these talks will enable the Seychelles head of state to reaffirm his country's major policy option, namely, nonalignment and solidarity with the Third World and with liberation movements in Southern Africa and in the Western Sahara. The Seychelles favors "a zone of peace" in the Indian Ocean and to this end it intends to reduce the maritime and air stopovers granted to foreign powers.

TWO SUBMARINES ENROUTE TO INDIAN OCEAN

PM171031 Paris LE MONDE in French 13 Feb 82 p 17

[Text] Two conventionally propelled attack submarines, the Venus from the Atlantic Fleet at Brest and the Agosta from the Mediterranean Fleet at Toulon, have been sent on an extended mission to the Indian Ocean. Escorted by the logistic support ship the Rhone, the two French submarines are to pass through the Suez Canal on 1 March. In the Indian Ocean they will join a French fleet composed largely of a fleet escort ship, one gunboat [Aviso], four corvettes [Aviso-Escorteurs], three minesweepers, two minehunters and their support ships, one maintenance ship and supply tankers.

This is the second France submarine mission to the Indian Ocean. As early as 1976 the Marsouin and the Junon undertook a mission lasting several months. The Agosta, in service since 1977, has a dived displacement of 1,725 tons and the Venus, in service since 1966, has a dived displacement of 1,043 tons. These diesel-electric propelled submarines are equipped with torpedoes with conventional warheads.

POPE ADDRESSES DIPLOMATS, POLES IN NIGERIA

AU161547 Rome ANSA in English 1540 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Lagos, 16 Feb (ANSA) -- Pope John Paul II addressed himself to relations between industrialized nations and the Third World and dropped a sharp warning to those nations who seek to dominate others through their economic and technological might in a message delivered here today to the ambassadors accredited to Nigeria. The pontiff met with the diplomatic corps in the apostolic nunciature in the capital to open the fifth day of his visit to Nigeria.

In his statement, he declared that, "Economic and monetary superiority, the possession of material goods and resources or technological capabilities do not justify political or social superiority, the cultural or moral superiority of a people or a nation over another.

"This means, therefore, that any position which seeks to justify such superiority on an ideological or philosophical basis is not a valid position and must be rejected." The church leader went on to recommend dealings among peoples and nations held "in dignity and sovereignty" and founded on equality.

Turing to the matter of Third World development, John Paul affirmed that this process "has not exhausted itself though some, at times, may gain the impression that it is no longer receiving the priority it deserves." In another area of his statement to the diplomats, John Paul noted that, "many governments in the world today appear concerned with many other matters, such as inflation and military security." "Yet, despite the impressive level of economic growth which some developed nations have achieved over the past decade, mamy people are still conditioned by a poverty which means not only low earnings but also malnutrition, hunger, illiteracy, lack of education, unemployment, a persistent and lessened respect for life."

At this point the pontiff recalled his encyclical "Laborem Exercens," published September 14 last year, and insisted that "Integral human development deserves special attention because it plays a very important role in the great cause of international peace." "Peace throughout the world is possible only if there is peace within each country. Domestic peace will never be achieved unless each nation devotes the attention required for the promotion of just development to benefit all its citizens," the pope said.

In conclusion, John Paul called on the ambassadors present to encourage justice and to work toward the reconciliation and strengthening of solidarity among men "in a world and a continent so full of promise and yet so devastated by dissent, exploitation, injustice, misunderstanding, and a host of threats to peace."

At midday, John Paul went into the gardens of the nunciature and spoke to an estimated 200 members of the 2,000-strong Polish community in Nigeria as "the first of the Polish race to become a successor of Peter" and of what he described as the "state of war" in his native country. The pontiff, half-shielded from the blazing Nigerian sun by a baobab tree and the shade of the building, delivered his unprepared statement entirely in Polish.

Also on hand for the gathering was the Polish ambassador to Lagos, Witold Jurasz, the first Warsaw government representative to officially meet with the pope since the declaration of martial law in the Eastern European country on December 13.

John Paul explained that, "as the first of the Polish race to become a successor of Peter, not only Polish but Slav as well, I feel a special duty to my country and to all my compatriots." "The history of Poland and the church," the pope said, "prepared me in a certain sense to feel solidarity with all the other ntations of the world. It was not for nothing that the Poles always sought out alliances and fought for the freedom others, seeing it as their own.

"For this reason, I feel solidarity with men and nations suffering and discriminated against. It is easy for me to be with them all because I have learned since I was little to be with my nation, which has not had an easy history and is not having an easy time at present," John Paul said. The pontiff went on to say, "I will add that, being outside the country, almost always in Rome but elsewhere as well, I am profoundly living the events in my country, especially the more recent and difficult events, and I will bear witness to them aloud so that the Poles, as a nation, might have their rights recognized by their neighbors and by the nations they are linked to through recent history.

"I have said this in recent months and in the last weeks," the pope insisted, "and I have repeated this to all the representatives of the nations so that the rights of all peoples and all nations might be respected." The pope then said "Dear brothers and sisters, this is a heritage from many centuries. The centuries have taught us this, not only the human rights declaration made by the United Nations after the Second World War." "Since the Council of Constantine in 400, Polish ambassadors have adhered to these principles. One cannot be Polish without bearing within himself this heritage of the nation, which is addressed not only to our country but has a role in the entire world."

"I want to appeal to all of you to represent in Nigeria everything that is Polish. Contribute to that which is best in this nation, which has great human resources and is at the beginning of its historic phase, the federation of Nigeria. God help each of us to carry out this duty," John Paul concluded.

PCI'S PAJETTA SUMMARIZES VISIT TO ROMANIA

PM151505 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 7-8 Feb 82 p 9

[Vladimiro Odinzov interview with PCI directorate member Giancarlo Pajetta: "Pajetta Has Visited Bucharest: Ceausescu Does Not Wish To Break With Botteghe Oscure" -- date and place of interview not given]

[Text] Giancarlo Pajetta returned Friday from Bucharest, where he met with Ceausescu and other members of the Romanian Government and party -- the only ones so far to have wished to meet with a PCI delegation following the resounding break with Moscow.

[Question] When was this visit to Romania arranged?

[Answer] About 10 days ago. If you wish to know whether it was before or after the publication of the articles on the current controversy, I will tell you that it came before the article in KOMMUNIST, but after the article in PRAVDA.

[Question] Were you received as a heretic or as a revolutionary?

[Answer] As on other occasions, as a comrade

[Question] And what did you discuss?

[Answer] We conducted an extremely broad survey: Relations between our two parties, foreign policy, "problems of international communism." The Romanians dwelt greatly on disarmament, on removing the existing missiles and deploying no new missiles in Europe and on the need to involve all European countries in the negotiations on the missles. It seems essential to the Romanians that the possibility of this involvement, to use an expression of theirs, be found immediately in one way or another, and that the negotiations for nuclear reduction and then disarmament do not take place over Europe's head.

"A Process of Seeking"

I believe that this is also of interest to our country.

It poses the problem of a European initiative including all the countries on the continent, asking nobody to leave the existing alliances, but proposing as protagonists or at least as participants and regarding as a reality the Europe of the neutrals, of the Atlantic Alliance and of the Warsaw Pact. As I was told, it would be pointless to pose the problem of the search for a third way, of the controversy over existing political and social structures and of relations among countries and parties, because all this would be "resolved," or rather, eliminated, by a nuclear catastrophe.

If you ask me about essentials, I would say that this is highlighted in a phrase in the communique, when it says that "Unity of a new kind is necessary." To some extent this is in keeping with what we say about the need for a new internationalism which should in the first place envisage the existence of relations even when there is no identity of views and even when there are controversies and disputes: Something, therefore, which should have nothing to do with habits and kinds of organization which belong to the past, such as the Cominform or Comintern, and should reject certain, not always suppressed, inclinations to recreate something similar. This is why we would never agree to take part in a suggested communist conference.

Second, the need was emphasized for joint action on the problems of peace with the socialist and social democratic parties, thus lending the significance of international solidarity not solely to the relations, contacts and convergences found among the parties of Comintern origin which espouse the internationalist tradition and the teachings of Marx and Lenin.

[Question] But what exactly does "unity of a new kind" mean? "New" in comparison with what?

[Answer] In comparison with the conceptions which used to be espoused. Some people sometimes forget that there are no pulpits from which excommunications can be delivered, not even organizations heading a country, a state or a leading party.

[Question] However, in the final communique, among the topics discussed, there is the "problem of the international communist movement."

[Answer] It is an expression which we have not used for some time, because it gives the impression that there is an organization, a factor, which links us, for instance, with the Albanian communists, with whom, on the contrary, we cannot even speak.

[Question] Did you discuss Eurocommunism?

[Answer] Eurocommunism is a trend, the need for which is emphasized today by the fact that one element in the current controversy is the need to differentiate methods of political struggle and the possibility of building and living in a socialist society from the currently realized models.

[Question] But what relationship, what link is there today between Eurocommunism and the third way? The PCI today talks little about Eurocommunism and a great deal about the third way. Is it a qualitative change?

[Answer] Some communist parties -- and, in my opinion, also some which have not done so explicitly -- are realizing increasingly that an individual way is necessary because of conditions of political and social organization and because of experience of an individual democratic life. The need to state that the model of socialism where it is realized cannot be proposed for West Europe is recognized. It must be stated that social democracy is in a state of crisis and is questioning itself about its identity. All this has been called Eurocommunism, and one of its elements has also been that of emphasizing how, in recognizing this reality, pluralism was also recognized, and in it a role for the socialist and social democratic parties, which, on the other hand, are wondering about the need to find new ways. We, in asserting pluralism and a multiparty system, recognize all this and say so.

We recognize that in Europe the problems are posed differently from the way they are in the countries where socialism is realized: We recognize the crisis of social democracy and the fact that the social democratic parties themselves recognize it and are experiencing the turmoil of it. This necessitates the search for a third way, so I can see no conflict.

[Question] But many of these things were also contained in Eurocommunism.

[Answer] And indeed we do not believe that it is necessary to find something new every 6 or 3 months or every week to enable L'ESPRESSO to publish an article with a big photograph.

[Question] So what is the difference between the Eurocommunism of yesterday and the third way of today?

[Answer] Eurocommunism is the way in which the need is defined for West European communists to make it clear that they are not proposing either the model of realized socialism or being converted to a social democracy whose existing limits they pointed out, while recognizing at the same time a crisis in it which required a process of thorough renewal. It goes without saying that this raises the issue of a third way. When we talked about Eurocommunism we were basically rejecting the idea that "There is no third way" ["Tertiu, non datur"] and it is this "third way" that is now being referred to. When you say "Eurocommunism" you are already implying a "third way." It seems that there is a preference to discuss labels rather than substance.

There Must Be Participation

[Question] The fact remains that as long as you talked simply in terms of Eurocommunism there was a latent dissent with the CPSU but at least your dialogue continues. Now the "label" has led to an open conflict.

[Answer] When you raise the issue of Eurocommunism you implicitly raise the issue of the third way and in this effort to see what problems the workers movement must tackle to transform Western Europe in a socialist direction there is a research process that had led to a clarification of differences with respect to the existing models and to an explanation of their rejection. As this research has become more specific and the problems have been approached more completely and realistically -- and as, while all this has been taking place, certain steps which we consider regressive have been taken in the socialist countries -- so we have come to an open and polemical clash. This is partly because they see in our research a specification of some principles and aspects that they believe conflict with their political outlook and because they believe that our criticism lends substance to criticism of actions that they perform and that concern more than the choice of a model. In other words, we have not criticized and rejected a model simply because it is their specific model. We now have grounds in our criticism for stating that this model is unsuited not only to us but to them too. It is not that the Polish model, for instance, is unsuited to the Italians: It now seems clear that it did not suit Poland either.

[Question] How does Romania judge all this disagreement between the PCI and CPSU?

[Answer] In its position of autonomy it has simply decided to publish neither our article nor PRAVDA's. Every party, Bucharest says, has the right to express itself freely and differences of posture must prevent neither contacts nor convergences. It is a combination of problems that concerns every individual country and nobody is authorized to interfere. The religion of the ruler is the religion of the state: "We are Protestants and you are Catholics." Back in history this prompted people to say: "If we burn Catholics and you burn Protestants, it is our own concern."

[Question] Religious wars. They led to the collapse of empires.

[Answer] Permit me to say so, but this is the conclusion of religious wars. Before, there was the 30 Years' War. I hope that we will come not to wars, but to understandings.

PCI PAPER ON MARCHAIS REMARKS ON SOCIALIST BLOC

PM161059 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 5 Feb 82 p 16

[Franco Fabiani dispatch: "PCF Debates Its Strategy"]

[Excerpts] Paris -- Under the futuristic roof of the Saint Ouen Sports Center, Georges Marchais opened the 24th PCF Congress on Wednesday with a 5-hour report largely reiterating the same arguments as in the precongress theses, in an analysis of the party's policy which was the object of doubts, perplexity and disagreements, reflecting also in the precongress debate the trauma following the recent electoral setback. The secretary general sought to launch again the idea summarized in the slogan which will stand until 7 February above the rostrum at this congress: "Building Socialism in the Colors of France."

Socialism in France is viewed as the work of a "majority grouping of the people achieved by democratic means under the control of universal suffrage." It is this grouping which the PCF "wishes to build through struggle and unity." But if this is the socialism for France, Marchais nevertheless dwelt almost throughout the lengthy second part of his speech on the "East bloc countries' genuinely socialist nature," explaining that to abandon this assessment would be "to do the enemy a favor."

With a historical analysis which took up the issues of the "starting point," the difficult international context, and the fact that not everything can be done in 65 years and that it is "difficult for a people to progress from Muzhik to Sputnik," Marchais sought to demonstrate that the socialist countries "are not the hell which people wish to make us believe" and that "the changes effected by them in all fields have beneficial repercussions for all peoples."

However, at the same moment as saying that "there are universal fundamental criteria of socialism," he also maintained that "socialism in the colors of France cannot be and is not a socialism prefabricated elsewhere and repainted in the colors of the tricolor, and can only be a socialism for the French people." In his opinion, the socialist countries remain "a source of support for liberation struggles worldwide." "Like it or not," Marchais said, "the class struggle is worldwide. In this struggle the socialist countries play an essential role, hence, "however attentive we may be to the possibilities of France or of other European countries, and however important the processes of socialist transformation in this part of the world may be, we see nothing which could prompt us to believe that West Europe could set itself up as a model of world revolution." Eurocommunism is rightly viewed as "one of the manifestations of the ever increasing diversity of the world revolutionary movement," but from a viewpoint which places above everything solidarity with what is regarded as the sole essential force in the "world class struggle."

However, Marchais acknowledged that the East bloc societies have not resolved what he calls "the central issue of the democratization of social, economic and political life," which should be "the universal demand of which socialism is the bearer."

However, the PCF secretary general said that he is convinced that "in finding a solution to these problems, these countries will experience a new development," and acknowledged that where these "necessary adjustments" are not made, "blockages, tensions and crises" may be experienced.

Next Marchais broached the issue of Poland in the terms already known: "Difficulties and excesses have hampered the process of renewal.... We regret this.... The emergency measures with all their consequences have disturbed us..." but "we do not wish to promote internal conflict, although we hope for a peaceful and democratic solution which will promote a national understanding." And he concluded that "Our stance was correct and reasonable." The proof of this is the reply which he said he obtained from Jaruzelski 1 month ago, speaking of a return to normality.

COUNCIL SPOKESMAN CRITICIZES CORREIA'S STATEMENTS

LD172200 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] Major Vasco Lourenco today criticized the statements made by Internal Administration Minister Angelo Correia on the existence of a so-called insurrection situation on the 12th of this month during the strike sponsored by the General Conferation of Portuguese Workers-National Intersindical. Before the meeting of the Council of the Revolution began, Major Lourenco, currently acting as the council's spokesman, read a prepared press statement.

[Begin Lourenco recording] Not only are the data put out by the internal administration minister more than insufficient in themselves to characterize an insurrectional or subversive situation, as done by the minister of internal administration, but also some of the little evidence provided has been denied and is also losing credibility. The Council of the Revolution is not in possession of any information other than that which has been made public. As to the president of the republic, I believe that if the government were in possession of important information, it would have made it available to him. I do not belive, however, that the president of the republic is in possession of any important information because, due to the seriousness of this matter, I am certain that he would have called an extraordinary meeting of the Council of the Revolution to apprise it of what was going on.

Since to speak at a rally as a party member and to address the nation as a statesman are two different things, I take it that the internal administration minister did not mix up the two situations and that, in keeping with the responsibilities inherent to his post, he is in possession of sufficient information to have enabled him to state what he did in the manner that he did, which is strange in itself as such information -- should it exist -- was not conveyed to the person to whom such information should have been conveyed.

In view of this, I, the Council of the Revolution, and the entire Portuguese people hope that the internal administration minister will quickly make public all the information in his possession. Failure to do this will bring about a serious situation because the state is the one which will be discredited and -- as in the story of the shepherd who called wolf -- the internal administration minister runs the risk of being unable to convince anybody of the fact should a really serious situation arise in the country. [end recording]

Major Lourenco also admitted the possibility of the conduct of the media during the strike being discussed at today's meeting.

[Begin Lourenco recording] It is natural that the way in which the media were manipulated and the way in which facts were concealed during the strike of the 12th -- regarded as general strike by some and not by others -- may be discussed, due to the seriousness of what happened, at today's Council of the Revolution meeting. I consider such conduct similar, though in an opposite direction, to what happened in 1975. [end recording]

DATE SET FOR TRIAL OF PARLIAMENT ATTACKERS

LD111426 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 11 Feb 82

[Text] The Ministry of Defense has confirmed 19 February as the date fixed by the Supreme Council of Military Justice for the commencement of the trial on the events of 23 February 1981, a piece of news which we gave in the 1400 news bulletin and an official note which we broadcast 10 minutes ago as read by Lt Col Fernandez Monzon: [Begin Monzon recording] At a courtroom meeting this morning the Supreme Council of Military Justice has fixed Friday, 19 February 1982, at 1,000 for the commencement of the sessions in the public hearing of case 2-81 drawn up as a result of the events which culminated in the assault on the Congress of Deputies on 23 and 24 February 1981. The hearing will take place in the courtroom especially set up for the purpose at the headquarters of the Army Geographical Service in Campamento. [end recording]

MINISTRY ASKS MILITARY TO MAINTAIN ALERT

LD131820 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Text] The Ministry of the Interior has asked senior military officers to maintain a state of maximum alert over the next few weeks, especially during the court martial of those involved in 23 February 1981 attempted coup, as a precaution against possible attack on a senior military officer by a terrorist group.

BASQUE COMMUNIQUE CONDEMNS ETA 'TERROR TACTICS'

LD172300 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] The Euskadi Buru Batzar, the main executive body of the Basque National Party, has issued an official communique this evening noting the seriousness of the political significance of the latest attacks in the Basque country. The note says that the attacks have taken place when we are only a few hours away from the opening of the trial of those charged with the attempted coup on 23 February 1981. The Euskadi Buru Batzar says further that ETA has continued its terror tactics in order to acquire sufficient influence and to create a climate that is favorable to disorder and reaction during the military trial which begins in Madrid on Friday.

The communique says that the ETA's recent activities represent a clear attempt at destabilization and constitute the mainyard needed by the reactionary sectors and coup conspirators to justify acts that seek a return to the past. The Euskadi Buru Batzar adds that it is vital for all sectors of Basque society to condemn this terrible ETA strategy. ETA violence can only lead to the (?destruction) of democracy and the end of the autonomy statute.

PARTIES AGREE TO JOIN COALITION GOVERNMENT

LD171456 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1400 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] Central organs of three government parties have confirmed they will participate in the new government. The Party Council of the Social Democratic Party, the Center Party Commission and the Central Board of the Swedish People's Party decided unanimously to continue the present majority government basis. The People's Democrats are also meeting to decide their participation in government.

Heikki Kymaelaeinen reports by telephone from the Social Democratic Party Council: The Social Democratic Party decided some hours ago to participate in Kalevi Sorsa's third government. Just a moment ago the party executive committee, which has the right to nominate ministers, reached a decision. As is known, Kalevi Sorsa will be prime minister; the party elected Matti Ahde, chairman of the Social Democratic Diet Group, as minister of the interior; Jacob Soderman was elected minister of health and social affairs -- he also comes from the Diet group; Mauno Forsman was elected second minister of finance, according to previous plans; and Kaarina Suonio as second minister of education. These decisions were taken after about an hour's discussion, and we have no further details for the time being. This is Heikki Kymaelaeinen from the Social Democratic Party building.

[Announcer] In its statement today, the Social Democratic Party Council says the measures proposed in the government's draft program will, when implemented, significantly stimulate Finland's economy. Responsibility for fighting unemployment, in the view of the Social Democrats, lies with both society and enterprises. In the view of the Social Democratic Party Council the new government will have all the necessary preconditions to continue working until next year's Diet elections, if all the parties concerned approve the negotiated results concerning the majority government and if the government is unanimous about the most central issues.

New Government Takes Shape

LD171616 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The deciding bodies of the present government parties have confirmed the participation of the parties in the new government. The Center Party Commission has decided unanimously that the party will participate in the new government. The party bodies decided that the Center Party ministers in the government would be Taisto Tahkamaa, minister of agriculture and forestry; Esko Ollila, minister of trade and industry; Juhani Saukkonen, minister of defense; Mikko Jokela, second minister of the interior; and Marjatta Vaananen, second minister of health and social affairs.

The People's Democrats, too, have decided on their participation in the four-party government. The Finnish People's Democratic League [SKDL] board and parliamentary group and the Finnish Communist Party Politburo, meeting in the Parliament Building, explain their participation in the government by stating that a leftwing center government is the best alternative in the present international situation and in the deepening economic recession. The SKDL ministers in the new government will be Kalevi Kivisto, first minister of education; Jouko Kajanoja, who continues as minister of labor; and Jarmo Wahlstrom, minister of communications.

The Central Board and Parliamentary Group of the fourth government party, the Swedish People's Party [RKP], also decided unanimously today that the party would participate in the government. At the same time the RKP stresses the need for effective cooperation with the Center Party as the Social Democrats' influence in society increases.

The RKP's representatives in the new government will be the party's chairman, Par Stenback, foreign minister, and Christoffer Taxell, who continues as minister of justice.

Ahti Pekkala from the Center Party will be first minister of finance. He will also act as the prime minister's deputy. The new government is expected to be appointed within a couple of days.

PRO-EC CAMPAIGN BRINGS 'COMMUNISM' CHARGE

WA180930 Copenhagen INFORMATION in Danish 4 Feb 82 p 6

[Article by emc: "Greenlander EEC Opponents Are Called Communists by Proponents"]

[Text] The Greenlandic Organization of EC Proponents, in a dramatic two-page color ad in GRONLANDSPOSTEN (ATUAGAGDLIUTIT) on Wednesday, charged the EC opponents with having as their political goal the bringing about of "communism under the tutelage of the Russians." The ad marked a violent sharpening of tone in the Greenland campaign fight in advance of the plebiscite to be held on 23 February.

The pro-EC organization EAS [espansion unknown] consists mainly of the opposition party in the Greenland Parliament, the Attassut Party, which in December won in the election for the Danish Parliament with a vote result of 46.3 percent against the governing Siumut Party's 35.6 percent.

Siumut [in the campaign] is working with the Greenland labor union, SIK, and with the fishermen's and hunters' organization, KNAPK, as well as with two small leftwing parties. All of these have combined in forming Anisa, the Organization of EC Opponents.

In the Danish Parliament, Siumut has cooperated with the Socialist People's Party and the Social Democratic Party. In the [EAS] ad are pictured head of government Jonathan Motzfeldt and Anisa chairman Emil Johansen under the heading, "Anisa Is Lying." In the colored text block it said: "Nothing will be cheaper [if Greenland quits the EC], on the contrary, "everything will cost more," and then at the end, "Stop them now -- stop them always."

SJAASTAD DENIES NUCLEAR HARDWARE STOCKPILE

PM161649 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 9 Feb 82 p 8

[Text] Norwegian Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad has dismissed Soviet News Agency TASS allegations that stockpiled military materiel in Norway will be equipped for nuclear warfare. "Both the former and the present Norwegian Governments have made it clear that the contingency stockpiling of allied military equipment in Norway will accord with Norwegian base and nuclear policy. This means that only conventional ammunition and weapons intended for use with conventional ammunition will be stockpiled," the defense minister stressed.

In a comment to NRK [Norwegian Broadcasting Corporation] on Monday [1 February] He did not attempt to hide the fact that it is theoretically possible to equip some of the materiel for nuclear warfare. Under the terms of the agreement between the United States and Norway for the contingency stockpiling of heavy U.S. military materiel in Trondelag, the stockpiles will contain 155 mm howitzers, which could be prepared to fire nuclear shells. However, Norwegian authorities have repeatedly stressed that there are no plans to stockpile the equipment required for loading the howitzers with nuclear shells.

STORTING COMMITTEE VISIT TO U.S. TIMELY

PM171055 Olso AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 15 Feb 82 p 2

[Editorial: "Norwegian Visit to Washington"]

[Text] This week the Storting Foreign Affairs Committee will pay a visit to Washington at a most suitable time. It is a long time since the United States and its West European allies had so many problems to discuss and investigate and so many things to clear up. In Norway too many question marks are being attached to President Ronald Reagan's foreign policy. The Foreign Affairs Committee represents a body of Norwegian public opinion which has evinced mixed feelings when taking note of statements and actions orginating from President Reagan's immediate circle.

The committee contains members who are firmly fixed in their anti-U.S. prejudices, and they will remain so after their visit to the U.S. capital. Others are more open to information which can put them in a better position to understand Reagan's and his staff's actions. This does not have to mean that they will accept everything that they are told, but in the present complicated international situation it is important that Norwegian parliamentarians be given an opportunity to form a more subtle and balanced view of Reagan's United States. The impressions with which the committee will return from Washington are bound, therefore, to be an important factor in the future discussion of the attitude of our own country and that of Western Europe to the United States under Ronald Reagan's leadership.

It is safe to predict that the committee will especially concern itself with the U.S. role in Central America, principally in El Salvador. Those of our Storting representatives who are involved in foreign policy share the concern which is making itself felt over what is happening in this tiny "banana republic". Massacres which have cost the lives of thousands of men, women and a civil war which has put thousands more to flight paint a picture of a country in chaos and dissolution. In Europe people are paying most attention to reports which hold government troops responsible for the terrible, bloody misdeeds. An obvious tendency toward one-sided "news reporting" undoubtedly gives a distorted picture of this bitter internal conflict. The guerrillas are also guilty of violations, and this does not give greater justification to their fight to eradicate social and economic class differences in the towns and the countryside. Everyone condemns the mass slaughter of civilians taking place in El Salvador. Both sides have blood on their hands. But in our vexation at these inhuman conditions it is easy to forget that it is not simply one of the superpowers which has intervened in the conflict. Via Cuba and Nicaragua arms for the Marxist guerrillas flow into the country from the Soviet Union. The United States is not giving its aid to the Duarte government in order to halt a process toward democracy, but to prevent developments which could make this part of the American continent a field of operations for lackeys loyal to Moscow. In the superpower perspective it is a communist attempt to win a vital U.S. area of interest.

The United States deserves criticism. But responsible circles in Washington could also do with listening to reproachful voices. The group of Norwegian parliamentarians will probably not spare the rod, but it must in its turn be open and receptive to the Americans' explanations and justifications of the motives behind their El Salvador policy. The Norwegian-U.S. "confrontation" in Washington should be useful for /both/ [word in italics] sides.

[Text] The following official statement was released today: Greek Government reports about possible developments in the Cyprus issue have made necessary an urgent meeting between Greek Prime Minister Papandreou and President Kiprianou. The statement further says: President Kiprianou will leave for Athens tomorrow for talks with the Greek prime minister. Briefing statements, the statement concludes, will be released at the end of the two leaders' talks.

U.S. HUMAN RIGHTS PAPER 'LIES' ON CYPRUS

NC121548 Nicosia THE CYPRUS WEEKLY in English 12-18 Feb 82 p 1

["Viewpoint" column]

[Text] U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig continued to wax hot all this week during the Madrid European Security Conference about the violation of human rights in Poland. "It is not surprise that the guilty try to evade exposure for their wrongs. They will hear the truth anyway, no matter how much they wish to hide it", he declared at one stage. Haig should have had these words in mind when submitting to congress his department's annual report on human rights worldwide. In its references to both Cyprus and Turkey, this official U.S. report blatantly avoids exposure of the wrongs committed by Turkey, both in Turkey itself and in Cyprus. A mere sin of omission might be excused. The report goes out of its way to lie deliberately however, and to whitewash Turkey, covering up all the gross violations of human rights committed by it every day. In effect Haig is guilty of trying to mislead congress. The Cyprus Government should make sure that congress hears the truth anyway, no matter how much Haig wishes to hide it. The mere announcement by the Foreign Ministry that the Cyprus ambassador in Washington has been instructed to make the necessary demarches is hardly adequate.

The massive continuing violation of human rights in Cyprus by Turkey is tabulated in great detail in the report of the Human Rights Commission of the Council of Europe. The Cyprus Government should make sure that the United States Congress is aware of this report as the clearest expose of Haig's lies and hypocritical concern about human rights.

U.S. PRO-TURKEY POLICY REMAINS UNCHANGED

NC180922 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 18 Feb 82 p 5

[From the "Positions" column: "Pro-Turkish...."]

[Text] The Pro-Turkish U.S. policy remains the same. It has not been influenced either by the military dictatorship imposed in Turkey or by the invasion in Cyprus. For the United States, Turkey remains its "beloved child" which, although naughty, continuously gathers always the same "love". Senator Tower's statements during his recent visit to Ankara are proof of these tactics. The Republican senator considers it more or less certain that the congress will sanction President Reagan's proposal to increase U.S. aid to Turkey by $115 million in 1983. He also blatantly said that this aid is being granted for the modernization of the Turkish armed forces and that this is "only the first step" in Washington's future economic and military aid to Turkey. What the U.S. senator said with great certainty is very revealing of the U.S. intentions toward Turkey. The question for us remains: Why does the United States shut its eyes to what Turkey has done in Cyprus? The answer must be looked for in U.S. strategic and other interests in Turkey and, more generally, in the region. Therefore, we must derive the conclusion that we must not hope for a change in U.S. policy toward Turkey, and this conclusion will lead us to new orientations.

VIGILANCE NEEDED TO OPPOSE IMPERIALISM

[Editorial: "Cyprus Must Not Get Implicated"]

[Excerpts] The Cypriot people have been concerned about the existence of military bases on our island since 1950, when the British decided to establish their primary air springboard for the Middle East. Since then, our people have felt that the colonialists' strategic interest in Cyprus would make their liberation struggle difficult. Life during the last 30 years has confirmed our people's fears. Without exaggeration, all the hardships that Cyprus underwent during that time were directly or indirectly connected with the existence of foreign bases on the island. Unfortunately, for a long time Cyprus' strategic location has drawn the interest of another imperialist force, the United States, that managed to infiltrate the area by substantively displacing Britain and France from the Near and Middle East.

The imperialists have very little respect for the interests and wishes of the people for peace and security. Our people are concerned about the United States deploying the rapid deployment force in our area, and when Thatcher's Conservative government openly declares that it will endorse this aggressive force. Our people are concerned because they see new dangers of changing the British bases into NATO bases and using them against friendly neighboring people. Our people also understand that the perpetuation of the faits accomplis of the Turkish occupation is planned and prepared to serve the imperialists' strategic plans in Cyprus.

Reports in the Athens newspaper ETHNOS confirm previous charges about the concentration in Cyprus -- both at the Dhekelia and Akrotiri bases -- of new U.S. radioelectronic spying installations. We have repeatedly stressed that this and any other use of the British bases by the U.S. military are illegal and even contrary to the establishment treaty that was imposed by the British colonialists in 1960 based on the Zurich-London agreement.

Today, when the situation in Europe and the Middle East is very tense, Cyprus, as a country belonging to the Nonaligned Movement, must not allow the unhesitating imperialists to implicate it in their new adventurous Middle East plans. The government and the patriotic democratic parties must understand that Cyprus' vital interests are at stake, even its existence and future, if it is used as an imperialist base against neighboring nonaligned countries. The movement for the abolition of foreign bases and the withdrawal of foreign troops exists worldwide and we can, as a small state, find strong international support from practically all democratic, nonaligned and socialist countries. However, in order to convince world public and friendly neighboring countries, we must be categorical and consistent in the demand that Cyprus should not be used as an imperialist spy base and as a military springboard. Both the government and the people must remain vigilant not to allow new "faits accomplis" that forecast fresh calamities for our people.

DAILY SAYS TURKS HAVE BUILT HELICOPTER AIRPORT

NC180814 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 18 Feb 82 p 8

[Text] The Turks have built a small temporary airport in the vicinity of Asha village that will be used exclusively by helicopters. Authoritative government circles were informed about this. Meanwhile, according to information received from authoritative sources, a select "gurkhas" detachment of the British army has arrived at the British bases of Akrotiri and Episkopi in the last 2 weeks. The reason for their presence and the period of time they will remain at the bases is unknown.

PAPANDREOU MEETS WITH U.S. SENATOR TOWER

NC162046 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] This evening Prime Minister Papandreou received John Tower, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and had a talk with him that lasted about half an hour. The meeting was also attended by U.S. Ambassador Stearns and Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos. During the prime minister's talk with Senator Tower, a general review was made of all the problems connected with Greek-Turkish relations, NATO, Greek-U.S. relations, the bases issue, detente and disarmament, and East-West positions.

ARAB AMBASSADORS THANK PAPANDREOU FOR UN VOTE

NC121651 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] Prime Minister Papandreou was visited today at Kastri by the Arab Ambassadors Council in Athens, headed by the dean of Arab ambassadors, Lebanese Ambassador Suhayl Shammas, and the ambassadors of Syria, 'Ali Hasan al-Madani; Jordan, Khalid al-Matada; and Iraq, Hasan ad-Din al-'Ali; and PLO representative Shawqi Armali.

The Arab Ambassadors Council officially thanked Papandreou for Greece's exemplary stance at the UN General Assembly that helped make possible the approval of Syria's proposal for the condemnation of Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN ON RELATIONS WITH USSR

NC170944 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 16 Feb 82 p 8

[Text] The government has no information about a "Soviet opening" toward Greece. This arises from what the government spokesman said last night in answer to a question regarding press reports -- the most recent one in a progovernment paper last Sunday -- that the "opening" to Moscow will be impressive and will deal with certain crucial points in Greek-Turkish differences, in addition to bilateral relations.

Specifically, the spokesman said that Greek-Soviet relations are very good and are continuously developing. He added: At the same time, the Soviet Union, as a great power, is interested in peace in the eastern Mediterranean, and it shows particular interest in the Cyprus issue. But, he said, beyond this there is nothing else.

SPOKESMAN REPLIES TO AVEROF CHARGES

NC162253 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2200 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] In a live 30-minute speech on ERT [Greek Radio-Television] this evening at 2130, Averof, leader of the official opposition, commented on the first 100 days of the country's government by PASOK. Averof alleged that the state had turned into a one-party state and specifically criticized the government's foreign and economic policies.

After the official opposition leader's speech on television, the government spokesman stated the following: New Democracy failed as a government; today it has failed as an opposition. We have listened to Averof's apologia and to his permanent and monotonous alarmism.

But the leader of the official opposition has not yet understood that the people have denounced these methods and have put his party on the sidelines of history.

In reply to the government spokesman's statement, a New Democracy spokesman said: One's reply to all these things is that PASOK did indeed succeed as the opposition: It succeeded in deceiving many men of good will who believed in its endless promises; but it miserably failed as a government -- in fact, before even 4 months had passed. The government's failure is quite obvious to everyone.

Paper Reports Averof Speech

NC171653 Athens NEWS in English 17 Feb 82 pp 3, 12

[Text] Mr Evangelos Averof, leader of the main opposition party, New Democracy, commented last night on Prime Minister Papandreou's speech to the PASOK members of Parliament.

Mr Averof said that he was pleased to have the opportunity to speak on television, and that it was right that opposition members should be allowed to make replies in the media.

So many things, Mr Averof said, have happened during the first 100 days of PASOK's rule that it was with both agony and interest that he awaited the premier's speech. He had hoped that the premier's speech would be moderate, but this was not so, he said.

Mr Averof criticized the government's policy of replacing officials with what he called "obscure greenguards." He disapproved of the government's attitude towards the church and bemoaned the invasion of the Greek Confederation of Workers by PASOK ideologists.

The government, Mr Averof continued, had completely mis-managed its farming policy and had made the farmer's lot more difficult.

The promises of change were very serious, he said, and had not at all been fulfilled. The only change that he had noticed had been one for the worse.

Mr Averof criticised Papandreou for not going into more detail about the economy in his address to the PASOK MP's. Too much time was spent dwelling on the past and not enough on the present and the future.

The continuous charges against new democracy were, Mr Averof continued, groundless and misleading. Mr Papandreou, he said, forgot to go into detail about the international crisis. He also forgot to mention that in the seven years under New Democracy life had improved considerably. "He (Papandreou) said that we spent too much money. He forgot that when he was in opposition he wanted us to spend more," Mr Averof said.

Mr Averof painted a gloomy picture of the near future but reminded the public that New Democracy was always at hand to help save Greece.

A government representative referring to the speech made by the opposition leader Mr E. Averof said that: "The New Democracy failed as government and today fails as an opposition."

PAPER REPORTS ON EFFORTS TO UNDERMINE PASOK

NC151005 Athens KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 14 Feb 82 pp 1, 2

[By G. Massavetas]

[Text] During the past fortnight there has been a broad campaign to undermine PASOK with a parallel establishment of a political organization which will benefit from this erosion, hoped for and expected by the inspirers and executors of this campaign. The government is well aware of this operation, and yesterday it hastened to fire off its first "warning salvo."

It is characteristic that Deputy Minister to the Prime Minister, D. Maroudhas, who usually avoids making general statements on newspapers, launched a detailed attack against the magazine TAKHIDROMOS.

When asked about a report in this magazine which attempts to describe the government's policy toward the Arab world as unproductive and which states that the attempt to find capital in the Arab world has failed, Maroudhas specifically replied:

"The photographic magazine TAKHIDROMOS often publishes 'inaccurate' information related to the government and its work. To date it has often reported the transfer of ministers, presented others as failures and has reported government reshuffles. These reports, however, were never confirmed."

The report in question stated: "The visit of the governor of the Bank of Greece, Arsenis, to certain Arab states -- with Iraq as the first stop -- in an effort to get a loan of $500 million, has been fruitless."

The article concludes with a general condemnation of the overtures of the PASOK government toward the Arab countries and declares that the government cannot rely upon the "divided" Arab world and its "mutual hatreds."

At the same time EXORMISI also condemns this report, emphasizing that "ventures toward the Arabs will be continued contrary to the hopes of commentators who want to present the Arab states as "dissatisfied' and 'reserved' as a result of the Greek Government's ties with the PLO and as a result of its ideological credo."

This commentary is in answer to the TAKHIDROMOS report, according to which: "An additional reason for dissatisfaction, primarily among 'rightist Arabs' (Saudi Arabia, the Emirates, Egypt, and so forth) are the close ties developed by the Greek Government with Yasir 'Arafat's PLO as well as certain reservations of certain circles arising from the 'Marxist-like' character of the Greek Government."

The way in which these press reports were countered by the prime minister himself, in his address to the movement's parliamentary group, was milder. In this address Papandreou indirectly referred to a report in the newspaper TO VIMA on Sunday criticizing the PASOK government generally and Papandreou personally of not implementing their promises to the people and of converting the public services "into a party machine."

This specific report, which caused the prime minister's wrath, is attributed by his aides to the fact that "the government did not submit to pressures for the purpose of promoting certain personalities within the government and the state machinery."

A strong impression was created also by the fact that nearly simultanesouly another weekly magazine, EPIKAIRA, this week also carried a nearly identical article. This magazine is well known for its rightist position and for its pro-Israeli and anti-Arab policy. The report was even based on untrue allegations, since the government never entrusted Arsenis with any such mission. As Maroudhas explained, what the government aims at is not to get loans from the Arabs but to attract capital in joint Greek-Arabian investments.

While all these reports criticizing the government were being published, it was officially announced by the Arabs themselves that considerable progress has already been achieved in this sector.

The government, in any event, appears to expect continuation of this war of attribution, but not exclusively "with blows from the right." It considers it certain that in the near future there will be intensified "leftist" criticism -- at a time when it has already stressed such expressions in the recent past -- from newspapers which attempt to provoke the multifaceted foreign policy of Papandreou.

According to the evaluations of authoritative PASOK personalities, these double blows are aimed at confining the popular base of PASOK with the hope of making the movement lose its self-supporting character, thus making it more susceptible to "blackmail" to force it to "cooperate." At the same time, efforts are afoot to concoct the "cooperating movement" with a "West European social democratic" character. Political observers place another attempt, undertaken by a traditionally rightist newspaper to strike at "new democracy" with articles undermining its leadership, within this framework of efforts to create this new force.

The former governor of the Agrarian Bank of Greece, Adhamandios Pepelasis, closely related to a well-known publishing conglomerate, who last April openly involved himself in the preparations to establish a "purely central movement," is now with extreme discretion and many reservations moving toward creating a party.

It was confirmed by circles friendly to him that in March Pepelasis is due to visit London, where he is scheduled to meet Roy Jenkins, former chairman of the EEC. This "meeting" has special significance, because Jenkins is the head of the centrist Social Democratic Party, which was created by defectors from the British Labor Party, and which cooperates with the Liberal Party.

While the first "exploratory" moves by Pepelasis created the impression he would be cooperating with a section of "New Democracy" and more specifically with the "Boutos group," the scenario appears to have suddenly changed in the middle of the week. In other words, circles close to Pepelasis are leaking the report that "in no case is he going to touch the official 'New Democracy' movement" from which, however, he is trying to attract voters in the same way he attempts to attract voters from "disgruntled PASOK followers."

Behind this refusal to make contact, however, also lies the fact that Boutos, after the intervention of a political personality, stopped any moves toward making contact during the past 10 days. It became known, in other words, that a political personality with the expressed desire to maintain the unity of "New Democracy" exerted his influence to convince Boutos to postpone any activities within the party, at least for now.

It must be noted that severe pressure was brought on the government to keep Pepelasis at the head of the Agrarian Bank and P. Khristodhoulou at the head of the National Bank. This pressure, however, failed. This PASOK refusal to accept such pressure obviously bothered certain strong press circles.

This is the first time that the heads of the great banks and organizations as well as certain ministers -- primarily of financial ministries -- have not been selected under dictates from strong publishers. These circles stressed that, right from the first months of the new government's life, leading personalities started an underground campaign against it in the form of reprisals, with blows coming sometimes from the "right" and sometimes from the "left."

VISITING SANDINISTS VIEW BILATERAL RELATIONS

NC150904 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 14-15 Feb 82 p 12

["Exclusive" interview granted to EXORMISI correspondent St. Nikolopoulos by Sandinist personalities on a visit to Greece -- date not given]

[Text] A lightning 24-hour visit to Greece was undertaken by Sandinist front representatives (Antonio Jarkin Toledo), the front's official on relations with West Europe, and Ernesto Jose Fonseca Pasos, Nicaraguan ambassador to Rome. During their visit the two Nicaraguan representatives met Papoulias, deputy foreign minister and secretary of PASOK's committee on international relations, and a delegation of that committee comprised of Acting Secretary V. Konstandeas and members M. Koutoulis and Kh. Stavrakis.

The purpose of the visit was to strengthen relations between the two movements and establish a climate of cooperation. This first Sandinist visit to Greece gave EXORMISI the opportunity to have a short interview with the two Central American revolutionaries, which emphasized the harsh struggle of the Nicaraguans for a nonaligned policy away from cold war blocs.

Question: What are the main difficulties with which the movement in Nicaragua is now faced, and what are its future prospects?

Answer by (Antonio J. Toledo): The economic problem is the gravest problem we are faced with, since the economy was destroyed by the war and is now being reconstructed on a new foundation. The second difficulty consists of the Reagan policy at all levels against the revolution. The effectiveness of the revolution, however, is a guarantee of overcoming these difficulties.

Question: How do you view Reagan's policy in relation to Mexico's position, as it was also presented in the joint Mitterrand-Portillo communique?

Answer by (Antonio J. Toledo): The Reagan policy fundamentally aims at binding us to a specific "bloc." By contrast, policy as expressed in the Mitterrand-Portillo communique helps us implement a nonaligned policy.

Question: How realistic is this foreign policy, bearing in mind your geopolitical position, and how can it be achieved?

Answer by (Antonio J. Toledo): Success of the nonaligned policy also depends upon the degree to which Europe will be prepared to help toward this end -- in other words, to what degree Europe will be prepared to do so for its own sake and at the same time to help international cooperation toward a policy removed from cold war blocs. North-South dialogue is, naturally, something which we want. We do not, however, think that this is sufficient. We desire discussion with Europe, and we are waiting for it to respond.

Question: In other words, there has been no response from Europe?

Answer by (Antonio J. Toledo): There is a desire in Europe, but the Reagan policy wants to smash every link between Central America and Nicaragua with Europe so that it can lead us into a specific bloc. It prefers us to be within the Eastern bloc instead of being nonaligned because, in their opinion, such a policy would be a very bad example for the Third World. Under the anticommunist campaign which they are waging, it is much easier for them to strike at someone who belongs to the Eastern bloc.

Question: How do you view your nonaligned policy in relation to PASOK?

Answer by (Antonio J. Toledo): We are very pleased, because PASOK is in authority. Naturally, we have not had the necessary meetings we would have liked with the movement. Greece, however, is much closer to us than the other European countries, particularly because of its recent experience under the dictatorship. We hope Greece will objectively view the situation in Nicaragua and in Central America. This, in any event, is the reason why we came here, to exchange views and experiences and to proceed toward further strengthening of our relations.

Question: I would now like to ask you about the situation in El Salvador and Central America.

Answer by (Antonio J. Toledo): The Salvadoran Government cannot survive without U.S. assistance. The strength and popularity of the movement is far too great. Naturally, the more the movement increases, the greater becomes the possibility of U.S. intervention. In case of a Vietnamization, however, we believe that they will have to face a reaction at home.

Question: Consequently, is such an eventuality to be excluded?

Answer by (Antonio J. Toledo): There is no immediate danger of an open intervention. The United States, however, can undertake various covert interventions. It could, for example, send mercenaries from neighboring countries. All this, however, is taken into consideration by the movement.

Answer by Ernesto J. Pasos: We must stress on behalf of Nicaragua that the United States has unleashed a poisonous propaganda campaign against the Sandinists, that the regime is a racist regime, that it has launched a racist war (?) [as published] for the annihilation of the blacks who live on Nicaragua's Atlantic shore. We have concrete indications that Somozist National Guards raid from Honduras, and that they use photographs of the massacres they perpetrate for propaganda purposes against Nicaragua.

We must further state that approximately 3 weeks ago Costa Rica, Honduras and El Salvador signed a joint agreement at San Jose, Costa Rica, for "the protection of democracy in Central America." Over and above its hypocrisy you can understand the significance of this agreement.

Note: Costa Rican President Carazo, who signed the agreement, lost the election a few days ago (30 percent) and authority was taken over by Monge (58 percent), who is a friend of the Sandinists. It is, therefore, natural that Costa Rica will become an axis for Central American developments. At the same time, the fourth COPPPAL [Permanent Conference of Latin American Political Parties] conference will convene in Managua on 19 February with the problems of Central America in relation to the dangerous situation for world peace as the main topic.

TURKMEN PESSIMISTIC ON TIES WITH GREECE

PM171609 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 10 Feb 82 p 9

[Arne B. Thorbjoernsen report: "Turkey Sees Relations With Greece in Gloomy Light"]

[Text] Ankara, February [dateline as published] -- Relations between Turkey and Greece showed signs of improvement in the initial period after the military takeover in Ankara almost 18 months ago. In recent months a flood of insults and bitter accusations has been exchanged between the two countries on either side of the Aegean Sea. There has been a clear deterioration in neighborly relations on NATO's southern flank.

AFTENPOSTEN asked Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen about his view of the situation.

"Relations are now significantly different than they were under the previous Greek Government. One of the reasons for this is Andreas Papandreou's rhetoric. A deeper cause is the fact that Papandreou has broken off the dialogue between Greece and Turkey. Of course, this has a bad effect on the general atmosphere of relations between the two countries. We have adopted a very moderate attitude to the Greek behavior. In short, we could say that we are patiently waiting for Greece to realize that negotiations benefit both countries. But in the meantime we want to make it clear that Greece cannot initiate some unilateral action or produce a fait accompli which could harm the results of negotiations."

An example of the latter are the Turkish allegations that Greece has plans to exclude Turkey from large sections of the Aegean Sea by extending its territorial waters to 12 miles. This would reduce international waters in the Aegean Sea from 56 to 26 percent. Turkey has warned its allies, who have not found any confirmation that Ankara's fears have any foundation. However, it is symptomatic of the tense relations that Athens has claimed that "Turkish expansionism" is a threat to Greek security. In addition, in recent months both sides have accused each other of military escalation on Cyprus, without any seeming justification for the accusations.

There is nothing to indicate that a turning point is close at hand. When asked about future developments Foreign Minister Turkmen said: "Let us put it like this: We see little reason for optimism."

COOPERATION WITH ROMANIA TO BE EXPLORED

TA171634 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1555 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 17 Feb (AA) -- Director General of Consular Affairs at the Foreign Ministry Zeki Gonen will go to Bucharest Saturday, 20 Februay, to reciprocate a visit by his Romanian counterpart last April.

Talks to be held between Turkish and Romanian teams of experts through 26 February will cover the implementation of existing bilateral agreements on consular affairs, judicial aid, and visa waiver.

A team of Turkish contractors left for Bucharest Wednesday to confer with Romanian contractors on possibilities for joint ventures in third countries. The team was headed by the deputy director general of the treasury.

INDUSTRY MINISTER LEAVES FOR MEETING IN PAKISTAN

TA122123 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] Industry and Technology Minister Mehmet Turgut left this evening for Islamabad to attend the Islamic industry cooperation ministerial advisory meeting. In a statement to Turkish Radio and Television in Istanbul this morning, Turgut expressed the hope that Turkish businessmen will conclude new agreements with Pakistan. Pointing out that there are strong friendship ties based on history between the two countries, Turgut said that cooperation in every field will be developed with Pakistan. A delegation composed of industrialists and businessmen will also attend the Islamic industry cooperation ministerial advisory meeting in Islamabad. A three-man delegation led by the Turkish Cypriot industry minister that will represent the TFSC at the meeting also left for Islamabad on the same plane.

HIGH COUNCIL TO ADVISE ON FOREIGN POLICY

TA161721 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1630 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 16 Feb (AA) -- A decree issued in today's OFFICIAL GAZETTE stipulates that Turkey's foreign policy goals will be henceforth determined by a high foreign policy planning council. The council will be authorized to study and make the necessary recommendations in connection with the implementation of foreign policy in general as well as in the event of extraordinary developments. The decree on the formation, tasks and functioning of the Foreign Ministry High Political Planning Council prepared by the Foreign Ministry was published in today's Official Gazette and went into effect.

According to the decree, the council will be composed of the Foreign Ministry's secretary general, who will head the council, and six members to be appointed by the foreign minister from former ambassadors that have served abroad or deputy general secretaries. The council will convene on a weekly basis. However, the Foreign Ministry secretary general will be authorized to ask for additional meetings. Resolutions in the council will be adopted by a majority vote. The council will be authorized to request from any of its members to prepare advisory studies on current foreign policy issues.

POLAND ISSUE DISCUSSED AT TURKISH SYNPOSIUM

TA161705 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1620 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 16 Feb (AA) -- A symposium on "developments in Poland" sponsored by the Turkish Confederation of Labour "Turkis" opened in Ankara Tuesday with a statement by Professor Sadi Irmak, speaker of the Consultative Assembly.

Irmak noted Turkey was particularly interested in the fate of Poland because of historic ties. Professor Aydin Yalcin believed developments in Poland showed the importance of basic rights. Journalist Metin Toker believed the Polish case indicated the acceptance by the Communist Party of Poland that it could no longer govern the country alone. Turk-Is Organization Secretary Orhan Ercelik expressed the confederation's support for the Solidarity organization. He rejected attempted comparisons between Poland and Turkey.

[Text] Ankara, 17 Feb (AA) -- The Consultative Assembly Tuesday approved the agreement between Turkey and the Islamic Conference Organization for the establishment in Istanbul of a research center on Islamic history, art and culture.

MALTA

ALGERIA'S PRIME MINISTER PAYS OFFICIAL VISIT

LD130422 Algiers Domestic Service in Arabic 2300 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] Prime Minister Mohamed Ben Ahmed Abdelghani, member of the Political Bureau, left Malta after a 24-hour official visit at the invitation of his Maltese counterpart Mr Dom Mintoff. The second day of the Algerian delegation's visit was spent in seeing a number of economic achievements and projects in Malta. Following the visit, a press statement was released noting the atmosphere of friendship and mutual understanding in which the talks between the two delegations took place. The talks dealt with bilateral relations and issues of common concern. In the political field, the two sides expressed their satisfaction with the quality of bilateral relations and they affirmed their will to continue these relations. The Maltese delegation expressed gratitude to the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria for the support it has always given concerning Malta's decision to terminate foreign military bases and opt for a neutrality based on the principles and aims of nonalignment. The Algerian delegation renewed its support for Malta's desire to adopt neutrality on the basis of the principles and the aims of nonalignment in accordance with the Maltese Government declaration of 14 May 1981.

The Algerian delegation expressed its desire to strengthen trade, economic, scientific and technical cooperation on the basis of mutual benefit in accordance with the agreements of 1978-79. The two sides expressed their concern about the presence of the foreign forces in the Mediterranean and in this connection they agreed to continue activity to make this an area of peace and cooperation between the littoral countries of the Mediterranean liquidating the hotbeds of tension. The delegations reaffirmed the need for all the Mediterranean countries to take part in all consultations that concern the area. The Algerians expressed deep appreciation for the initiatives of Malta toward embodying the above-mentioned principles at the seminar on European Security and Cooperation currently being held in Madrid.

Reviewing the developments in the Middle East, the delegations strongly condemned the recent Israeli decisions to annex the Golan Heights. The two sides expressed their conviction that peace and security can be established in the area only through the recovery of the occupied Arab areas and the restoration of the national rights of the Palestinian people under the leadership of the PLO, which is their sole legitimate representative, and also their right to establish an independent sovereign state. Algeria and Malta reject and condemn all the agreements which seek to establish a separate peace.

The two delegations reviewed the situation in Northwest Africa and reaffirmed their total support for the resolutions of the OAU and the Implementation Committee which seek the right of the Saharan people to self-determination. In this connection, they reaffirmed their unchanging support for holding direct negotiations between the two quarrelling sides -- Morocco and the Polisario front -- in accordance with the resolutions of the OAU and the United Nations. They expressed their conviction that the principles and aims of nonalignment will remain the suitable means for strengthening the political and economic ability of the forces of progress in their struggle against imperialist, Zionism, racism and exploitation in all forms. These principles and aims will also remain the means which enable developing countries to play a more effective role in the family of nations and for the sake of establishing democracy in international relations. After expressing their satisfaction with the progress achieved since the meeting of the joint committee in April 1981, the two sides studied the comprehensiveness and means of strengthening industrial and trade cooperation. They agreed to exchange delegations of experts to study trade exchanges and draw up lists of the projects that may be studied during the meetings of the joint committee.

STRONGER EEC LINE AGAINST SOUTH AFRICA DEMANDED

PM180931 Brussels LE SOIR in French 11 Feb 82 p 8

[Serge de Waersegger report: "The Countries of Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific Bring the Ten Into Their Struggle Against South Africa"]

[Text] Sixty-one countries of Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific (ACP) are linked to the European Community by the Lome Convention. Up until now, this link concerned primarily economic and development questions. Since last week, it has assumed definite political overtones. The joint committee which administers this treaty at state representation level (parliaments, national delegations...) endorsed a particularly hardline motion which unambiguously aligns the European Community behind the countries of black Africa in their conflict with South Africa. Certainly, this type of committee has [only] consultative status. However, on one hand this resolution was adopted by 102 votes to 5 and on the other the European delegation was made up of 62 European parliamentarians of all political tendencies: These are two facts which lend this stance definite significance. It may also be noted that this resolution, adopted at Harare (formerly Salisbury) in Zimbabwe calls for the sole country still maintaining cultural relations with South Africa to sever these relations. Belgium is the country in question.

During this Harare meeting, held 1-5 February, the Europeans and the ACP associates had technical discussions of course: the problem of sugar cane, the question of oil supplies for poor countries, the expansion of cultural cooperation.... However, it was obvious from the start that the session would take a political turn. The venue for this meeting in what was formerly Rhodesia, at the very heart of the countries on the so-called "frontline" against South Africa, and the report due to be made there by a European-ACP committee of enquiry which is touring precisely these countries naturally brought to the forefront the political problem of the EEC's attitude to the Republic of South Africa. It is not the first time that this question has been brought up in meetings with the Lome Convention countries. It has been reflected generally in well-meaning motions which, on the European side, have rarely gone beyond a press release, an exception being the decision in September 1981 which brought about the dispatch of the above-mentioned committee of enquiry. What is striking this time is the hardline tone and the concrete aspect of the adopted resolution.

The Search for Economic Independence.

The basis of the economic difficulties of the countries of southern Africa (all of which are parties to the Lome Convention apart from Angola and Mozambique) lies in the conflict-ridden proximity of South Africa and of the struggle against the apartheid regimes, first during the Zimbabwe war of independence and in the confrontations with the Pretoria government today. In particular, the insidious war which exists in the south of Angola poses a serious problem of refugees, not to mention devastated towns and highways. Zambia is experiencing a difficult postwar period (following the Rhodesia war) with the reestablishment of lines of communication to Zimbabwe, the rehousing of refugees and the reexploitation of the vast mined areas. Finally, the economies of the frontline countries are often so interwoven with the economy of South Africa that any retaliatory measures against Pretoria are likely to rebound on them. Thus, the joint committee asked the ten to aid these countries financially so as to resolve the concrete problems caused by the war situation, and to enable them to detach themselves economically from their white neighbor. The resolution did not confine itself to the economic sphere. It condemned apartheid, the occupation of Namibia and the acts of "aggression, subversion and terrorism against independent African states, aimed at destabilizing the whole of central Africa." While concurring with the embargoes decreed by the United Nations against the Pretoria regime, the resolution calls especially for an end to the expansion of economic contacts with this government. A special watchdog commission will be created to keep an eye on the policies pursued by EEC member-states toward South Africa. In the sphere of economic sanctions, a study will also be carried out to determine their probable effect. It is, in point of fact, a question of avoiding giving a fillip to industrial renewal in the country being "punished." This resolution will now be transmitted to the council of ministers administering the Lome Convention so that it may make it enforceable.

PRESIDENT RECEIVES POLISH FOREIGN TRADE MINISTER

[Text] Yesterday President Dr Rudolf Kirchschlaeger received for talks Polish Foreign Trade Minister Tadeusz Nestorowicz, who is paying an official visit to Austria. The reception was also attended by Dr Franciszek Adamkiewicz, Polish ambassador to Austria, as well as by Witold Bien, vice-minister of finance, and Dr Josef Staribacher, federal minister of trade, commerce and industry.

TALKS OPEN ON NEW CREDIT LIMIT FOR USSR

AU171234 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 17 Feb 82 p 7

[Text] Yesterday talks opened in Vienna with a delegation of the Soviet Trade Ministry about granting a new credit limit to the Soviet Union. The aspired to new credit limit of 10 billion schillings is connected with the natural gas-pipe deal which is being negotiated between Austria and the USSR. The new credit limit should be granted by a syndicate of banks under the leadership of the Creditanstalt-bank, in which case refinancing through the Kontroll-bank and a guarantee of the Republic of Austria which is customary in such cases are being taken into consideration.

IRANIAN TRADE DELEGATION VISITING VIENNA

AU181320 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 18 Feb 82 p 7

[Summary] "Iranian economic experts who have already paid visits to Finland and Sweden are currently staying in Austria according to a Trade Ministry report to deepen former and current contacts with firms and above all in order to initiate new deals. At a roundtable talk which took place at the Ministry of Trade, Commerce and Industry, the Iranian delegation leader (Homayoun Jaghutfam), vice-minister in the Ministry of Industries and Mines, pointed out that Iran does not want to tie itself economically to the great power blocs. The neutral states should participate more intensely in the reconstruction of Iran.

"For Austria, the vice-minister said, concrete opportunities might emerge related to developing the infrastructure of small-and medium-sized towns, putting industrial operations that have closed down back into operation, building of petrochemical and wood-processing plants as well as supplying foodstuffs, agricultural machinery and equipment and road-building machinery.

There is also great interest in the setting up of fish breeding centers for the production of edible fish. Iran in turn would deliver oil and copper to Austria."

The delegation is currently visiting various Austrian enterprises. Trade relations between Austria and Iran are being further developed. "According to the Federal Trade Chamber, in 1981 Austria exported to Iran goods and commodities with an overall value of some 2.9 billion schillings, that is some 5 percent more than in 1980 (2.78 billion schillings). The most important items were finished goods (921 million schillings), machinery (900 million schillings), and chemical products (684 million schillings). Imports from Iran in 1981 totaled 1,504 billion schillings and have thus almost quadrupled since 1980 (393 million schillings). Imports of oil and oil products alone amounted to some 1,245 billion schillings in 1981. Iran delivered finished goods (textiles and clothing) valued at 187 million schillings to Austria."

KREISKY ANNOUNCES UNLIMITED CREDIT FROM SAUDIS

[HWS Report: "Kreisky: We Now Have Unlimited Credit With the Saudis"]

[Excerpt] Vienna -- "I have negotiated with Saudi Arabia and we now have the certainty that we can procure money there whenever banks make difficulties for us." This is the information with which Chancellor Kreisky surprised waiting reporters after the cabinet session on Tuesday. He went on: "We can get as much as we want from the Saudis, in any type of currency we want." Austria will also be able to determine the date of any loan it desires.

MORE POLES LEAVING COUNTRY NOW THAN ENTERING

[Text] A total of 13,000 Polish asylum-seekers will leave Austria this year, on the basis of pledges so far received [from foreign governments], Interior Minister Lanc stated yesterday. The number of Poles leaving Austria now is double that of Poles entering the country, Lanc continued. Some 15-20 Poles are entering Austria daily. But these are Poles with exit permits who are entering Austria on the basis of the relatively large degree of economic contacts between Austria and Poland and who are also returning to their home country.

Australia, U.S. Admit More

AU162003 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 15 February on page 2 carries a Georg R. Varna dispatch from Canberra which also includes an interview with Ian MacPhee, Australian minister of immigration and ethnic affairs, who stated: "I know that Austria particularly suffers from the pressure of the stream of refugees. But we also want to offer Poles in other West European countries the same chances to emigrate to Australia, which should indirectly help to reduce the pressure on Austria. We have dispatched additional personnel to our consulates and have made preparations for the early removal of those persons who have been granted refugee status and have been permitted to emigrate to Australia by our selection committees." MacPhee pointed out that this year Australia would admit up to 23,500 refugees as part of the 120,000 persons which Australia is willing to admit in 1982.

DIE PRESSE on 16 February on page 1 carries an Andreas Unterberger dispatch from Vienna reporting on the visit to Vienna of Richard Vine, head of the refugee section in the U.S. State Department, who stated that "the United States possesses unlimited possibilities for admitting" the 22,000 Polish refugees now registered in Austria. Asked about the "misunderstandings" which had recently emerged in this context, Vine said that "on the one hand, the Poles have submitted surprisingly few applications for immigration and, on the other hand, no appeal for financial assistance on the part of Austria is known in Washington." According to the Americans, only 2,100 Poles have made an effort to emigrate to the United States since 1 October 1981. Vine added that the United States will increase its personnel in Vienna by another three persons and that "All Poles who submit an application to us have an 87 percent chance of being admitted." Virtually all refugees with the status of a convention refugee will be admitted," he said. Vine also denied that thus far it has been U.S. policy to keep as many Poles in Austria as possible in order to not definitely accept the change in Warsaw: "It was only said that, first, the refugee policy should be neutral with respect to the delicate situation in Poland; a politicization would be nonsense. Second, we do not want to compel the applicants for asylum to make an early decision about their future with our refugee policy." Vine did not want to comment on critical statements made by the Austrian Government members about U.S. refugee policy. He believes he has eliminated misunderstandings in talks with Austrian Interior Minister Lanc.

Also reporting on Mr Vine's visit to Vienna on Monday, Vienna KURIER in German on 16 February on page 19 quotes him trying to explain why so few Poles are applying for immigration to the United States: "I assume the people are still waiting to see how things will develop in their home country."

GENSCHER, CHEYSSON DISCUSS UPCOMING SUMMIT

LD181722 Hamburg DPA in German 1635 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Bonn 18 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher received his counterpart from Paris, Claude Cheysson, on Thursday for intensive talks on the German-French summit in the coming week. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is flying to Paris for the summit meeting with President Francois Mitterrand on Thursday and Friday within the framework of the regular bilateral consultation.

Genscher and Cheysson had a long list of subjects which are to be tackled by the summit partners. After the political talks, Genscher invited Cheysson to lunch at the Foreign Ministry guest house on the Bonn Venusberg. Cheysson intends to return to Paris this evening.

SCHMIDT REITERATES SUPPORT FOR USSR GAS PIPELINE

LD181754 Hamburg DPA in German 1731 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Nuremberg, 18 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has once more expressly stated his support of the natural gas pipeline deal between the FRG and the Soviet Union. "Let others squeal about it to their hearts' content; it will not be changed," Schmidt said on Thursday in Nuremberg during a visit to Quelle, a major mail order firm. There have been voices critical of the natural gas pipeline deal, especially from the United States.

The Federal chancellor made clear that peace "at home and abroad" is the most important point of the Federal Government's work. "Concerning foreign policy, I am banking on political reason and the willingness to reach understanding." The FRG has to preserve the balance between East and West.

MILITARY 'SECRETMONGERING' LEADS TO MISTRUST

[Commentary signed MAC: "Secretmongering"]

[Text] Fearful (and therefore wrong) information policy can very well have the consequence of making actually normal events come close to secretmongering. The forthcoming agreement between Bonn and Washington on the modernization of the "Pershing" short-range missile is a show example. Because of the discussion in the Federal Republic on the NATO dual decision and the possible deployment of new nuclear medium-range missiles in the Federal Republic as of 1983, other armament programs should have been made publicly known.

After all, the new "Pershing 1-B" short-range missile with which the air force is to be equipped as of 1986, has nothing to do with the NATO decision, a fact which can clearly be explained by the difference in range. The possible counterargument that it is too early for a public statement is not convincing in view of the fact that a preparatory contract will be signed in the near future. Every democracy lives off as much information as possible on action of the executive, for otherwise public control would not work. It is clear that there are also sensitive security fields. That pertains particularly to the military sphere, but more publicity means less mistrust. That ought to be considered more in the future.

CONCERTED FRENCH-FRG OPPOSITION TO USSR URGED

PM181723 Paris LE FIGARO in French 16 Feb 82 pp 1, 5

[Alfred Fabre-Luce article: "We Are Not in 1938" -- words between slantlines published in italics]

[Text] French public opinion is becoming aware of the /direct/ danger that Soviet expansionism constitutes for France. Unfortunately, the advocates of firmness do not always use the language most appropriate to their goal. On occasion they even employ watchwords that lead to mistakes about both the past and the present. The Yalta myth has taken a considerable dent in the last 2 months, which is great progress. But "Munich 1938" is still more often mentioned than "Rhineland 1936." You even see the claim "We are in 1938" written large in the press. This reference is apt to suggest three ideas to the public.

1 -- All expansionism is similar.

2 -- We ought to react to the USSR's expansionism with offensive military action.

3 -- Anyhow, there will be a general war next year.

Those three ideas are clearly mistaken.

1 -- Brezhnev isn't Hitler.

2 -- It would be ridiculous to attack the USSR. (Anyhow, no one dreams of doing so.)

3 -- A major war in 1983 is very unlikely.

This little game of false analogies began in 1980 with a remark attributed to Chancellor Schmidt to the effect that the crisis in international relations showed similarities to the crisis of July 1914. I recalled in these columns at the time -- under the headline "Sarajevo? No" -- the differences between the situations. (You can't imagine Czar Brezhnev being dragged against his will into a major war by a satellite as Czar Nicholas II was in 1914, or, on the opposite side, heads of state being outflanked by their generals, as Franz-Josef and Wilhelm II were.

Since then this false comparison has had disastrous psychological results. The number of Germans fearing another war almost /doubled/ during the following months and the pacifist movement developed /in tandem./ (Fear was posing as idealism.) By means of another misleading comparison (with 1938) are attempts being made today to develop a similar movement in France although it is today a case certainly not of a danger of war, but of a mere test of will? There is no question that /if/ the test is lost the Soviets will begin to put forward other increasingly unacceptable claims that could indeed lead to a situation in which there was a danger of war.

Immediately after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan I entitled an article "Kabul, To Divide the West?" That was probably not the dominant explanation for the operation, but it was certainly one of its consequences. The countries of the West began to differ over every issue: the boycott of the Olympic Games, economic sanctions, the deployment of the American Euromissiles. The Polish affair could mark a new stage in this deterioration. Will it soon be necessary to write that the more the USSR shows its strength, the more the Western countries display their weakness? That would be the proof that the Kremlin's cynicism pays off.

The evolution in Chancellor Schmidt's attitude is striking. In 1978 he denounced Carter's shillyshallying over the neutron bomb. Now Reagan is manufacturing that bomb, but Schmidt no longer wants anything to do with it. Extremists in his party are undermining the Atlantic policy which still claims to defend. It is said that antelopes in Africa are sometimes struck by bouts of panic so irresistible that they end up by infecting the Lions.

Last month four German professors came to Paris to explain their country's position. Their remarks were chiefly an explanation and sometimes a justification of the German pacifist movement. Fortunately they do not represent all Germany. As far back as 18 December the CDU opposition demanded that all payments and supplies to the public authorities in Poland be halted immediately; humanitarian aid alone was continued (and even increased). On 9 January the CSE group in the Bundestag unanimously adopted a declaration that said: "Every Deutschmark invested in the bankrupt Eastern economic system is a wasted Deutschmark that does nothing for people but merely stabilizes communism's hegemony.... The chancellor has obscured the Soviet Union's responsibility regarding the events in Poland by alluding to the 1945 Yalta Conference. That is a basic political and historical error." The spokesman for the group expressed opposition to the gas pipeline project.

Thus in German public opinion there are elements of resistance that may become -- and even probably will become -- dominant. We must get in contact with them. It is high time the delicate issues -- particularly that of European security -- were jointly studied. Let us not be unrealistic, there can be no question of organizing a total economic blockade of the USSR or of completely unifying the policies of Paris and Bonn. But it is certainly possible to make progress on two essential points.

1. The governments of the two countries should agree on restricting or stopping preferential credits to the USSR. It is using them to arm itself against them. When it has thus built up its military power it will take advantage of it to demand even more credits on even more favorable terms which in turn will facilitate its armament. People in France and the FRG are saying: "We cannot act differently from our neighbors and competitors." The cycle must be broken.

2. It has become urgent to halt the development of isolationism in the United States by showing that Europe is not losing interest in its own defense. Some French-German projects in this field would not necessitate new expenditure, but on the contrary would ensure savings. Conversely, some additional French expenditure would be superfluous. The building of dozens of submarines designed exclusively for the defense of a French turned into a sanctuarized territory would in no way help to resolve the essential problem, which is to prevent Soviet influence from extending to the Rhine.

Mobile French-German missiles, dual keys, joint financing? On these points, for the time being, let us leave the talk to the experts. The important thing is to indicate right now, by decisions which are both specific and symbolic, our desire to swim against the current. The initiatives I have in mind would in no way stop us seeking a general arms limitation agreement with the USSR. For the time being the USSR does not deem it necessary to make real concessions. We will receive the proposals we deserve.

A free and organized Europe, an ideal which has been gradually weakened through disputes between neighbors and has been bogged down in international bureaucracy would arise again out of a joint quest for security. For 20 years now the Europeans, disunited over defense, have made scant progress on the path of political union. They have nonetheless invoked this latter objective to continue to avoid the former. They proposed to speak of defense after the creation of a united states of free Europe had been completed: In practice that was an adjournment since sine die. This attitude caused general demoralization. The beginning of a reaction is emerging. It is the voice of freedom and peace.

PERTINI SCHEDULED TO VISIT JAPAN 9-15 MARCH

PANAMA'S PRESIDENT IN MILAN ON PRIVATE VISIT

PA151256 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1150 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] Milan, (Italy), 15 Feb (EFE) -- Panamanian President Aristides Royo is in this Italian city, on a strictly private visit, along with his family. The Royos arrived in Milan Sunday night.

Italian Foreign Ministry sources told EFE that no political acts have been scheduled for the Panamanian president.

ENI DELEGATION HOLDS MEETING WITH GANDHI

AU132020 Rome ANSA in English 1938 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Text] New Delhi, 13 Feb (ANSA) -- The prospects for enlarging the sphere of activities conducted by the Italian state-controlled energy agency, Entesnazionale Idrocarburi (ENI), in India were discussed today by the head of the ENI foreign operations division, Rakfaele Santoro, who wound up three days of talks here yesterday.

The ENI delegation led by Santoro and accompanied by Italian Ambassador to India Emilio Paolo Bassi, met with Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, the minister for oil, chemicals and fertilizer, the finance minister and business and industry spokesman.

Santoro, in his statement to ANSA today, said that the atmosphere in which the negotiations had taken place was "especially warm...in line with the atmosphere of friendliness and opening which emerged during Mrs Gandhi's recent visit to Italy, a visit marking a revival of cooperative relations between Italy and India.

The ENI official reported that "with the Indian authorities, we discussed the possibility of an extended and more sizable ENI participation in industrial development programs in this country, especially in the sectors of hydrocarbons prospecting and production, offshore and on land refining, and the pipeline transport of hydrocarbons, petrochemicals and fertilizers".

The head of ENI foreign operations also disclosed that it was decided to send, in the near future, an Indian delegation at the operative level to map out with our technical experts programs for training and the transfer of technology in the sectors under discussion, and to hold periodic encounters between ENI and the Indian Government to check on the course of cooperation and update the programs.

"We also examined," Santoro said, "concrete prospects for creating joint ventures in third countries for hydrocarbons exploration concessions where AGIP (the ENI Exploration, Production and Distribution Division) acts as the operator".

GUIDELINES REACHED FOR ALGERIAN GAS DEAL

AU132026 Rome ANSA in English 1932 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 13 Feb (ANSA) -- Guidelines for the Italian side in negotiations with Algeria for natural gas [words indistinct] the North African state were agreed on during an interministerial meeting held at government [word indistinct] earlier this week.

A communique released by the Prime Minister's Office reported that, "positive orientations necessary for the enactment of the negotiations were agreed upon, and the Italian Government hopes that these (dealings) can be concluded in the near future".

The session was attended by the ministers for foreign affairs, Emilio Colombo, state holding, Gianni de Michelis, south Italian affairs, Claudio Signorile, foreign trade, Nicola Capria and under secretary for the Industry Ministry, Francisco Rebecchini, and presided over by Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini.

In remarks to the press after the meeting, Colombo affirmed that "We tried to lay out the directions to follow for the negotiations, since talks on the Algerian gasoline must be begun after the visit of Algeria's foreign minister to Rome".

"The directions are twofold", Colombo continued, "There are negotiations for the gas that have to do with price conditions, supplies and all other problems strictly connected with this aspect.

"There is then another theme, that of economic cooperation" between Italy and Algeria," the minister said.

According to the Rome government diplomatic chief, these two aspects are only apparently disconnected. Pointing to the development of similar negotiations in France, Colombo maintained that "The first part of the negotiations, relative to the price of the gas, could be facilitated by the fact that there is a willingness for a closer economic cooperation".

"We tried to define some general lines" in the Italian position, Colombo continued, "but we must wait for the first [word indistinct] and see how they correspond to the two aspects of the negotiation, above all the one regarding price which is the most delicate."

Colombo also said that technical meetings will continue, particularly among the foreign, industry and foreign trade ministries, in the context of what was decided at yesterday's meeting.

Minister Signorile told newsmen that "We are trying to find an economically convenient solution" to the natural gas supplies, and de Michelis noted that the ministers agreed in the session that "If an accord is not reached in technical sessions (between the Italian and Algerian state energy agencies), the government will have to evaluate the negotiations in political quarters."

INTERIOR MINISTER DENIES TERRORISTS MISTREATED

AU160858 Rome ANSA in English 0816 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 16 Feb (ANSA) -- Italian Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni vehemently denied that any violence or coersion has been practised on persons being held for subversive activities in Italy, during a question and answer session in the Italian Chamber of Deputies here.

Rognoni responded to a series of interpellations from MP's yesterday evening concerning rumors that some of the many terrorist suspects rounded up in Italy since the December 17 abduction of NATO General James Lee Dozier, held to be the work of the Red Brigades urban guerrilla group, have been beaten or forced into confessions.

"The ample, inferred and continual collaboration offered by many terrorists captured by the Italian police forces could never have been determined by acts of violence or brutal coersion", Rognoni told the assembly.

Concerning the particular case of Gianfranco Fornoni, one of a group of guerrillas who robbed a bank in North-Central Italy and shot two Carabinieri policemen dead when they were later surprised at a roadblock, the minister referred to the testimony of the Carabinieri general commander.

According to the general, the scars present on Fornoni's body can easily be attributed to the two days spent by him and his colleagues fleeing police in the area north of Rome, during which the alleged guerrilla members hid out in forests, and rough countryside.

Concerning other accusations, Rognoni confined himself to terse denials.

"Absolutely false", the minister said, referring to published notices in the press about maltreatment of those arrested in recent operations in the northern Veneto region, where Dozier was kidnapped from his apartment in Verona, and freed by a special force police unit raid on a Padua apartment which led to the arrest of his five captors.

Rognoni also described as "false" the affirmation that Antonio Savasta, one of those arrested in the Dozier raid, had been beaten.

Rumors that narcotics or truth serum had been employed in interrogations of those arrested in Verona were similarly brushed off as "absolutely without basis".

The government line in its struggle against terrorism, Rognoni concluded, has been maintained "in rigorous respect of the civil laws, principals and democratic norms and above all in respect of the Italian Constitution".

"This line responds to judicial and constitutional obligations, but above all to our and the Italian people's conscience", he said.

ARMENIAN TERRORIST ON END OF 'TRUCE' WITH ITALY

PM171631 Rome L'ESPRESSO in Italian 14 Feb 82 p 39

[Rita Porena interview with (Hagop Hagopian), spokesman for the Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia: "No Truce With Italy" -- date and place not specified]

[Text] Question: Franco Mazzola, former under secretary at the Prime Minister's Office responsible for the secret services, said in an interview published by L'ESPRESSO on 8 November that an agreement had been reached via the PLO between the Italian secret services and the Armenian Secret Liberation Army whereby your organization undertook to observe a complete truce with Italy. According to Mazzola the truce was violated because the new leaders of the Italian secret services did not succeed in establishing relations of trust with the PLO and indirectly with the Armenian Secret Liberation Army.

Answer: There was indeed indirect negotiations with the Italian Government and the DC, and not with the secret services, as Mr Mazzola says. The leaders of the PLO and especially of the Fatah informed us that the Italian Government wanted to discuss certain matters, particularly the suspension of our operations against Italy. At first we refused, because we did not trust the Italian Government and the DC. But when the PLO stood as their guarantor we agreed to open negotiations -- but only indirectly, always through the PLO. Last year a DC delegation visited Beirut, but we did not meet with it and do not know who its members were.

Question: What did the negotiations hinge on?

Answer: The Italians asked us to suspend our attacks on Italy. For our part, we want the closure of the offices of ANSHA [expansion unknown], which organizes the emigration of Armenians to Italy and which is protected by the Vatican and the CIA. According to what the PLO told us, even the Italian Government has admitted ties between ANSHA and the U.S. secret services.

Question: Mazzola says that the agreement also included the suspension of attacks on Turks residing in Italy.

Answer: No, we never agreed to suspend our right to attack the national enemy and his institutions, wherever they may be.

Question: When was the agreement reached?

Answer: In February last year, and the Armenian Secret Liberation Army gave the Italian authorities 6 months to close the ANSHA offices. Soon after, however, we discovered that the offices had not been closed but simply transferred and that their numbers had actually increased. We know all about ANSHA's secret offices, and when the right time comes the fate that we have in store for it will become known. Obviously we regard the truce as void: The Italian Government thought that it could cheat us and the Palestinians and did not honor its commitments. The violation of the truce has nothing to do with the changes in the Italian secret services. The Armenian Secret Liberation Army notified all Armenian groups of the violation of the truce and issued orders to attack Italy long before the leadership of the services changed. Back in August the 3 October Group blew up Alitalia's office in Paris.

Question: Have you had any other contacts with the Italian Government?

Answer: Following the Paris attack the Italian Government sent us a message via the PLO. But we cannot reveal its content.

Question: Is there any chance of negotiations being resumed?

Answer: No, we have no confidence in your government, which serves the interests of imperialism, not of its people. Recently we have carried out no operations against Italy, but this is only a pause to make preparations.

CRAXI ON SPADOLINI GOVERNMENT, PSI SOCIALISM

PM180847 Rome AVANTI in Italian 7-8 Feb 82 pp 1, 2

[Excerpts] Party Secretary Craxi has concluded the election campaign at Lamezia Terme, where people are voting for the renewal of the municipal council. Craxi emphasized the significance and importance of the local election taking place in this large Calabrian municipality, both because of what is at stake -- that is, the leadership of the municipality -- and because of the political moment in which it is taking place, because its importance is such as to make it possible to point out indications of a more general nature. Comrade Craxi remarked that an atmosphere of severe political tension and of difficulty in relations among the forces and parties remains. "There is a preelection neurosis," Craxi said, "without elections." "The specter is being brandished of an early election which nobody has demanded, but in the meantime no serious effort has been made, up to now, to map out a certain path for the second part of the legislative term, as the Socialists have repeatedly demanded. The line of governability desired and supported by the Socialists is sometimes derided and is even declared bankrupt, but then entreaties are made that it continue its course without traumatic interruptions."

Speaking of the party's policy, Comrade Craxi said that the line of governability remains the Socialists' basic line, but added that it could not survive and hold out in a vacuum, in immobilism, in conflict and in distrust among the political forces required to support and guarantee it. But it can and should be developed, anchored to a program of renewal and reforms. Craxi spoke of the difficult current legislative term, whose governments have had loyal and decisive support from the Socialists, who have always set aside private motives and party interests and have always taken into account the general picture and their responsibility toward the institutions.

Our criticisms, the party secretary said, and our reservations, when they have had reason to exist, have always been put forward in a constructive spirit. When a government has shown itself equal to the situation, it has always been able to count on our contribution and our confidence.

Speaking of the experience of the Spadolini government, Comrade Craxi stated that its balance sheet is deemed positive by us. Certainly, he emphasized, not everything is going well and not everything is satisfactory, but we never lose sight of the conditions of difficulty, and precariousness under which governments in our country are forced to operate. The unfulfilled reform of the institutions and of the state, of public administration and of local government weighs adversely.

Talking about the international situation and in particular about Poland and the conflict between the PCI and the CPSU, Comrade Craxi said that the recent international events and their repercussions on the Italian left make even clearer the need for a strong Socialist Party and a strong and united socialist movement. This is the real precondition for enabling the processes of reappraisal toward which the PCI has begun to advance, resuming more resolutely a path it has already partly traveled, to be accelerated and guaranteed in the direction of a clear perspective in its principles, its aims and its role and democratic organization.

Comrade Craxi recalled that over the last few years we have become the greatest Italian collector of attacks by the Soviet press for expressing ourselves in a spirit of independence, developing a fundamental criticism of the bureaucratic authoritarian system, wrongly regarded as a mature stage of socialism, steadfastly defending the dissidents, and protesting systematically against violations of human rights and the peoples' rights. We cannot help being pleased that for siding with the Polish trade union it is now the PCI which is having to face this polemical and intolerant fury. Over the last few years, no communist has expressed solidarity with us, whereas we now express solidarity with them and encourage them to defend a stance of autonomy. We also encourage them to develop a fundamental reappraisal, which is more necessary than ever in a country which certainly could not tolerate a Soviet-style model of communism, and this is a point which has been clear for some time, but which even a national-style model of communism would not suit.

The revalidation of the thinking and of the principles characteristic of European socialism is natural, and this is the highway which can and should be embarked on. Craxi added that this does not mean forgoing criticism of mistakes or limitations which the socialist and social democratic experience in Europe has also experienced, or espousing a prefabricated model which does not exist. Instead, it means finding the path for completely rejoining the great family of Western socialism, which is also grappling with the need for a response of socialism and freedom to the problems of modern industrial society and the new problems of peace and inequalities in the world.

KIPRIANOU ATHENS VISIT: 'NO REASON FOR CONCERN'

NC181953 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] In Athens, answering a question from newsmen on President Kiprianou's visit to the Greek capital, Government Spokesman Maroudhas has made the following statement:

There is nothing alarming. It is about positive and not negative developments in the Cyprus issue. I categorically state that there is no reason for any concern.

Answering another question as to who provided the initiative for the meeting, Mr Maroudhas said: The initiative was mutual and the visit was decided on during a telephone contact between the two leaders.

SYRIA'S KHADDAM PLANS TO VISIT IN MID-MARCH

NC140935 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 14 Feb 82 p 1

[Text] Syrian Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Khaddam will pay an official visit to Cyprus in the middle of March within the framework of the Arab countries' "opening" toward Cyprus and in appreciation of the positive stand which Cyprus maintained on the resolution about the Syrian Golan Heights at the United Nations General Assembly. This visit by Mr Khaddam will also be in return of the visit which Foreign Minister Rolandhis paid to Syria in July 1979.

Political circles in Nicosia attach particular importance to the visit by the Syrian foreign minister given the fact that, in this case, Mr Khaddam will represent not only his country but also many other Arab countries which recently decided to render political and economic support to those countries which supported the resolution on the Golan Heights.

Cyprus will probably be the first country which Mr Khaddam will visit within the framework of the above Arab decision and his talks with the Cypriot Government will aim at:

--Further strengthening the friendly relations between Cyprus and Syria.

--Consolidating the relations existing between Cyprus and the Arab countries.

--Extending Cyprus' politico-economic relations to Arab countries with which Cyprus does not maintain diplomatic relations.

The critical times through which the political question of Cyprus is now passing raise the significance of the talks that Mr Khaddam will hold in Nicosia even higher.

After the unanimous decision on the Arab League's Economic Council for an economic opening and financial aid to the countries which supported the resolution on the Golan Heights, it is understood that during the talks with Mr Khaddam the Cypriot side will raise the question of economic cooperation with the Arab countries.

KIPRIANOU ARRIVES FOR TALKS WITH PAPANDREOU

NC191022 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1000 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] A few minutes ago President Kiprianou arrived in Athens. Foreign Minister Rolandhis is accompanying him. President Kiprianou was met at Ellinikon Airport by Prime Minister Papandreou, Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos, Cypriot ambassador in Athens Khatzimiltis, and other officials. Mr Kiprianou and Mr Papandreou will hold a conference at the political office. Later, at 1400, Prime Minister Papandreou will give a working luncheon at Kastri for the Cypriot President.

Spokesman Comments on Reason

NC181951 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] There is nothing alarming about Mr Kiprianou's visit to Athens which has been decided at a joint initiative of both sides, the government spokesman has clarified. The spokesman also stressed it is about positive and not negative developments in the Cyprus issue.

IRAN PLANS TO APPOINT AMBASSADOR IN ATHENS

NC181407 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1200 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] Today, Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos received a committee of Iranian officials led by Hojjat ol-Eslam 'Abdollah Nuri, Ayatollah Khomeyni's special envoy. Mr Kharalambopoulos discussed with the members of the committee various questions of interest to the two countries.

The Iranian officials briefed Mr Kharalambopoulos on the situation prevailing in their country and on the goals of the revolution and said that Tehran has decided to appoint an ambassador in Athens, a professor of mathematics. Mr Kharalambopoulos stressed that within the framework of its multidimensional foreign policy Greece wishes to have good relations with Iran.

VOTCP LABELS TOWER 'FIERCE ENEMY OF PEACE'

TA181119 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] John Tower has visited Ankara. The officials of the reactionary military junta are presenting him as a very important man. Who is this Tower? Above all, he is a fierce enemy of peace. He is one of the military experts of the warmongering Reagan administration. This man is especially active in the Middle East and is closely interested in Turkey. This is not his first visit to Turkey. He was in Turkey last year in order to effect the implementation of the defense cooperation agreement signed with the United States. Currently, he is the chairman of the recently established Turkish-U.S. Joint Defense Group. Each of his visits aims to further place Turkey under U.S. control. This time he arrived in Turkey with plans to include our country in new aggression blocs in the Middle East and and secure bases in our country for the Rapid Deployment Force. The arrival of Tower or his likes puts a twinkle in the eyes of the monopolists and collaborationists in our country. Article after article is published in the reactionary press. Now also, the reactionary press does not cease to publish Tower's statements praising the despotic regime in Turkey.

Tower apparently likes the plan for a return to democracy in Turkey: The real violators of human rights in Turkey are apparently the leftists. The [words indistinct] of the United States wishes to treat our people like idiots. Our people and world public opinion are well aware of how and by whom human rights are violated in Turkey and against whom tortures, repression and tyranny are directed. The whole world also knows who is filling the detention houses in our country. Through these statements. U.S. Senator Tower can neither absolve the junta, nor can he conceal the overt support accorded by the United States to military regimes in El Salvador or other such countries. The cost of the support for the reactionary military junta, of the absorption and the back-scratching is very high. Our people have no intention of paying this price. The likes of Tower come and go to our country with plans that spell disaster for our country, our region and our people. Our people do not want Tower, his likes or U.S. plans. Our people want peace in our region and in the world.

LETTERS URGE STAND AGAINST ARMENIAN TERRORISM

TA122015 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] Letters sent to the heads of state of 18 countries by the Turkish Information Fund [TUTAV] state that Armenians themselves do not approve of the attacks directed against Turkish diplomats by a handful of Armenian terrorists. The letters, signed by TUTAV Executive Council President Keman Baytas, said as follows: It is erroneous to portray the murders committed treacherously and mercilessly as having links with incidents in past history and assess them as blood fueds. These incidents constitute a sly scheme by international terrorism and centers that have a vested interest in disrupting world peace.

The letters pointed out that the Armenian attacks against Turkish diplomats threaten world peace, adding: The murders and assaults by Armenian terrorist organizations have recently included the citizens and organizations of other countries among their targets and thus widened their range. These heinous murders cannot be explained through historical events dating a few generations. They cannot be transformed into a blood fued. It is evident that, in actual fact, they serve the division of the free world through chaos and anarchy. Condoning or ignoring these murders would be tantamount to placing dynamite at the very foundation of world peace. These murders, whose real motives and aims are very well understood by Armenians throughout the world as well, do not and must not enjoy support or approval.

The letters stressed that the adoption of a firm attitude by countries concerning international terrorism would serve world peace, humankind and friendship.

USSR GRANTED 10 BILLION SCHILLING CREDIT LIMIT

AU191747 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 19 Feb 82 p 16

[KH report: "Billion Schilling Loan for Soviets: Low Interest Rates Following German Pattern"]

[Summary] Vienna -- "Yesterday, Austria granted the Soviet Unior a 10-billion schilling credit limit with a deadline of the end of December 1983, which is intended for purchasing 'commodities and services of Austrian orgin.' The interest rate is 7.8 percent, just as in the agreements concluded by the FRG in the fall of 1981.

"The agreement on the credit limit was signed yesterday afternoon by V.M. Ivanov, USSR deputy foreign trade minister, and by Director General Hannes Androsch for the Creditanstalt Bank -- the syndicate leader on the Austrian side. The agreement replaces the 10-billion credit limit agreement of the same type concluded in March of 1980, which only envisaged a 7 percent interest rate and has been fully used. The Austrian Kontroll Bank will assume guarantees within the framework of the provisions on promoting exports, and will see to the refinancing.

"There is a gap, however: The credit limit to the Soviet Union carries a lower interest rate than the currently applicable Kontroll Bank financing which costs -- including the warranty commission -- 9.5 percent for longer running periods. The exporter will have to pay the difference from his own pocket; that is, he must include it in the price or must take a loss into the bargain. In view of the German example, it was impossible for Austria, however, to agree with the Soviets on a higher interest rate, particularly in view of the fact that the Soviets always made talks about deliveries from Austria contingent on the advance commitment.

"Refinancing will be effected in principle under the 'normal' Kontroll Bank conditions." The appropriate institutions are authorized to reject applications for loans despite the existence of the credit limit if, for example, they regard the Austrian share of a project as inadequate. "No minimum quota was agreed upon in the credit agreement, it only refers to 'Austrian origin.' Three running periods of 5, 5 and 1/2 and 8 and 1/2 years have been stipulated.

"According to statements of Director General Androsch before journalists, the credit limit does not imply that the 'country risk with the Soviet Union' has reached a maximum. Additional project and supplier related individual negotiations are possible any time if there should emerge promising export chances which exceed the credit limit."

Androsch named as interested parties in this context the Voest corporation, the Glanzstoff, Voith, SGP, Vew and Heid Works, as well as the shipyards. "The financing of pipe deliveries within the credit limit is possible, but there is no direct linkage with the negotiations on natural gas deliveries which OEMV Corporation Director General Ludwig Bauer will conduct in Moscow on 22-24 February. The Austrian wishes for imports have been reduced from the original 3-5 billion cubic meters beginning in 1984, to 0.5 to 1 billion cubic meters because of the exorbitantly high price. Soviet natural gas now costs 3.15 schillings per cubic meter.

"The Austrian trade balance with the Soviet Union is showing a great deficit primarily because of fuel imports: In 1981 exports totaling 7.5 billion schillings were facing imports totaling 21.1 billion schillings, and the deficit has doubled to 13.6 billion schillings since 1980."

SCHMIDT REPORTEDLY CONSIDERING CABINET CHANGES

LD191340 Hamburg DPA in German 1227 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 19 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Schmidt is actively considering a reshuffle of the Federal Government involving at least four portfolios. Also involved would be the replacement of Herbert Wehner as leader of the SPD lower house group by the present defense minister, Hans Apel. DPA has learned this today from well-informed quarters. As for the possible time of this move, early summer has been mentioned. Wehner's promise that he will resign after the SPD congress in Munich had already been received, the sources said.

According to sources, Apel's place as defense minister will be taken by SPD Deputy Chairman Hans Juergen Wischnewski. The new deputy SPD chief is to be North Rhine-Westphalian Minister-President Johannes Rau, though this change does not necessarily have to take place at the SPD congress.

Others due to lose their cabinet posts are, from the FDP, Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff and Agriculture Minister Josef Ertl, and from the SPD, the minister for youth, family and health, Antje Huber. It is not yet certain who their successors will be.

Plans for a government reshuffle had been voiced in the past by the chancellor for about the middle of the parliamentary term.

Among those mentioned in Bonn as possible successors for Lambsdorff are the FDP politician Hans-Guenter Hoppe (deputy chairman of the FDP Bundestag group), parliamentary state secretary in the Economics Ministry, Martin Gruener, Bundestag deputies Helmut Haussmann and Dieter Julius Cronenberg, and others.

For the post of the new agriculture minister, talk centers on Ertl's Parliamentary State Secretary Georg Gallus as well as on the FDP deputy and farmer, Uwe Ronneburger. The principal candidate under consideration to succeed Antje Huber might be the present parliamentary state secretary in the Federal Ministry of Labor, Anke Fuchs, who, like Antje Huber, comes from the North Rhine-Westphalian SPD. She has had the unwritten promise of a future ministerial office ever since she stood down as a candidate for the post of deputy SPD chairman at the SPD congress in Berlin at the end of 1979. It is thought possible in Bonn that the number of ministers who may be replaced or reshuffled might be extended.

Chancellor Denies Report

LD191932 Hamburg DPA in German 1910 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Hamburg, 19 Feb (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has denied the DPA report on an alleged government reshuffle involving at least four posts. The chancellor said on the "Today" television program on Friday evening that such reports lack any foundation. "I can only call it a carnival spectacle...somebody must have invented it," Schmidt said.

POLAND MAKING PAYMENTS ON LOAN INTEREST

LD191836 Hamburg DPA in German 1639 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Zurich/Frankfurt, 19 Feb (DPA/VWD) -- Poland has been able to reduce its debts in interest payments to 501 Western creditor banks, still outstanding from past years, to below $120 million (DM282 million).

Guido Condrau, deputy director of the Swiss Bankverein, which is leading the credit negotiations, said on Friday that Poland owes the banks $120 million in interest as of 15 February. A spokesman for Dresdner Bank (Frankfurt) told DPA/VWD on Friday that further payments have been received, after Frankfurt banks had already reported money receipts on Wednesday, and U.S. banks on Thursday, the amounts being unspecified.

The Dresdner Bank spokesman expressed his optimism about remaining interest payments by the Poles, in which case rescheduling talks by the banking group could take place on 4 March. The rescheduling of $2.4 billion owed in credits from 1981 is linked to the full payment of interest outstanding.

IMPORTANCE OF UPCOMING FRENCH SUMMIT STRESSED

LD191226 Hamburg DPA in German 1029 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 19 Feb (DPA) -- One of the aims of the summit meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and President Francois Mitterrand in Paris next Wednesday and Thursday is to promote cooperation with the United States. Following the intensive talks in preparation for the meeting by Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and his French counterpart, Cheysson, in Bonn last night, the FRG Foreign Ministry emphasized today that both countries attach particular importance to the Schmidt-Mitterrand meeting. A brief statement emphasizes unanimity on the following three points: very close cooperation; priority for promoting European unity both in the economic and political sphere; and the great importance of cooperation with the United States and the creation of better mutual understanding between the Americans and the Europeans.

The Foreign Ministry stressed that it is not customary for foreign ministers to prepare German-French summits in this form. The working meeting between Genscher and Cheysson showed, therefore, what importance the Federal Republic and France attach to the Schmidt-Mitterrand meeting in the present situation.

OFFICIAL CANCELS PROPOSED VISIT TO POLAND

LD191544 Hamburg DPA in German 1324 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Hamburg, 19 Feb (DPA) -- Walther Leisler Kiep, deputy chairman of the CDU-CSU Bundestag group and CDU candidate for the post of Hamburg mayor, today cancelled his proposed visit to Poland. According to a statement by the CDU group in the Hamburg City Parliament, Kiep gave as the reason for his cancellation the aggravation of the situation by the Polish authorities and their refusal to allow him to have a talk with Lech Walesa. Kiep had been invited by the Polish Government through the Polish Embassy in Bonn. The statement also makes it clear that the CDU politician had asked for an opportunity to talk with Archbishop Glemp, primate of the Catholic Church, and to the leader of the Solidarity Trade Union. A representative of the Polish Embassy had informed Kiep that talks with Solidarity are not possible because the trade union is not allowed to have international contacts at present.

SPD REGIONAL CONGRESS SUPPORTS GOVERNMENT

[Excerpts] Berlin, 20 Feb (DPA) -- Today during a regional party congress, the Berlin SPD supported the peace and defense policy of the Federal Government. SPD Chairman Willy Brandt stressed that FRG friendship with the United States must be coupled with frankness. There is no justification for accusing the government of a failure to fulfill its commitments to the Western Alliance: "We can hold our own in any comparison." In a resolution on the situation in Poland, the delegates of the regional party conference came out unanimously against sanctions "which are allegedly aimed against communist governments but in reality hit the oppressed and suffering peoples." They demanded the lifting of martial law in Poland and an end to all measures which infringe upon human and civil rights.

LE MONDE REPORTS ON PS NATIONAL CONVENTION

PM171619 Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Feb 82 p 7

[Text] At the opening of the convention, Mr Jean Poperen read out the report on the National Secretariat's activity. Mr Poperen condemned the attitude of the National Federation of Syndicates of Farm Operators on the one hand and of Mr Marchelli in the General Confederation of Managerial Personnel on the other, before noting that "The RPR is trying to capitalize on these various elements of sectoral discontent." The PS number two then defined the socialists as "the main force driving public opinion for change." He conceded, nonetheless, that they have not "so far been able to play their part to the fullest extent."

He asserted: "First, let us measure more fairly the considerable amount of work already done and the successes already won..., and we would be sensitive, almost guilt-ridden, or at any rate defensive beneath the bad temper and bad faith of a right wing that is furious that we should have kept our commitments! Let us not content ourselves with parrying this right wing's attacks -- let us be offensive!"

Mr Poperen: Not "Having Everything Right Away"

Having again emphasized that the socialists should "explain and enlighten" French people about the policy of change the government is pursuing, Mr Poperen expressed satisfaction at "The patience and moderation of the world of labor." "In this respect," he added, "the workers are proving that they have understood perfectly what we meant when we spoke of compromise: In brief, that we were not for 'having everything right away.'"

Mr Poperen analyzed the work of the 24th PS Congress and stated: "There is no obvious consistency between, on the one hand, participation in the operation of change organized around the ideas developed by Francois Mitterrand and the PS and, on the other, the justification of the 1977-1981 period when the PCF regularly criticized these same ideas. Moreover, is the success of socialist democracy in France possible without the partners in the popular movement making up their minds to distance themselves effectively from both superpowers?"

Mr Paul Quiles, member of the National Secretariat in charge of federations, noted "the principle of the preeminence of the political power over the power of elected representatives at all levels." To illustrate this preeminence he asked the convention to resolve that the General Councils' presidential candidates should no longer be nominated by the groups of socialist elected representatives but by the Federal Executive Commissions. As for relations with the government, Mr Quiles believes that the PS should avoid three stumbling blocks: "Hegemonism, that is, the desire to impose the party's solutions and to exert permanent public pressure on the government; nonexistence, that is, a timid party which would not dare to express itself or make its positions known; and tagging along, that is, a party which would permanently defend the government, come what may."

Louis Mermaz, president of the National Assembly, mentioned the leftwing union and recalled that the socialists "held out to impose this strategy, at whatever cost." He added: "We are far from having exhausted all the dynamism of the leftwing union. Whatever differences people may have in their historical analysis or appreciation of our relations with the PCF and of the history of the PCF, I believe that we must take care to preserve the unity of our communist ministers, for change will continue to proceed through the strategy of the leftwing union which alone enables us to maintain a direct link with the popular masses and to mobilize them for change."

Mr Mermaz believed that the canton elections will be "a test making it possible to measure the militancy of the left against the right." Condemning the attitude of the opposition, he stated that Mr Giscard d'Estaing had indulged in an outburst of deception with regard to his past conduct in the Polish affair and the Soviet gas affair."

Mr Jospin took the floor in turn. The first secretary recalled the difficulties which the external situation is causing the new authorities and asserted that "the partial return to the cold war spirit may cause a problem for the leftwing union, insofar as a government which includes socialists and communists together is transgressing certain international taboos." He stated: "It is a situation which we will have to learn to manage: on the international plane by giving Europe its full place and developing fruitful relations with the underdeveloped south; on the domestic plane -- and the stance of the PCF leadership over Poland does not make the task any easier — by maintaining clearly our concept of socialism and our loyalty to freedoms, without giving in to anticommunist campaigns."

Mr Jospin: Providing a Better Explanation

Mr Jospin then reaffirmed that in his view Mr Mitterrand's predecessor at the Elysee Palace had "exceeded his credit limit" and that the record of the preceding 7-year period should not be forgotten. Of Jacques Chirac he said: "Of course, he has a talent for publicity. He is a very imperfect mayor who knows how to make people almost believe he is a good one. But let us not make too much of it. He is the man who lost his party the presidency, the Matignon and finally the parliamentary majority. But he lacks true conviction and that quality of character inherent in people who accept their responsibilities.

Mentioning recent interviews given by Mr Giscard d'Estaing, Mr Jospin asserted: "One sees the latter (Giscard d'Estaing) as a dazzled butterfly colliding with the very source of light which gave it its former energy: the fascination of power." Noting that the opposition makes effective use of caricature and oversimplification, Mr Jospin expressed the hope that the socialists would adapt their language and their explanations to this fact "to make things simpler, less abstract, less muddled." He said, "That is as true of the government as it is of ourselves."

Thinking about the government's policy, Mr Jospin asserted that this is "a middle course." He went on: "This search for the happy medium is no doubt suited to an old democratic country like France. This choice presupposes -- and this is the risk -- that the economic and social forces which fear change the most are willing to play with fire by adopting rational practice. It is something of a gamble.... If I were to make any suggestions to the government, I would say: Explain things better, make them more simple, find the right balance between the big sectoral decisions and those which concern people's living conditions more closely." The PS first secretary then stressed that progress demands "powerful popular support, and not a people of spectators."

Touching once more on relations with the PCF, he suggested that the two components of the majority "must not conceal their disagreements." He added: "But we know very well that these disagreements are not new, even if the breadth of our disagreement on Poland is a disappointment. Let us continue the public debate and confrontation, let us try to involve people and convince them of our positions. It is the people of the left who will continue to decide things."

As for the trade unions, Mr Jospin thinks that "They have lost some of their reference points" since 10 May and would like the government to make some "clarification." "Let it explain its plans clearly, make its rejections explicit and not be ambiguous in its intentions, as was the case on the question of the 39 hours," Mr Jospin said, adding immediately: "It is also important for some unions not to aim at the wrong target by confusing rather readily the leftwing government, which is a bloc, and the bosses, and not to expect everything from the central government."

Mr Jospin dealt last with the place of the PS in the edifice of the new government. "The PS," he declared, "is not an echo government. Nobody can do our work in our place." He charged his party with the following missions: "to lead the debate of ideas and in particular the battle against the right; to spread our ideas and explain government policy in the field; to revitalize party life; to discuss, contradict and convince at the heart of the left and the social movement; to lead international action within the Socialist International so as to establish solidarities -- that is, an activity which the developments in the European left can make particularly fruitful; to inform the government of what our members have discovered and are discovering in the country."

During the afternoon debate, Alain Busnel, candidate member of the National Secretariat, expressed concern at the government's adherence to the socialist plan's provisions regarding the rights of working people. He recalled that these provided for direct election by working people of their representatives to the administrative council of the nationalized enterprises and the creation of shop councils. He was concerned at the government's reticence on this question and stressed that the working people at these enterprises would not agree to see themselves "cheated of the most fundamental promises" of the PS.

CHEYSSON MEETS WITH JORDAN'S FOREIGN MINISTER

PM171613 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Feb 82 p 7

["M.D." report: "To End a 'Crisis of Confidence' Mr Cheysson Reminds his Jordanian Counterpart of Principles of French Policy"]

[Text] On Monday 15 February External Relations Minister Cheysson had a working dinner with his Jordanian counterpart, Mr Marwan al-Qasim.

The Quai d'Orsay spokesman stated this Tuesday that Mr Cheysson recalled the four principles on which French Near East Policy is based:

-- Security for all states in the region, including Israel, and for a possible Palestinian state;

-- Justice for all peoples including the Palestinian people, who have the right to self-determination and the right to establish the state structures of their choice;

-- Unacceptability of any action or measure contrary to international law and, in particular, to the United Nations Security Council Resolutions (Resolution 242, for instance, which condemns any acquisition of territories "by war");

-- Need to solve all problems by negotiation.

Those explanations, the spokesman added, seemed to satisfy the Jordanian minister. The meeting, held at the French Minister's initiative, was intended to end the dispute, if not "crisis of confidence," which broke out following various French stances toward Israel and particularly following a "remark" by Mr Mitterrand in his television interview on 9 December 1981. Questioned on the location of a possible Palestinian state (which France favors) Mr Mitterrand had replied: "It is being discussed: Jordan, the West Bank.... The negotiators will decide."

Those few words greatly irritated the Jordanians. Indeed, Mr Mitterrand seemed to be supporting the Israeli argument that the Palestinian state is fine where it already is...in Jordan. At that time the Quai d'Orsay explained that it was a "misunderstanding." When he met with Arab journalists a few days later Mr Cheysson stated that in view of the "very large number" of Palestinians living in Jordan, Mr Mitterrand had simply meant that the "two states" (Palestinian and Jordanian) would necessarily have "very close relations" and that the Palestinians are "on the West Bank and in Jordan."

The Jordanian Government, for its part, wanted all confusion to be removed in the clearest and most formal way. The reference to Resolution 242 condemning the acquisition of the West Bank "by war" is likely to satisfy it, according to informed circles.

MARCHAIS: CANNOT 'LOOK IMPASSIVELY ON POLAND'

LD212300 Paris Domestic Service in French 2100 GMT 21 Feb 82

[Text] Georges Marchais made some amazing remarks about Poland during a speech he delivered in Nice tonight. The PCF secretary general said that it is impossible for communists to look impassively upon the developments in Poland, developments which include the suspension of fundamental freedoms, arrests, internments and even deaths.

SUPPLY OF ARMS, AMMUNITION TO CHAD WILL CEASE

AB181731 Paris AFP in French 1527 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 18 Feb (AFP) -- France has decided to stop its supply of arms and ammunition to Chad, official sources announced in Paris on Thursday.

The decision was made following the outcome of the meeting of the OAU Standing Committee on Chad held in Nairobi on 11 February 1982. Several resolutions were adopted at the meeting calling for the cease-fire to become effective on 28 February, the withdrawal of the OAU troops (Senegal, Zaire and Nigeria) on 30 June 1982 and the holding of free election in Chad before that date.

The supplies of arms to the Transitional National Union government were essentially made up of ammunition and light weapons.

SEYCHELLES PRESIDENT WANTS DEFENSE COOPERATION

AB181528 Paris AFP in French 1318 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 18 Feb (AFP) -- Seychelles President France Albert Rene stated in an interview to AFP on Thursday that his country wishes to establish close relations of cooperation with France in the military sphere.

The Seychelles head of state, who has just concluded a 48-hour official visit to France, explained that his country was anxious to set up a defense system that enables it to counter external threats. In this regard, he recalled that last November a group of mercenaries from South Africa attempted a coup in his country. That is why we are examining with France and with other friendly countries what form of cooperation we can initiate, President Rene added, explaining that the talks would be resumed later.

Mr Rene, who expressed the hope that French naval vessels would continue to stopover in the Seychelles, believes that it is necessary for a small country like his to feel that it has friends, which is also a deterrent factor, he said.

President Rene recalled that the Seychelles is and will remain fiercely nonaligned. We prefer establishing military cooperation with France or Britain rather than with either of the two superpowers to whom we will never grant a military base. We want to continue maintaining close cooperation with France in this sector, said Mr Rene, who underscored the friendly relations existing between the two countries.

President Rene then called for a (?fraternal) cooperation with France, devoid of any paternal feeling. For such cooperation to be genuine, he said, it must be a brotherly one. He expressed satisfaction that his French partners shared the same view and described President Francois Mitterrand as an extraordinary personality.

The Seychelles head of state also expressed his determination to make the Indian Ocean a zone of peace.

With regard to the trial of the seven mercenaries detained inthe Seychelles, Mr Rene said that the trial would be held in the next 2 months. President Rene will leave Paris Saturday for his country.

REAGAN COMMENTS ON EL SALVADOR 'DISAPPOINTMENT'

AU191602 Rome ANSA in English 1547 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 19 Feb (ANSA) -- United States President Ronald Reagan's press conference in Washington Thursday was a big disappointment to Italian press commentators who had hoped for a more explicit announcement of the White House's plans for El Salvador. The only significant statement they gleaned from the conference, Reagan's eighth since taking office, was that the administration in Washington has "no plans to send American combat troops into action" in the Central American state or anywhere else.

Typical of today's press reaction was the IL MESSAGGERO, title, "Reagan Doesn't Reply on Salvador." The U.S. President, in fact, refused to disclose the military options his government was considering. "I just don't believe that you discuss those options of what you may or may not do," he told reporters. The Rome daily challenged the historical accuracy of Reagan's reasoning when he said there was no parallel between U.S. involvement in Central America and U.S. moves in Vietnam in the 1960's.

According to the Italian Communist Party (PCI) newspaper, L'UNITA, Reagan's "reticence" and his insistence on maintaining it "dominated the press conference." While the PCI organ singled out the announcement that the administration had no plans for direct military intervention in Salvador as "the only commitment" the White House made, other newspapers saw that commitment as somewhat watered down by Reagan's refusal to discuss the military options his administration was considering.

Reagan's measured words, according to Rome's LA REPUBBLICA daily, were meant to "reassure American public opinion and play down the Salvador affair to some degree." And his caution was taken as a sign that the White House "sees the ground on which it might be tempted to venture as studded with political mines." "The most alarming doubts remain intact" was how the pro-communist PAESE SERA daily of Rome commented today on the conference. The expedient of putting off the decisions that regard Salvador, said PAESE SERA, "merely indicated (the Washington administration's) intention of coordinating its actions with its most loyal and submissive allies." In the meantime, the possibility of an indirect intervention in Salvador, perhaps with the Argentine Government's specialized anti-guerrilla task force, appears to be re-surfacing, the Rome daily added. Turin's LA STAMPA daily described Reagan's response to the mounting pressures of world public opinion and the U.S.'s allies as "cautious and evasive."

BERLINGUER REJECTS EXPANSION OF SOCIALIST BLOC

AU202010 Rome ANSA in English 1950 GMT 20 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 20 Feb (ANSA) -- The atomic era has altered the nature of the class struggle and extended its connotations beyond the realm of the logic of military blocs, according to Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer. The leader of Western Europe's biggest communist party elaborately laid out the reasons for his break with Moscow in the aftermath of the December 13 military take-over in Warsaw in an interview which will be published tomorrow in the PCI daily L'UNITA.

Peace was indicated (?as) the "supreme discriminating point" in international affairs now that nuclear arms have made war become the "absolute issue." "The class struggle is still an insupressable issue in internal and international affairs," he said, "but it has taken on a somewhat different nature in the atomic era." Now, he explained, the class struggle has to take a series of factors into account that do not strictly reflect the logic of military blocs.

Responding more specifically to the Italian party's "excommunication" from the Moscow-led socialist movement, Berlinguer charged the Soviet communists of "not having grasped the true cause and the effective nature of the Polish crisis."

Berlinguer rejected the "method of excommunication" used by the Soviet party in the January 23 tirade printed by PRAVDA. "With this mentality and with this method, you can't move along the paths of rennovation and reform we believe are necessary and possible," he complained.

"The idea that the development of socialism essentially entails the expansion of the so-called socialist bloc no longer stands, he argued. He explained what his party meant by advocating a "third path" of socialism this way: "We intend to emphasize the possibility and necessity of giving a European dimension to our effort for socialism. By this we mean a process that concretely enables all components of the workers and popular movements in West Europe to advance." Social democracy, he said, has not gotten ahead of capitalism in any country but "social democracy hasn't meant and does not mean the same thing in all places at all times."

Berlinguer predicted that the world economy's present recession will lead social democracy to start challenging capitalism. "That is where our interest lies.... We want to be a part of this quest with our peculiar experience and with all that we have elaborated as Italian communists, he said.

PCI JOURNAL REPLIES TO KOMMUNIST ARTICLE ATTACK

PM121101 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 5 Feb 82 p 16

[Text] Rome -- The edition of RINASCITA now on the newsstands carries the full text of the article in the Soviet theoretical journal KOMMUNIST that makes heavy attacks on PCI policy, together with a documented reply to the charges made in it. L'UNITA has already reported excerpts of the unsigned article in the latest edition of KOMMUNIST, based on the summary carried by TASS on 28 January. Now, with the intention of providing readers with complete and truthful information -- without which, RINASCITA writes, "there is no democracy, participation or possibility of self-government" -- the PCI journal has decided to publish the full text. Let us see, then, in short, the points on which the CPSU journals' polemic is based and RINASCITA's replies.

The KOMMUNIST article begins with the assertion that the international situation is characterized by "an unprecedented exacerbation" due to the aggressiveness of the United States and of Western imperialism. In this situation, in which the communists "are in the vanguard of the peace struggle," the PCI leaders, who view the international situation "through the entirely false prism of bloc policy" and put the United States and the USSR, NATO and the Warsaw Pact "on the same level," are developing an "abstract and supraclass" scheme of analysis. By so doing, the author of the article goes as far as to say, "the PCI leadership...is in practice providing grist for the mill of a single bloc, namely the imperialists."

Moreover, the criticisms of the assertions made by Italian Communists (though KOMMUNIST, like PRAVDA, always uses the expression "the PCI leaders") concerning real conditions in the USSR and other Eastern bloc countries are not dissimilar from the well-known ones formulated by PRAVDA. Citing Comrades Napolitano, Ingrao and Macaluso, as well as Berlinguer, by name, the article expresses outrage at the fact that "they permitted themselves to announce a 'regression' in the countries of the socialist community."

Unlike PRAVDA, the KOMMUNIST article goes on to discuss the events in Poland. But this is only to reassert the well-known Soviet theses and to accuse "the PCI leaders" of "interfering" in Poland's internal affairs by repeating "almost word for word the inventions of Reagan, Weinberger, Haig, Brzezinski and other imperialist politicians."

For these reasons, the CPSU journal concludes sententiously, the PCI's position "is alien not only to the cause of peace and socialism as a whole but also to the interests of the Italian working people."

So much for KOMMUNIST. RINASCITA's reply is very well argued. It proceeds from the opposition to the method used in the polemic (which "proceeds from certain definitions instead of from an analysis of the facts"), which is reminiscent of the one used for Yugoslavia's "excommunication." A method "whereby pages upon pages of polemic are heaped on a party whose real stances have never been presented is in itself a mistaken form of behavior." Thus, for instance, RINASCITA points out, "the article was written in order to attack the PCI. Nevertheless it starts with a condemnation of the Reagan administration's policy. But does it contain a single line about our prompt, ample and well-argued criticisms' of U.S. imperialist policy, about the support "we give to the countries and liberation movements subjected to its aggressive pressures and initiatives?"

Thus matters of form quite quickly become matters of substance. And with regard to the substance, RINASCITA radically challenges the CPSU journal's assertions. On the issue of the blocs, for instance. What sense is there in asserting that our policy for the progressive elimination of the blocs stems from a "supraclass" scheme? Such an objection conceals the idea that only one of the two blocs should be dissolved, because the other "is all right, indeed, is very good," since its policy is "declared authoritative and since it coincides with the...class principle." In its indication and censuring of the PCI's criticisms of the USSR's foreign policy, KOMMUNIST takes great care not to specify the events and actions that we describe as "big-power" behavior and that prompted these criticisms (Afghanistan, Czechoslovakia, the pressures on the nonaligned countries and so forth). In short, by depicting itself always and in every case as the "bastion of peace," the USSR is claiming a kind of "immunity from criticism" that it certainly does not deserve and "that is certainly not accepted by the masses...who have committed themselves on a large scale to the peace movement."

With regard to the Italian Communists' criticisms of the internal situation in the USSR and the Eastern bloc countries, RINASCITA reasserts their substance, pointing out that they did not originate suddenly but are rooted in a lengthy deliberation. KOMMUNIST, it writes, considers the (USSR's) system of democracy and the forms and institutions it describes with so much enthusiasm to be excellent, "but it should explain to us why "dissent explodes in such spectacular forms and is suppressed with unjustifiable measures." After confirming the substance of the PCI's position on the indissoluble bond between socialism and democracy, RINASCITA rejects the trite image of Italy that the Soviet journal depicts to support its argument that the Italian Communists are not entitled to criticize "real socialism." Italy "is not only" the country of poverty and unemployment.... It is this, unfortunately, but more besides. And it is more than this thanks to decades of struggles and gains of the working class, of the PCI. "Italy is also the country characterized by major class trade unions independent of the employers, the state and the parties and subordinate to the workers' control and criticism."

Last, the replies regarding Poland. After recalling the Italian Communists' well-known stances, RINASCITA adds: "The most surprising thing is that the PCI is accused of interfering in Poland's affairs." We have always expressed our ideas within full observance of other people's autonomy; and "surely it will be conceded to us that our opinions were not based on the 'arguments'...behind the CPSU's 'opinions.'"

The RINASCITA article ends with a clear-cut challenge to the right that the CPSU claims to decree that our policy "is alien and harmful" to the Italian people's interest. "On this point," the PCI journal writes, "the only appraisal we consider valid is that of the communists, workers, women, young people and workers masses, who...have made our communist party the strongest in the West."

RUBBI RESPONDS TO CHARGES BY CPSU'S ZAGLADIN

PM151247 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 9 Feb 82 p 2

[Text] Rome -- PAESE SERA this morning carries an interview with PCI Foreign Section Chief Antonio Rubbi in reply to Vadim Zagladin's interview.

"It is an interesting interview," Rubbi says, "whose calm and conversational tone one cannot fail to observe. Unfortunately Zagladin too evades answering the fundamental questions we have raised, but here at least are the conditions for a return to reasoning based on facts. But an obvious contradiction arises. How can Zagladin's tone and observations be reconciled with the PRAVDA and KOMMUNIST articles, which are actually disconcerting in their coarse and offensive language and their absolute lack of arguments? There can be no doubt that the seriousness of our analyses and concerns cannot be exorcized by excommunications. This is a contradiction that it is certainly not up to us to resolve. The contradiction is as follows: We cannot be accused of being against the interests of peace and socialism, of having taken a slippery path, of having gone over to the enemy camp, while at the same time talking about "fundamental convergences" and "shared interests."

"I am pleased to note," he adds, "Zagladin's assertion that the CPSU does not consider itself a church and does not intend to issue excommunications and that it acknowledges everyone's right to choose his own path. I hope this statement will be read and taken into account by CPSU representatives in all countries and forums where they exercise substantial influence. The PCI has not placed the socialist system 'before its tribunal' but has decided to render more complete certain stances that it had been developing, especially since the 20th CPSU Congress. I have the impression that the CPSU, however, has canceled that congress from history, whereas we have tried to learn its lesson, especially in view of the repetition and increasing gravity of serious and even lacerating crises, such as Czechoslovakia, Afghanistan and Poland. And above all at this point we have set ourselves a major problem: How to open up a new phase in the struggle for socialism."

The interviewer points out that Zagladin states that the PCI and CPSU view democracy differently....

Rubbi replies: "Undoubtedly. This is demonstrated by the fact that Soviet citizens and workers have not yet been given the opportunity to know our real stances. Why is this not done? Our discussion does not concern the various forms and institutions in which democracy can be organized in this or that country in this or that historical situation. It concerns the essential nucleus of democracy, in other words the real consensus, the direct participation and the democratic control of the masses. It seems to me, for instance, that it is impossible to deny that the events in Poland have shown that for millions of Polish workers the ways in which their life was organized were no longer accepted. As Berlinguer said in the Kremlin in 1977, 'democracy is a universal value' And as far as we are concerned, socialism cannot fail to reflect this value to the utmost."

Next the interviewer asks: The CPSU leader, while denying any interference in Polish affairs, states that in forming their assessment they adopted the same stance as the Polish communists. Indeed, their regret is that the PCI did not do the same in Italy. The Polish communists, Zagladin continues, acted that way "to prevent civil war." He concludes: "I do not believe the PCI regards civil war as better than martial law."

"Which verdict should we have regarded as valid?" Rubbi replies. "Giepek's, Kania's, Jaruzelski's? Now the Soviet press says Solidarity was a counterrevolutionary force, but there was a time when even PRAVDA acknowledged it as a "genuine" representative of the working class. It was acknowledged that the central problems of the crisis were of a domestic nature; now the quest for its causes seems to be directed mainly abroad. If, as we have tried to do since the outbreak of the crisis, the line of renewal had been steadfastly maintained, with no concessions either to the extremist elements or to the dogmatic and conservative elements, would we be faced with the dilemma presented to us by Zagladin, whereby we should accept the military coup and martial law as the alternative to civil war?

"We are certain there was another way -- a profound renewal that would admittedly have involved profound reforms in the form of socialism in Poland. It was decided not to face up to this new test; but this remains the problem posed by the Polish crisis."

Zagladin, the interviewer pointed out, states that there are clearly two conceptions of the struggle for socialism.

"The difference," the PCI leader replies, "does not lie in the fact that we do not see the class enemies, imperialism or the harshness of the struggle. It lies elsewhere. The conception of Stalinism offered us by Zagladin should embrace -- without even a critical analysis and without a determination to learn from them -- even Stalinism, the cultural revolution and Pol Pot. These are all experiences carried out in the name of socialism, with well-known results. We are breaking away from this manichean outlook (either with me or against me, all black or all white) and seeking to provide a different historical and critical answer. Zagladin describes it as a body without a skeleton and, if I have properly understood his line of argument, the skeleton should be predetermined by a series of principles. But what are these principles? The so-called general laws. But experience has shown that they are often divorced from reality and sometimes even hinder an understanding of the complexity and originality of certain historical, political, social and civil situations, as is the case with the majority of the Third World countries. Fidel Castro did not have the vanguard party, but nevertheless led the revolution to victory. The CCP entrusted the Long March not to the working class but to the peasant masses. And even the PCF devoted one its congresses some years ago to explaining why the struggle for socialism in France. The European workers' movement can still less conform to such principles and general laws. And the European workers' movement has already carried out experiences and made important gains along this path."

But, the interviewer objects, Zegladin says they have not made it possible to smash bourgeois hegemony....

"This is the very shortcoming of social democratic experiences that we are proclaiming and the new qualities of the experience that we want to build," Rubbi says.

Imperialist countries on one side and socialist countries on the other. As far as Zagladin is concerned, they are two systems (not two blocs) "whose struggle constitutes the linchpin of world development."

"Zagladin," Rubbi observes, "makes an important assertion when he says the world today is complicated and pluralistic. But for this very reason one should avoid reducing everything to the two poles, the two camps, the two systems. The real situation is in fact much more complex and cannot be reduced to a bipolar concept of the world, whereby you must be on one side or the other. An ever-increasing number of states, forces an movements want their own autonomous role, which they want to perform both with respect to the blocs and by gaining within the blocs themselves real scope for original and autonomous national experiences."

Another question was this: Zagladin states that the peace movement in Europe has never been so broad as it was after Afghanistan. Even Poland, he says, is having no effect.

"It is undeniable," Rubbi replies, "that the peace and disarmament movement in Europe suffered a heavy blow after 13 December, just as it did after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. I do not know on what basis Zagladin asserts the opposite. This, unfortunately, is a fact, just as it is a fact that one cannot consider waging the peace struggle in Europe unilaterally, just against the Pershing and cruise missiles.

"I would like to ask Zagladin, who at the time criticized our absence from the Paris conference, how many demonstrations were held on the basis of the document produced by that meeting of communist parties. None. Nor could it have been otherwise in view of the exclusively propagandistic and unilateral approach of that meeting. We have suffered delays, but then, together with the FRG and other northern countries, we helped organize the greatest peace movement in West Europe, not only in Italy. This is because our attitude toward weapons, balances and security was not unilateral and because we were able to provide specific and credible proposals to this movement."

"Unlike other communist parties," Rubbi continues, "we have never complained about the CPSU's contacts and meetings with the social democratic and socialist parties, starting with the Italian Socialists. To say, as we now do, that there are no 'special' relations among communist parties and other workers' parties and liberation and progressive movements implies on one hand rejecting any ideological, political and organizational ties, emphasizing our total and autonomous independence, and on the other aiming at a new and broader conception of internationalism that reflects the problems of the present era. I consider it natural for Zagladin to say he feels closer to the PCF than to the French PS. It would be less natural for us, for instance, to say that we feel closer to the Albanian Communist Party than to Willy Brandt's party. Having the same name does not always mean having closer stances. What counts are the facts, the specific substances of a policy and the actual conduct of a party."

Last, the interviewer asks: "Should we conduct a dialogue?" Zagladin mentions exchanges and meetings in 1982.

"Why should we not conduct a dialogue? We do so with everyone," Rubbi says, "and we want to continue doing so with everyone, and this must take place with everyone within everyone's full right to express their own opinions, to make criticisms and to receive substantiated answers to substantiated questions. And this must also be done without seeking identical views, even amid profound divergences on substantial issues. Will there be exchanges or meetings in 1982? We will certainly not be the ones to refuse them. The term "break" has never been used by us. You break away from an organization or a church. And that does not apply in our case."

L'UNITA SCORES TRYBUNA LUDU CRITICISM OF PCI

PM220915 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 12 Feb 82 p 17

[Excerpts] Warsaw -- The Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] organ TRYBUNA LUDU is criticizing the PCI, as the Hungarian NEPSZABADSAG has already done, but it does not entrust the polemic to an official and authoritative article by a member of the editorial staff but to an article by its Rome correspondent. The TRYBUNA LUDU journalist, whose tone is clearly different from that of the PRAVDA and KOMMUNIST writers, asserts untruthfully that "the assessments made by the PCI leadership disregard all the statements by the PZPR and our country's authorities," and he says that according to those official statements "the means adopted since 13 December are not ends in themselves but are of a temporary nature," and that "the broadest possible understanding is essential to extricate the country from crisis." All this -- and our readers have been informed of this -- has been asserted by the Polish authorities, but is not found in the attacks launched by PRAVDA and KOMMUNIST, to which the PCI has replied.

The Polish newspaper's embarrassment is clear, moreover, when, passing over the fact that the Polish working class has aligned itself with Solidarity and for renewal, it asserts that "a more realistic judgment, more in accordance with the facts and, above all, more class-oriented" might have been expected from the Italian Communists. After citing finally Comrade Cossutta's opposition, the newspaper concludes by combining embarrassed tones and distortions of the truth. It writes that it has "secured proof of solidarity [with the Polish authorities] on the part of most communists, though the PCI's stance is very remote from this line."

SOVIET AMBASSADOR APOLIGIZES TO MARIO SOARES

LD192038 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] The Soviet ambassador to Lisbon offered formal apologies to the secretary general of the Socialist Party, Mario Soares, following a note released by the Soviet Embassy in which Mario Soares was the target of harsh criticism. The secretary general of the Socialist Party accepted the apologies.

GOVERNMENT LISTS ILLEGAL ACTIONS DURING STRIKE

LD180044 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] Early this evening the prime minister's office released through the Ministry of Internal Administration a lengthy note containing an initial list of what the government describes as illegal actions carried out on 12 February [day of the general strike] symptomatic of the climate of individual and collective intimidation unleashed during the failed general strike.

In all districts of the country, the note says, several bomb threats were made although no bomb was detected by any bomb squad. A small explosive device went off, however, in Alcobaca, and two individuals were detained after having been found in possession of 11 sticks of dynamite, 4 fuses and 6 electric detonators. In Albergaria-a-velha, following a search in a worker's home, two machineguns, two handgrenades, ammunition and other items of military equipment were found and the owner of the house was detained by the National Republican Guard. The ministry's list also mentions several instances of tires of buses belonging to Rodoviaria Nacional having been deliberately punctured and nails scattered on various roads, as well as the placing of a small pine tree across the national road no. 310.

With regard to Lisbon District, the list is exhaustive. Highlighting the incidents in Rossio Square, it specifies that agitators staged an unauthorized gathering, provoked the public security police [PSP] and disregarded its orders.

The ministry's note adds that -- quote -- As a result of the clashes between the PSP and the agitators, some people were slightly injured: Portuguese television journalists and other people who had been earlier asked to clear the area for security reasons were involved in the incidents -- unquote. It should be pointed out in this connection that the ombudsman has ordered an investigation into the alleged assault by the riot police of a group of journalists on 12 February.

The note further states that the three people detained in Lisbon's Eduardo VII Park near a vehicle where firearms and a magnetic tape with a proclamation to the nation were found, are allegedly members of the Popular Forces of 25 April -- a leftist urban guerrilla organization. The note also mentions the closure of markets and town halls in municipalities where the United People's Alliance -- comprising the communists and the Portuguese Democratic Movement -- are in the majority.

COMMUNIST LEADER FORESEES FURTHER STRIKES

LD182206 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] The strike of 12 February was the biggest, most powerful strike with the widest participation in the history of the Portuguese trade union movement, Alvaro Cunhal reaffirmed today.

At a news conference in which the conclusions of yesterday's meeting of the PCP Central Committee were presented to the media, the communist leader was at one stage asked by a journalist about the possibility of new strikes being staged, and if so, whether any dates had already been set:

[Begin recording] [Words indistinct] certainly new strikes and demonstrations, new strikes will most definitely take place, Indeed, over the next few days there will be more strikes in various parts of the country. New strikes, new demonstrations, big strikes, big demonstrations are therefore in prospect, without any doubt. As to dates, let me point out that the Communist Party does not call strikes: I cannot, therefore, tell you anything about any dates. But there is no doubt that in the present situation new strikes, many strikes and big strikes are inevitable. [end recording]

Alvaro Cunhal then replied to another question about the possibility of another general strike being staged -- a possibility which Alvaro Cunhal did not rule out:

[Begin recording] The first one has already showed that the workers are in a position to stage it. We know that the government claimed that the general strike was not legal and that a politically motivated strike was not legal either. What has been proved is that not only before the law but also [words indistinct], a general strike is possible, legal and in compliance with the (? system of government) and that a politically motivated general strike is equally in compliance with the constitutional regime under which we live. The obvious and brilliant evidence of this, given on 12 February, therefore shows that such a prospect is not ruled out. [end recording]

During the news conference, Alvaro Cunhal further denounced the conduct of Mario Soares who disassociated himself from the strike called by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers, adding that many socialists supported the stoppage, thereby proving that there are sectors in the Socialist Party which disagree with the orientation of its secretary general.

BALSEMAO PLANS VISIT TO ITALY LATE THIS MONTH

LD171852 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1800 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Text] Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao will pay a working visit to Rome on the 24th of this month. Balsemao, who will also be traveling to The Netherlands, is to fly to Italy at the invitation of Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini. In The Netherlands, the Portuguese Prime Minister will hold talks with his Netherlands counterpart and will be received in audience by Her Majesty, Queen Beatrix.

FOREIGN MINISTER TO VISIT ANGOLA IN MARCH

LD181418 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Excerpts] A Foreign Ministry spokesman in Lisbon confirmed today that Foreign Minister Andre Goncalves Pereira will be paying a 3-day official visit to the People's Republic of Angola, beginning 9 March, at the invitation of External Relations Minister Paulo Jorge. This will be the first visit by a Portuguese foreign minister to the former Southwest African colony since it became independent on 11 November 1975. Earlier, Foreign Minister Pereira will go to Brazil where the Angolan external relations minister has visited recently.

Meanwhile, the Portuguese news agency ANOP quoted official sources in Maputo today as saying that Portugal had suggested to Mozambique that a more suitable time for Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao's planned official visit to the country, at the invitation of Maputo authorities, would be May and not March as originally proposed by Mozambique.

MARTIN VILLA SURVEYS POLITICAL SITUATION

PM171531 Madrid YA in Spanish 9 Feb 82 pp 1, 3

[Maria Merida interview with Spanish Deputy Premier Rodolfo Martin Villa: "Government Will Maintain Organic Law on Harmonization of Autonomy Process" -- date and place of interview not given]

[Text] "Contrary to the impression which is usually conveyed to the public, the country has improved appreciably over the last few months. The national agreement on employment, whose contribution to social peace is indisputable, has been signed: The real renewal of the autonomy process has begun, thanks to the decisive influence of the pacts which were signed; a significant step forward in Spain's integration into the Western world has been taken with our application to join NATO; and, with an appreciable reduction in terrorist actions, the standard of public safety has improved. Things are infinitely better than in February 1981. The most negative aspect of the situation is still unemployment."

Deputy Premier for Political Affairs Rodolfo Martin Villa reviewed the panorama of our democratic process and broached the most contentious issues of the present time in lengthy statements to our contributor Maria Merida. Concerning the imminent 23 February [date of attempted coup] trial, he said that "It is a matter which must be assessed in its correct dimension and not exaggerated in its progress or its consequences. It is a matter strictly within the scope of military jurisdiction, and it is a matter solely of administering justice. No kind of commotion is likely, nor is action by new and presumed destabilizing elements foreseeable."

Martin Villa confirmed to us the government's resolute intention to maintain the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process -- "an essential part of the autonomy agreements and therefore of the process of ordering the autonomies." "The parliamentary minorities are not entitled to impose their viewpoints by threatening to quit the game, which is a way like any other of hindering the free expression of national sovereignty." But he later stated that the disagreements with the nationalists "must be taken by us in their correct dimension and under no circumstances taken as slights. It is no slight to Spain to disagree with the government of the nation, nor, therefore, should the differences with the Generalitat [autonomous Catalonian government] be interpreted as a slight to Catalonia.

Asked whether the government is prepared to accept the possibility of a socialist triumph on the new election, Martin Villa said that posing this question "is the same as asking whether we members of the government believe in democracy. Of course we accept that possibility quite naturally. But a socialist triumph is no more than a laboratory hypothesis which will not come to be realized."

[Question] What worries you especially as regards covering the stage of the next 3 months?

[Answer] Obviously there are facts which worry me like every Spaniard at the present time: the economic situation, terrorism, the issues concerning parliamentary stability, international tensions and, unfortunately, many others. However, I am very fundamentally worried by the problem of unemployment, and especially the problems of young people who cannot find their first jobs. I believe that our foremost duty is to create new jobs. Both the government, the opposition and, in short, the whole of Spanish society should display determination in their ability to respond to the country's problems. [answer ends]

Martin Villa, who knows perfectly the scope and the possibilities of parliamentary arithmetic, when asked whether the unstable and apparently confused situation in the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] will decisively harm and gravely jeopardize the new parliamentary session, or whether, on the contrary, this clarification vis-a-vis the public of who the politicians in his party are and what they want is a good thing, replied: "It is clear that these desertions could harm the proper functioning of the democratic institutions by causing splits in the balance of the parliamentary forces. This is the case and there is no reason to conceal it; let every deputy shoulder his own responsibility. On the other hand, it is clear that this kind of occurrence helps to clarify the options and to fit certain figures into the place which really belongs to them in the political spectrum.

[Question] Does the government still reject the advisability of a coalition with other political groups or forces, hoping to achieve an agreement in principle on important matters without needing it?

[Answer] Much of the state still remains to be made, and the constitution is not as yet completely implemented. For that very reason the government has submitted to the Cortes Generales many parliamentary initiatives, some of them stemming from the autonomy agreements. The government will constantly study the possibility of reaching certain agreements on specific issues in parliament, provided they do not jeopardize the model of the state envisaged in the constitution or the political option which we represent.

[Question] Will the government continue to adopt a firm stance of carrying through the organic bill on the harmonization of the autonomy process, despite the considerable and obvious disagreements on the part of both the Catalonian and Basque leaders?

[Answer] The organic bill on the harmonization of the autonomy process is the essential part of the autonomy agreements, and therefore of the process of ordering the autonomies. Beginning this process was my principal concern as minister of territorial administration. These agreements and, with them, the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process constitute a clear attempt to achieve that ordering of the autonomy process which the whole of Spanish society has deemed necessary, including the nationalist parties. It has also definitely helped Spanish society to largely dispel that image of confusion or disorder which previously might have surrounded the autonomy process. Naturally, it is the government's intention to maintain the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process inasmuch as it renders unnecessary a future statutory or constitutional reform concerning the autonomy issue. The nationalist parties have criticized this bill, often harshly, but these criticisms have sometimes proven to be unfounded, as we have seen, for instance, in the constitutional court's recent rulings on savings banks, strengthening in broad outline the stance of the law on the harmonization of the autonomy process concerning the issue of the necessary unity of economic policy.

Governability Means Observing Constitution

[Question] To what extent does the government rely on the support and cooperation of the Basque and Catalonian minorities [in parliament], and to what extent does it need that support for a better governability of the state?

[Answer] The government has a political and moral duty to observe and enforce the constitution, from the preliminary title to the last of the temporary provisions; also, as could not be otherwise, with regard to the autonomous communities. The public authorities, which are not confined purely to the government, have an inescapable duty to look after the state and the overall interest of the Spanish people. So the surprising thing is that strict performance of these two fundamental duties could cause any kind of problem. The governability of the country is therefore helped by observing the constitution, respecting the state and developing the overall interest.

[Question] In your opinion, will the preelection year which we have begun considerably increase in a dangerous manner existing political tension, and will any move, action or omission have an electioneering nature, so unfavorable for resolving the country's intense and truly important problems?

[Answer] As in every democratic country, it is natural, as the date of a new election approaches, that political parties' activities begin to have an electioneering tinge, aimed at effecting a rapprochement with their electorates. This fact should be viewed quite calmly and should not affect at all the responsibilities of both the ruling party and of the majority political forces in opposition. This should be the case, especially in a situation such as the present, with the existence of major problems which are only those characteristic of a political change such as that which Spain has experienced. I am therefore confident that, as has happened so far, the principal political forces represented in parliament will maintain respect for their duties above their mere party interests.

[Question] What will happen, Mr Martin Villa, if the UCD also loses the May election in Andalusia, just as in the rest of the autonomous communities?

[Answer] As the prime minister himself recently stated, history does not end next May 23d. It is only another step in the implementation of the autonomies. The outcome of the election should not affect decisively either the government or the party supporting it. Of course the UCD will strive to secure the greatest possible number of votes, and we will attempt to repeat the favorable results which we secured in the 1979 general election.

PSOE Contradictory

[Question] What is your opinion of the statements by the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], which are apparently contradictory but to some extent reflect possible relations between the Socialists and the UCD?

[Answer] Spanish socialism is struggling, it is true, in contradictions. But, fortunately, these do not affect relations between the PSOE and the UCD, which are those normal between the ruling party and the foremost opposition party, although they are influenced by the fact that the two forces have concerted their respective policies on what were and remain real state problems. [answer ends]

Concerning whether it is definitely ruled out that this legislative term will not be completed and a new election called soon, before the end of 1982, he stated: "The prime minister has already repeatedly made known his intention to complete the current legislative term. This decision is being firmly maintained, and the government and the UCD will do everything in their power to prevent the election being brought forward. At this moment there are sufficient conditions for maintaining this thesis."

[Question] What is your opinion of what was stated by Spanish Employers' Chairman Mr Ferrer Salat concerning massive financial support in the coming Andalusian election?

[Answer] It is clear that every social group can opt for support for the political option which it believes can defend its interests best. The employers cannot be denied what is approved on the part of the trade union federations, some of which are mere driving belts of a certain party.

[Question] Mr Deputy Premier, is the military atmosphere suitable at this moment for the current political situation in Spain? Is there no excessive concern in any sector of the army?

[Answer] Some grave events over the last few months have created an atmosphere of anxiety about the issue of the military. Public opinion has paid excessive attention to this sector, exaggerating a reality which was overwhelmingly one of complete normality. As opposed to this, we must recall all the public statements by military dignitaries. In all of them the armed forces' loyalty to the King, their respect for the constitutional order and their obedience to the government of the nation have been clear.

[Question] To what extent do you believe that the French Government with its approaches and attitudes is harming not only Spanish economic interests but also strictly political interests with its lack of cooperation and support?

[Answer] Obviously, the policy of good-neighborliness which we have traditionally maintained with France has shown cracks for several years. The stance of an at-times lukewarm or at other times nonexistent cooperation in connection with terrorism, or the most recent French stances concerning our joining the EEC make us question the reality of friendly and genuine relations with the neighboring country. New hopes concerning terrorism were aroused with the PS' accession to power, but after a few months these hopes have proved unfounded, since cooperation currently leaves much to be desired.

CARILLO COMMENTS ON ELECTIONS, UPCOMING TRIAL

LD212206 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 21 Feb 82

[Text] The Spanish Socialist Workers' Party (PSOE), with its policy of trying to reassure the bankers, is not working toward winning elections but rather toward preparing the victory of the natural majority of Manuel Fraga, according to Santiago Carrillo, who spoke this morning at a meeting held in a Madrid cinema. Carrillo said: Fraga and Calvo-Sotelo will not stand in the elections together because they think they will gain more votes if they stand separately, but they will join forces afterwards.

As regards the 23 February trial, he said: I am not mistrustful of military justice, but I am afraid that the government will not be able to guarantee the supremacy of civil power over the military.

Referring to the PSOE's announcement that it will not carry out nationalizations, Carrillo said that the PCE will call for the nationalization of the banks which financed the 23 February coup and of the firms which finance the Popular Alliance [AP] and the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD]. The PCE secretary general focused a large part of his address on affirming the identity of the Communist Party as the legitimate heir of a revolutionary tradition. He also criticized U.S. President Reagan and his interventionist policy as well as the speech by the U.S. secretary of state, Alexander Haig, at the Madrid conference saying that one cannot talk of human rights when they are daily being trampled upon, he said. Finally, he spoke of the crisis within the PCE and made an appeal to the dogmatists and the renewalists saying that there is room for everyone in the PCE on the condition that the statutes are respected.

SUSPECTED BASQUE TERRORIST COMMANDO ARRESTED

LD210030 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 20 Feb 82

[Text] The Joint Antiterrorist Command issued a communique tonight on the arrest of members of a suspected legal [as heard] Basque Fatherland and Freedom Military Front [ETA-military] commando called (Lauedtxeta) which has been operating for 2 years in the area of San Sebastian and Renteria. They were found in possession of a quantity of ammunition and, at the time of arrest, were awaiting a member of the civil guard whom they had previously kept under surveillance in order to murder him. The detainees were in possession of data about members of state security forces and Basque civilians against whom they were proposing to carry out assassinations and terrorist acts.

GOVERNMENT RESIGNS, NEW MINISTERS APPOINTED

LD191150 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1030 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] The country's government has changed. Just over an hour ago President of the Republic Mauno Koivisto accepted the resignation of the four-party government led by Prime Minister Eino Uusitalo, which Koivisto himself led until early September. In place of the government which served exactly 1,000 days, the president appointed Kalevi Sorsa's third government whose basis is the same as that of its predecessor. The former government this afternoon will pay a farewell call at the president's palace. A complimentary call by the new government will follow. The new government is the 62d government.

This third government headed by Sorsa has five Social Democrats, six ministers from the Center Party, three from the Finnish People's Democratic League and two from the Swedish People's Party. The foreign trade minister is independent.

Koivisto Meets New Government

LD192130 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The President of the Republic Mauno Koivisto expects an active attitude toward international issues from the new government. President Koivisto says that he hopes that the government will follow international matters more intensely and adopt a stand if necessary. President Koivisto expressed his wish this afternoon when the new government paid a complimentary call on him following the outgoing government's visit. In addition to international affairs, President Koivisto expressed the wish that the government inform the Diet of its plans more often than before.

The new government presented its program and its views on the country's economic prospects at a news conference this afternoon. Premier Sorsa forecast more pressures than usual on the government in this year because of economic difficulties and political tensions. Minister of Finance Ahti Pekkala noted that we are presently experiencing the bottom year of the economic recession. The National Economy Department in the Ministry of Finance has calculated that the guidelines for economic policy presented in the government program will safeguard a 1 percent growth in the gross national product in 1982-83. At the same time, the rise in prices should slow down 0.5 percent and unemployment should drop by 10,000 to 15,000 people. Eero Tuomainen, head of the Economic Planning Center, will act as secretary to Premier Kalevi Sorsa.

LORD CARRINGTON'S ZIMBABWE VISIT STILL ON

LD180006 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2242 GMT 17 Feb 82

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] The political crisis in Zimbabwe caused by the sacking from the cabinet of former guerrilla leader Mr Joshua Nkomo has not so far led to any change in Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington's plans to visit the country next week. The Foreign Office said tonight: "Under present arrangements it is still the foreign secretary's intention to go ahead with the visit." Lord Carrington is due to visit Zimbabwe from February 25 to 27.

When the official announcement of the visit was made about a month ago the Foreign Office said Lord Carrington would hold talks with political leaders, including Prime Minister Mr Robert Mugabe and Mr Nkomo. Lord Carrington got to know both Zimbabwe's main political leaders well during the three month conference at Lancaster House, where Zimbabwe's independence arrangements were worked out.

Tonight the Foreign Office, still receiving reports of the developing crisis, would say only: "The foreign secretary still intends to meet leading personalities in Zimbabwe." But it was not clear if he will be able to meet Mr Nkomo.

A Foreign Office spokesman said: "Today's events must be looked on as an internal Zimbabwean development. "It is not for the British Government to comment."

GRENADA WILL SEEK RENEWAL OF AID AGREEMENT

PM181257 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 18 Feb 82 p 5

[Ian Ball report: "Grenada To Seek More British Aid"]

[Excerpt] St George's, Grenada -- Grenada is to seek a renewal of the British aid agreement which expires this year despite the "rude and arrogant" Foreign Office comments about the island's shift into the Cuban-Soviet camp and its internal campaign of repression. The present aid agreement has been worth about 2.5 million pounds to Grenada.

"Comrade Minister" Selwyn Strachan, 34, who holds the newly-created National Mobilisation portfolio in the People's Revolutionary Government, said Grenada had no qualms about seeking this aid. Britain had an obligation to aid former colony which it had "exploited and raped" over the years, he said, and would open negotiations later this year.

Letters to Reagan

The minister said that Grenadians were "broad minded" enough to regard the abuses of colonialism as an experience of the past. The queen, he pointed out, was "still Grenada's titular head of state." Grenada became independent as a member of the Commonwealth in 1974.

But the hostility displayed by the United States was a matter of real concern, a quarrel which made no sense in which Grenada had been "bending over backward" to resolve. To emphasise the point, he gave me the inside story of Grenada's attempts to arrange a summit meeting with President Reagan: "Our prime minister (Mr Maurice Bishop) wrote two personal letters to Reagan pointing out that there is no need for this arrogant and hostile behaviour. The second letter was a 12-page one. We have not received a reply -- apart from a one-paragraph acknowledgement from a third secretary in the American Embassy in Barbadoes. A third secretary replying to a prime minister!"

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS SESSION COVERS BASIC RIGHTS

NC181937 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] A new meeting in the framework of the intercommunal talks was held this afternoon. There was further discussion at the meeting on points of coincidence of view. The UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Mr Gobbi, stated before the meeting that the fruitful -- as he termed it -- exchange of views on the basic rights and freedoms would continue. Answering a question on whether there was any time limit, Mr Gobbi said no time limits can be determined in negotiations. Mr Gobbi went on: The discussion on the [Waldheim] evaluation started only 2 months ago, and no miracles can be expected in negotiations of such improtance. He also said that some specific results have been attained in the negotiations.

The Greek Cypriot side's representative at the talks, Mr Ioannidhis, stated that discussion on the four topics of the agenda was to continue with specific emphasis on the constitution in an attempt to find points of agreement. He said: Until now we h covered the general provisions of the constitution concerning human rights and freedoms, and we will proceed further. Mr Ioannidhis added; There are some points on which we agree in principle and other points on which we disagree. He also said a list of points of disagreement is being prepared which the interlocutors will go back to discuss. Mr Ioannidhis further said he was not in a position to make any assessment on a time schedule and added that efforts will continue in good will toward achieving progress.

At the same time, the Turkish Cypriot side's representative at the talks, Mr Onan, said there are enough points of agreement on the issue of human rights. A UN statement on today's meeting says the talks were continued in accordance with the agenda and that further discussion on points of coincidence of views was held. The next meeting of the intercommunal talk will be held on 26 February.

KIPRIANOU, NEW POLISH ENVOY VIEW CURRENT ISSUES

NC122014 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 12 Feb 82

[Text] President Kiprianou has stated that the intercommunal dialogue has brought no results thus far, and he has reiterated that if there is no progress within a reasonable time, Cyprus will bring the Cyprus issue before the UN General Assembly again and possibly also to the UN Security Council. Speaking today at the ceremony marking the presentation of the credentials of the Polish ambassador to Cyrpus, Mr Janusz Lewandowski, President Kiprianou stressed that the international community must take the necessary measures to compel Turkey to abandon its intransigent stance and expansionist plans and withdraw from Cyprus. Undoubtedly, he added, in many instances the international community, through the UN resolutions, has expressed itself favorably on the Cyprus issue; however, the time has come when it must do something more.

Mr Kiprianou has once again charged that the Turkish side completely ignores the UN resolutions, while at the same time it continuously violates the summit agreements, which constitute the basis of the negotiations. President Kiprianou stressed that this situation cannot continue forever and must end as soon as possible for the good of all Cypriots and peace in the region.

Mr Kiprianou expressed particular thanks for Poland's consistent support toward Cyprus as well as the assurance that this support will continue. With regard to the Polish situation, President Kiprianou said the Cypriots are following the events with great interest and concern. He added: Our position is that whatever is happening in Poland must be solved internally. He also expressed the hope that the developments will be such that the measures that have been taken will be lifted soon.

He also expressed the conviction that the Polish people have the ability and the prudence to resolve their problem without foreign intervention and have the patriotism to serve the best interests of their country. President Kiprianou wished the Polish people a speedy solution to their problem, calm, peace and progress.

In presenting his credentials, Ambassador Lewandowski said his country has supported, now supports and will continue to support a just solution of Cyprus' problems and its people's inalienable right to live in their own sovereign, integral and nonaligned country. Such a solution, he stressed, which the greater part of the international community supports, as demonstrated by the many UN resolutions, will be in the interest of international peace and security.

Referring to the situation in his country, the Polish ambassador said the government, according to the constitution, was forced to take temporary measures to avoid internal strife and to protect the nation and the state from catastrophe. He added: These measures, although they were disturbing to the Polish people at first, removed the threat of a confrontation in Europe. However, these measures will be ended as soon as possible. Mr Lewandowski said his country does not ignore the possible concern of its true friends. However, it categorically rejects any efforts to intervene in the country's internal affairs.

AKEL CALLS FOR UNITY IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

NC201831 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 20 Feb 82

[Text] AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou, addressing a gathering of his party's organization for the city and suburbs of Nicosia, said the presidential election to be held in approximately 11 months will be the most significant in Cyprus' recent history. Papaioannou said there is a need for true change for the benefit of the interests of the workers, laborers, farmers, professionals and artisans, scientists and others. This change, he added, can be brought about only by the democratic forces with the support of the only representative force that supports change -- the working people.

The AKEL secretary general said these forces could win the presidential election with a great majority only through unity of the patriotic forces on the basis of a minimum program and with measures for the implementation of such a program.

May Congress

[Text] A statement issued by the AKEL press bureau stresses that "preparations for the 15th AKEL congress, which will convene in Nicosia 13-16 May, are proceeding in a climate of enthusiasm, responsibility and firm faith in the Cypriot working people and the future." The statement adds: "The Political Bureau of the AKEL Central Committee, which convened in two meetings, has studied and approved the report on action by the party's Central Committee and Central Control Committee prepared by the Central Secretariat. This important document consists of seven [as published] basic chapters: international developments, the Cyprus problem, the Cyprus political situation, the economic situation of Cyprus, the mass movement and duties. The document has been distributed to the members of the Central Committee and Central Control Commission, which will convene at the beginning of March to study and approve the document in its final form.

"After approval by the plenum, the report of action will be printed in 15,000 copies and distributed to all party members for study and discussion at their party organizations. Thus, the document to be submitted to the congress for debate will be the result of a collective work by the leadership and the party as a whole."

"Meanwhile, all the communist and workers parties abroad have been informed of the AKEL congress and many parties have been invited to send delegations.

"The 15th AKEL congress acquires particular significance, as it will convene at a time of international tension, particularly in the areas of the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East, because of the aggressiveness of imperialism and its stooges. The significance of the congress becomes even greater by the fact that in 10 or 11 months the presidential elections will be held and these elections will be the most significant in the history of Cyprus."

CAGATAY SAYS COALITION EFFORTS NOW AT IMPASSE

TA171644 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Lefkosa, 17 Feb (AA) -- Prime Minister of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus Mustafa Cagatay, who has been asked by President Raul Denktas to form a new government, announced Wednesday his talks with the Communal Liberation Party for a possible coalition ended in an impasse. Cagatay, whose National Unity Party minority government has been given a vote of nonconfidence, believed all contact with the Communal Liberation Party had been ruptured and charged the party's leader, Alpay Durduran, for the failure of coalition talks. He told the press he would now confer with officers of the Democratic People's Party and the Turkish Unity Party, each holding one seat in the 40-seat federated assembly, as well as independent deputy Nejat Konuk.

Durduran Rebuttal

TA181615 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Communal Liberation Party [CLP] leader Alpay Durduran has said that if there is a government crisis in our country, the National Unity Party [NUP], which has gone bankrupt, the Denktas policy and the liberal economy being implemented in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus are responsible for it. Durduran held a news conference today and replied to accusations by NUP leader and Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay. He categorically denied the accusation that he is the reason why a government cannot be formed.

Noting that in the recent elections the people condemned the liberal economy policy being implemented by the NUP, Durduran added that the negative developments since the elections have been occurring because of insistent attempts to defend this policy, which had been condemned by the people. Noting that the CLP had taken steps to secure a change in this policy, Durduran said talks between his party and the Republican Turkish Party [RTP] and the Democratic People's Party [DPP] and later the NUP were part of these steps. Pointing out that in the elections the people had decided that the NUP could no longer remain in power, Durduran said: Despite the will of the people, the NUP still believes it can remain in power, and the whole crisis stems from this belief.

FIRST CULTURAL PACT PROGRAM SIGNED WITH PRC

NC192200 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] The first cultural program -- in implementation of the Cyprus-PRC cultural agreement -- for 1982 and 1983 was signed at the Foreign Ministry today. The program, signed on behalf of the PRC by Vice Minister Wang Lanxi and on behalf of Cyprus by the director general of the Foreign Ministry, Mavrommatis, provides for cooperation in the scientific, educational and sports sectors and for cultural exchanges and scholarships. In a statement, Mavrommatis said every effort will be made by Cyprus toward implementation of what was agreed in an effort to expand bilateral relations. In his reply, the Chinese vice minister emphasized that the signing of the cultural program is an important development in Cyprus-PRC relations, which are entering a new phase. The signing ceremony was also attended by PRC Ambassador Cao Chi.

PAPANDREOU, KIPRIANOU BEGIN ROUND OF DISCUSSIONS

NC191510 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] In Athens today President Kiprianou and Greek Prime Minister Papandreou had a private meeting at Mr Papandreou's political office. The meeting lasted 2 hours. After the meeting, Prime Minister Papandreou stated that the meeting and the talks took place in an atmosphere of optimism.

A broad conference followed at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In addition to President Kiprianou and Prime Minister Papandreou, the conference was attended by the foreign ministers, Rolandhis and Kharalambopoulos; Minister to the Prime Minister Koutsoyiorgas; Greek Ambassador to Cyprus Zakharakis; Cyprus Ambassador Khatzimiltis; Ambassador Mikhailidhis; Vovidhis, director of President Kiprianou's office; Siambos, director of the [Cyprus] foreign minister's office; and Makhairitsas, diplomatic adivser to the Greek prime minister. The conference lasted about 1 hour. No statements were made after the conference. However, it has been learned from authoritative circles that the object of the talks were soundings in connection with an international conference on the Cyprus problem in case of failure of the intercommunal talks as well as various international initiatives pertinent to the Cyprus problem and various activities by the Greek Government.

Tomorrow there will be a conference between Rolandhis and Kharalambopoulos. Other officials will also attend the conference. At 1900 President Kiprianou will have another private meeting at Kastri with Prime Minister Papandreou. The talks will be concluded Monday morning and statements by President Kiprianou and Prime Minister Papandreou will follow.

Statements 20 Feb

[Excerpt] President Kiprianou tonight had a second meeting in Athens with Prime Minister Papandreou. The meeting took place in the president's suite at the Grande Bretagne Hotel and lasted for about an hour. After the meeting Prime Minister Papandreou made the following following statement to a Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation correspondent: Our cooperation with President Kiprianou and the Cypriot foreign minister is progressing. We believe we can truly see light at the end of the tunnel. Papandreou also said that tomorrow there will be an official statement. President Kiprianou stated: I share what Greek Prime Minister Papandreou stated.

Official Statement

NC211217 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 21 Feb 82

[Text] A short while ago the following official statement was issued simultaneously in Athens and Nicosia:

Since certain developments in the course of the Cyprus issue have been discerned recently which made consultations necessary between the two governments without delay, it was deemed expedient for Cyprus President Kiprianou to visit Athens for an exchange of views with Greek Prime Minster Papandreou. After the first private meeting between the two leaders and after official conferences that followed between the foreign ministers of the two countries, Mr Kharalambopoulos and Mr Rolandhis, the two leaders had another private meeting yesterday evening. In the framework of the continuous and direct cooperation and mutual briefings between the two governments for the best possible coordination in promoting the national issue of Cyprus, the two sides have studied the above developments — which are still in the stage of being worked out and further formulated -- and will continue their consultations next week on the occasion of the visit to Nicosia by Greek Prime Minister Papandreou.

Talks May Continue

Mr Papandreou and Mr Kiprianou will have another round of talks Monday morning and probably on Tuesday. The two leaders will make statements after they conclude their talks. Mr Kiprianou will leave Athens at noon on Tuesday.

KARAMANLIS WARNS OF OUTSIDE DANGERS TO COUNTRY

NC202100 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 20 Feb 82

[Text] President Karamanlis has warned that Greece is faced with serious outside dangers and stressed the need to forge national unity and strengthen the armed forces. During a speech tonight at Ioannina, where he is attending observances of the 69th anniversary of the city's liberation from the Turkish yoke, President Karamanlis said Greece is in the midst of volcanoes, some of which are active while others are ready to explode.

We are faced with serious dangers from the outside, he added. Our dispute with Turkey, Karamanlis said, is becoming more severe instead of abating and, if wisdom and calm spirits do not prevail, it could develop into a painful adventure for both our peoples. For this reason, we are obliged to keep our national defense impenetrable. We must strengthen our armed forces and protect them against undermining activities and we must continually improve our foreign positions. Most of all, the president underscored, we must forge our national unity.

SOVIET OIL PRICE -- The Soviet Union has reduced by $1.50 a barrel the price of crude oil it will supply Greece by the end of 1982. The deputy commerce minister has announced that this reduction in price will save $12 million in foreign exchange. [Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 19 Feb 82 NC]

INDUSTRIAL COOPERATION WITH USSR -- Industry and Energy Minister Peponis today received Soviet Ambassador Kaboshkin and a representative of the Soviet organization Tekhnopromeksport and discussed matters of cooperation between the two countries in industry and energy. They also discussed implementation of the agreement recently signed by a French-Soviet consortium for construction and installation of two major thermoelectric units in the area of Amindaion. Also discussed was the submission by the Soviet firm of a feasibility study for installation in Greece of an alumina production unit. The feasibility study will be submitted to the Greek Government in May. [Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 19 Feb 82 NC]

ARMENIAN SECRET ARMY OFFICER EXPLAINS OBJECTIVES

PM151645 London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 12 Feb 82 pp 20-22

[Zaki Shabah interview with Hagop Hagopian, "a commander" of the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia, in Lebanon "last week"]

[Excerpts] AL-HAWADITH: What are your objectives?

Hagopian: Our aim is to liberate the Armenian territory occupied by the Turkish regime and set up a socialist society in liberated Armenia.

AL-HAWADITH: Do you believe terrorism is the only way to achieve your goals?

Hagopian: Lest you be deluded by the Western media, I tell you that our methods are not terrorist. If our revolutionary methods are to be described as terrorist, then addressing you as an Arab journalist, I could say that the Palestinian revolution's methods are terrorist, and I could say the same thing about the Arab struggle against the Ottoman, British and French occupations. So please reword your question.

AL-HAWADITH: What is your attitude toward other Armenian political parties?

Hagopian: Our attitude toward the Armenian political parties is quite clear. Undoubtedly they are traditional parties and their role in exile has come to an end because they have no programs for the liberation of Armenia at this stage. Their political programs are strictly for the preservation of the "Armenian identity of the Armenians." This is why we have formed the Armenian Secret Army for the liberation of the occupied territory and have kept away from these parties because of their conventional character and their relations with the regimes where they establish their headquarters.

AL-HAWADITH: So there is no coordination between you and them?

Hagopian: None whatever.

AL-HAWADITH: There is a large Armenian community in the United States. Do you receive aid from that community? Do you have any links with it, bearing in mind your leftist tendencies?

Hagopian: We have relations with our masses whatever we are. The leftist nature of our organization does not stem from what the West calls "the international left" but from commitment to and coherence with our Armenian masses. It stems from our commitment to the interests of these masses and to our central cause, be it in the United States, Europe or the Middle East. If our commitment to our cause and rights is interpreted as being leftist then we are leftists.

AL-HAWADITH: What is your attitude toward the Armenian Republic? Do you see it as a manifestation of the national state you dream about?

Hagopian: We are proud of the Soviet Armenian Republic and of the fact that it has struggled and managed to play a major part in the preservation and development of Armenian culture, technology, industry and so on. It also places all its resources at the service of other people in the other Soviet republics and at the service of the Arab people and the oppressed people of Africa. Whenever the Soviet Union provides any form of support for the Palestinian revolution or the Arab states there is an automatic contribution to this support from the Republic of Armenia. As the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia, we say here for the record that the officials of the Soviet Republic of Armenia have abandoned their struggling compatriots in exile and have not done their duty to the central Armenian cause.

AL-HAWADITH: Is this a threat?

Hagopian: Not at all. We are merely drawing their attention to their responsibilities.

AL-HAWADITH: What is your attitude toward the Soviet Union? Is your organization a national one or an international socialist organization?

Hagopian: On the basis of our political strategy and line, and on the basis of our assessment of the international conflicts, we have stated that our enemy is the fascist Turkish regime, including all its military and civilian establishments. We also consider anyone who supports this regime to be an emeny. We consider all the socialist bloc states to be friends of our people and our cause, and we consider all the revolutionary and liberation movements to be strategic allies of our revolution.

AL-HAWADITH: What are your terms for peace with Turkey?

Hagopian: There can be no peace with Turkey except with the liberation of all our territory.

AL-HAWADITH: What is your relationship with the Armenian Orly organization?

Hagopian: No relations, really. The Orly organization was a surprise to us, but as you know contact was established between us. We met and held talks with the Orly leaders, and we provided the required support. They indeed proved their effectiveness when they forced the French regime to release struggler (Dimitry Georgio), who is sitting right here with you.

AL-HAWADITH: Is Beirut a major springboard for your army for the rest of the world?

Hagopian: Beirut is like any other capital where there are Armenians, as you know. So we can say that it is not a major springboard.

AL-HAWADITH: Is there any relationship between you and the Red Brigades organization, the Baader-Meinhof organization and the Japanese Red Army?

Hagopian: We have already answered this question in previous statements to the world press. We have relations with all the revolutionary groups struggling to wrest the rights of their people from the imperialists, directly or indirectly.

AL-HAWADITH: Do members of these organizations receive training in your camps, for example?

Hagopian: No, they do not need to train in our camps. They have all they need. We also do not need them. We have everything we need. Our relations with them are equal and revolutionary. We learn from their experience and they learn from ours.

AL-HAWADITH: Where do you get your training?

Hagopian: We receive our training in our limited camps and centers. You should believe us when we say this, because we only need to train in pistol shooting, the use of handgrenades and planting explosives. We do not participate in street or mountain fighting.

AL-HAWADITH: What links are there between you and the PLO?

Hagopian: We have good relations with the PLO because it represents the Palestinian people.

AL-HAWADITH: What is the connection between you and the Armenian Church?

Hagopian: We are proud of the Armenian Church. The church is also proud of our struggle. You cannot draw a line between the church and revolutionary struggle. The church people do their duty of looking after the holy places and churches in exile and we work for the recovery of our territory and for repatriation. We complement one another. So we are not communists.

AL-HAWADITH: Are there any non-Armenian members of your organization?

Hagopian: (No reply)

AL-HAWADITH: To what extent do you represent the Armenians?

Hagopian: You can get an idea by assessing the support the Armenian army receives as a military force from all Armenian circles.

DETAILS OF EVREN VISIT TO BULGARIA RELEASED

TA191627 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Head of state Gen Kenan Evren will begin his official 4-day visit to Bulgaria on 24 February. According to the Foreign Ministry, relations between the two countries and international issues will be discussed during the talks to be held between General Evren and Bulgarian State Council Chairman Todor Zhivkov. The two leaders will also discuss the issue of increasing trade and economic relations between the two countries.

General Evren, who will be the official guest of Todor Zhivkov will visit installations in Sofia, Varna and the surrounding areas. General Evren and his delegation will return to Turkey on 27 February.

PARTY MEMBERS MAY COMMENT ON DRAFT CONSTITUTION

TA131035 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 13 Feb 82

[Text] The National Security Council has announced that all members of political parties that existed on 11 September 1980, with the exception of the leaders, deputy or acting leaders, secretaries general, deputy secretaries general and general administration council members of these parties, will be able to express their views on the new constitution. Party members will be able to express their personal views on the new constitution, without making any reference to any political party, if requested -- in written form or orally -- by the Consultative Assembly Constitution Committee.

National Security Council decision No 65 on regulations regarding the expression of views on the new constitution by political party members and establishments was issued today. It was announced that the decision was made with the aim of enabling those belonging to a political party prior to 12 September and establishments and associations whose activities have been interdicted to contribute to the activities directed toward preparing the new constitution.

According to the decision, all members of political parties that existed on 11 September 1980 and that were abolished in accordance with Law No 2553 -- with the exception of those holding the titles of leader, deputy or acting leader, secretary general, deputy secretary general and general administrative member -- will be able to express their personal views on the new constitution if requested by the chairman of the Constitution Committee. While expressing their views, the party members will not refer to any political party. With the permission of martial law commands, personal views, without any reference to any political party, may be expressed on the new constitution at academic and scientific meetings on the issue to be organized by institutions of higher learning, professional associations and establishments. According to the decision, associations and establishments directly connected with the constitutional issue will be able to express their views on the new constitution if so desired the chairman of the Consultative Assembly Constitution Committee.

According to the regulations in effect, associations, legal entities and societies banned from engaging in political activities will in no way be able to express views or to issue statements on the new constitution. Legal action will be taken against those who do not abide by this ban in accordance with Article 16 of Martial Law No 1403. However, members of these associations and societies will be able to express their personal views. The National Security Council states that all provisions of Council Decision No 52 in connection with the ban on political activities are still in effect with the exception of the previously mentioned exceptions.

MALTA

OPPOSITION PARTY BOYCOTTS PARLIAMENT OPENING

NC161107 Paris AFP in English 1057 GMT 16 Feb 82

[Text] Valetta, 16 Feb (AFP) -- The opposition Nationalist Party boycotted the opening of the Maltese parliament here today in a protest against election results which gave it most votes but fewer seats than the ruling Labour Party. The party could not accept that Dom Mintoff's Labour Party picked up 34 seats with 49 per cent of the vote in the mid-December elections, while its conservative opposition won three fewer seats in the 65-seat house with 51 per cent, a party spokesman said. Nationalist Party members who boycotted today's opening ceremonies added that they would not participate in the work of parliament. "The situation on the island is very tense," one MP commented. "Dom Mintoff's government rigged the elections. It is an illegal government."

In a declaration yesterday, Nationalist Party members said they will not attend parliament until the electoral system is reformed and early elections agreed. Opening parliament today, Acting President Albert Hyzler said Malta was ready to strengthen its relationship with the European Economic Community (EEC) and conclude a new association agreement and financial protocol. But, he added that the Labour government believed it was not in Malta's interest to become a full member until the EEC declared itself neutral vis-a-vis the two superpowers. The government of Prime Minister Mintoff is committed to keeping Malta neutral and non-aligned.

AGATHA BARBARA ELECTED PRESIDENT OF MALTA

NC181911 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 18 Feb 82 p 3

[Text] Valletta, 17 Feb -- Agatha Barbara, 59, a former teacher, was elected president of Malta, the first woman to hold the office. The president, whose functions are ceremonial, is elected for a five-year term by the House of Representatives. The opposition Nationalist Party, which is boycotting parliamentary sittings, did not participate in the presidential election. The Nationalists' leader, Dr Edward Fenech Adami, yesterday described Prime Minister Dom Mintoff's government as illegitimate. The Nationalists have accused the ruling Malta Labour Party of rigging constituency boundaries for elections last December. In the elections, held under proportional representation, the Labour Party won 34 seats against 31 for the Nationalists, although the latter pulls 4,000 more votes.

Miss Barbara was the first woman elected to the Maltese parliament, winning a seat in 1947. Eight years later she was appointed minister of education in the first government led by Mr Mintoff.

PETROLEUM SALES DOWN, USE OF GASOLINE UP

DW151024 Zurich NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG in German 13 Feb 82 p 15

[Article signed MITG.: "Decrease in Petroleum Sales in Switzerland"]

[Excerpt] According to data supplied by the Petroleum Association, the wholesale sales of the most important petroleum products totaled 10.94 million tons in Switzerland in 1981, which amounts to a 7.8-percent decrease compared with the preceding year. While the sale of gasoline and diesel fuels showed an increase by 1.6 percent, the petroleum showed a clear decrease by 13.1 percent. The proportion of the gasoline and diesel fuels in the total sales increased to 39.6 percent (35.9 percent in the preceding year). That of petroleum dropped to 60.4 percent (64.1 percent). Thus, a development has continued whose tendency has been lasting for several years now.

AUSTRIAN, YUGOSLAVIAN MINISTERS DISCUSS CSCE

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "Gud"]

[Text] Vienna -- Yugoslavian Foreign Minister Petar Vrhovec paid a several-hour lightning visit to Vienna on Monday to discuss with his Austrian counterpart Pahr the current situation of the Madrid CSCE follow-up meeting. Vrhovec returned to Belgrade on Monday afternoon.

The two ministers agreed to keep silent on the results of their talk, since they first want to notify other neutral and nonaligned states and coordinate a joint policy. As has been reported, Foreign Minister Pahr still hopes to bring the Madrid CSCE meeting to a successful conclusion before the conference premises will be needed for other purposes at Easter. Otherwise, the conference would have to be adjourned until the fall.

Pahr Expects Adjournment

[Andreas Unterberger report on interview with Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr -- date and place not specified]

[Excerpts] Vienna -- Foreign Minister Pahr expects that the CSCE talks in Madrid will have to be adjourned until September or October. While for the time being he will continue his endeavors to bring about a substantial conclusion of the talks, he knows "that the chances are not very great." The foreign minister believes that without the Polish events of last December, a successful conclusion of the Madrid meeting could have been achieved at that time.

Austria's aim for the CSCE continues to be a document "that is approximately in line with the neutral and nonaligned states' draft which they presented in December." Should the adoption of such a document not be possible, an adjournment "would then perhaps even be the best solution," Pahr believes. Only last week the minister helped overcome a formal controversy when the Soviet Union initally insisted that, on the strength of an old agreement, negotiations should be limited to 2 days a week and to mornings until 1330 hours. Compliance with this schedule threatened to deprive the Western ministers who had come to the conference of their right to address the meeting, until the Soviets at last gave in. According to Pahr's assessment, the Soviets are now also taking a "slightly more positive" view of the neutrals' draft than they did only a few weeks ago.

Regarding another continuing topic of Austrian foreign policy, South Tirol, the Foreign Ministry is currently preparing new steps. Following talks among experts and political coordination with Innsbruck and Bolzano [North and South Tirol], it is planned to ask Rome, first in a note and then probably in personal talks, to instruct its representatives on the 6-member commission and the 12-member commission "to promote settlements which are in line with out views."

Austria's relations with the United States are assessed by Pahr as continuing to be very good. "Naturally, we see perhaps some things in a different light, because from the Danube the world does not look the same as it does when viewed from the Mississippi, as far as East-West relations and detente are concerned."

The minister describes America's attitude regarding the refugee policy as understanding from the very beginning. Now it has become even more generous, as a result of intensive efforts, he says.

Commenting on the Israeli attacks following the latest Austrian abstentions at the UN General Assembly in an anti-Israeli vote, the minister declared: "It is an essential characteristic of our foreign policy that we are not ready to accept forcible annexations of territories. On the other hand, we are without exception for the principle of universality in the United Nations and against generalizing sanctions."

In this context, Pahr also pointed out that Austria is one of the few countries which abstained from voting on the accreditation of the Kampuchean UN representative. Austria, he said, is neither inclined to vote for the Heng Samrin government which was installed by a military intervention, nor for the Pol Pot regime which "is a criminal government that has committed genocide against its own people."

ILO CHIEF INTERVIEWED ON POLISH REPRESSION

PM221517 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Feb 82 p

[Text] ILO Director General Francis Blanchard announced Tuesday, 16 February, in Paris that a Polish Government delegation is to visi Geneva -- seat of the ILO -- soon to answer the complaints made by the Internationa Trade Union Federations, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions an the CMT concerning the arrests of Solidarity Trade Unionists since 13 December.

Addressing the French Diplomatic Press Association, Mr Blanchard condemned the failure to respect trade union freedoms in many other countries, both in the East bloc and in the West. Poland has refused to receive an ILO fact-finding mission, which Mr Blanchard was intending to head himself, but the sending of a Polish special delegation demonstrates "at least that that government does not object to dialogue." The ILO director general does not rule out "contacts subsequently being established on the spot in Poland" so that, among other things, the "total legal vacuum" existing in that country regarding trade union legislation can be filled. He believes that the ILO's Trade Union Freedoms Committee, which is in charge of the Polish file, "will assess very stringently" the explanations which the delegation is likely to give.

In Mr Blanchard's opinion, the situation in Romania is different. He pointed out that the ILO -- so far in vain -- has asked that country's government to amend its legislation, which is "contrary to the international conventions," and stated that he has "no information" concerning the fate of dissident trade unionist Vasil Parasciv.

Mr Blanchard also pointed out that only half of the 146 International Labor Organization member-states respect trade union rights. He spoke of the "dramatic situation" of workers in Argentina and Chile, as well as the violation of their rights in certain Asian and African countries, including Ethiopia.

Referring to the arrests and convictions of trade unionists in Turkey, Mr Blanchard stated that that country's government "is evading" dialogue with the ILO.

Summarizing the results achieved in the defense of human rights -- the "cornerstone" of the ILO's activity -- Mr Blanchard stated that about 1,000 people have been released from imprisonment over the years thanks to the international body's intervention. Asked about employment, Mr Blanchard estimated the number of unemployed and underemployed in the Third World alone at 500 million.

POLES DELIVER COAL ON SCHEDULE, OFFER SURPLUS

AU221451 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1119 GMT 22 Feb 82

[Michael Kerbler report on Vienna talks by a Polish trade delegation headed by Foreign Trade Minister Tadeusz Nestorowicz]

[Summary] Since 7 January Polish coal deliveries to Austria have arrived on schedule, and the Polish delegation also indicated during last week's Vienna talks that it has enough coal at its disposal to make up for last year's coal delivery arrears. Indeed, in the talks with Austrian officials the Polish side offered up to 600,000 tons of bituminous coal, coke and coke screenings. That means that at present Austria has more coal at its disposal than it needs and can use. In view of the situation in Poland, political observers had not expected that country to be able to completely fulfill its delivery commitments, and coal buyers of Austrian firms and power plants went to the FRG, France and to the United States to conclude short-term and medium-term contracts on substitute coal deliveries at rather high prices. Polish coal of satisfactory quality is 20-25 percent cheaper than comparable Western coal, and moreover, it can be shipped at specially reduced rates via the CSSR to Austria over a relatively short distance.

Now the Austrian side is confronted with the fact that the Poles will not only supply the scheduled quotas but, in addition, are offering large quantities of additional coal. "This development is mainly due to the fact that the coal mines are now able and permitted to directly sell certain quantities of coal and coke to foreign buyers, primarily because the Polish mines urgently need spare parts for mining equipment that is now constantly in operation at the mines."

At today's press conference by Trade Minister Staribacher, it was stated that the Polish-Austrian company which imports coal from Poland as well as from other countries -- the so-called Polkarbon -- will try to withdraw from some of the coal contracts with other Western industrialized countries or to alter them, so as to be able to order more cheap Polish coal again. For 1982, contracts with Poland have already been concluded providing for the importation of about 890,000 tons of coal, including 100,000 tons of industrial coke, 260,000 tons of coal for private households, and 300,000 tons of metallurgical bituminous coal.

Minister Staribacher described the overall coal supply situation as very good. The power plants alone have stockpiled over 1.9 million tons of coal. Nevertheless, Staribacher will try to encourage the voluntary compiling of emergency coal stores. However, Staribacher does not regard it as expedient for Austria to simply buy and store the additional Polish coal that has now been offered, since storage costs and loss of capital interest would result in a 25 percent drop in value per year. Staribacher also pointed out that the Italian Government intends to develop Trieste into a coal port, and that numerous African developing countries have already approached Austria with offers to supply Austria with high-grade coal via this route.

BRIEFS

HUNGARY BORDER CROSSING -- A new border crossing at the Austro-Hungarian border near Hegyeshalom is nearing its completion. Even though the crossing point will be opened for traffic as early as this spring, the present crossing point will continue to be used. Automobile and bus traffic will be handled by the new crossing point whereas trucks will be processed at the old one. The new border crossing will have special lanes for Austrians who need no visas and for Yugoslav guestworkers over the weekend. [Text] [Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 19 Feb 82 p 2 AU]

SANCTIONS AGAINST POLAND, USSR ANNOUNCED

NC222026 Paris AFP in English 2019 GMT 22 Feb 82

[Text] Brussels, 22 Feb (AFP) -- Belgium is planning steps aimed at ending martial law in Poland, the Foreign Ministry announced here today. The announcement said the measures, directed against both Warsaw and Moscow, would be in consultation with Poland's creditor-nations and Belgium's partners in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO) and European Economic Community (EEC).

"By these measures," the announcement said, "Belgium aims at obtaining the lifting of martial law, the freeing of detainees, and the resumption of dialogue between the authorities, the church, and the Solidarity movement."

One move will be to suspend visits between Brussels and Warsaw, and Brussels and Moscow, at both ministerial and top-official level. Requests for residence permits for Soviet and Polish diplomatic staff in Belgium will be subjected to restrictive examination.

Belgium will also support any international action to make Poland respect its pledged commitments over human rights and trade union freedom.

On the economic level, negotiations for rescheduling Polish debts falling due in 1982 have been suspended and the meeting of the joint Belgian-Polish commission, set for this month, has been put off to a later date.

Finally, the announcement said, the application of scientific and technical agreements with Poland will be suspended, and Belgium will no longer be associated with major official cultural manifestations.

However, the announcement said, humanitarian aid distributed by non-government organisations to the Polish People will be continued, and visas granted to Polish nationals in Belgium will be extended.

Meanwhile, EEC foreign ministers were today continuing their discussions here on Poland and steps taken with regard to Poland by some EEC countries.

LOWER HOUSE WANTS UN FORCE IN EL SALVADOR

PM221405 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 17 Feb 82 p 3

[ANP report: "Chamber Wants United Nations Peacekeeping Force for El Salvador"]

[Excerpt] The Hague, 17 Feb -- The Second Chamber wants the Netherlands Government to exert pressure on the United States and the European Community for the possible deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping force in El Salvador to put an end to the violence in the country. In addition, the government should place the violation of human rights in El Salvador on the agenda of the UN Human Rights Commission. Yesterday the chamber adopted a motion proposed by Labor Party member Ter Beek advocating this action. Only the Reformed Political Union and the Political Reformed Party voted against the motion.

MITTERRAND INTERVIEWED ON EL SALVADOR, EUROPE

AU201558 Rome ANSA in English 1550 GMT 20 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 20 Feb (ANSA) -- French President Francois Mitterrand described the Reagan administration's view of Central and Southern America as "short-sighted" in an interview published by most Italian newspapers today.

The interview was granted to Italian reporters in Paris in view of the socialist head-of-state's visit to Italy on February 26 and 27, immediately after his Paris summit with West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on February 25.

Citing the Franco-Mexican joint statement on El Salvador published last August, Mitterrand warned that to see the anti-government movement there as "the simple fruit of communist propaganda is short-sighted."

"If the West rejects it (the movement), it will seek arms where it can, that is, in the East," he said. "In El Salvador, what is at stake is winning back genuine national independence and the struggle against a crushing oligarchy.

"If France's voice is not listened to, the peoples will not be able to resolve their problems alone -- neither in Latin America, nor in the Middle East, nor even in Southern Africa."

As for Europe, the Milan daily, CORRIERE DELLA SERA quoted Mitterrand as saying that the countries which want to must work out a policy for limiting high interest rates in order to avoid catastrophic consequences for their development and unemployment rates.

According to Mitterrand, the EEC should work out a joint mechanism for bringing down interest rates, preferably by controlling the movements of floating capital which unleash the periodical monetary storms.

In other points, Mitterrand denied there was a crisis in relations between Paris and Bonn, an axis on which he laid great faith when he was elected as Valery Giscard d'Estaing's successor last year. He also said he did not believe in a neutralist Germany, adding that he does not share his Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy's suspicions of West German desires for reunification.

According to the Rome daily, LA REPUBBLICA, his visit to Italy will serve to offset the privileged axis linking Bonn and Paris, preventing Rome from being left on the sidelines.

For this purpose, Mitterrand is bringing an entourage that will include five ministers, among them Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson, Economics Minister Jacques Delors, and Agricultural Minister Edith Cresson.

SOUTH KOREAN FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS

NC212156 Paris AFP in English 2135 GMT 21 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 21 Feb (AFP) -- South Korean Foreign Minister No Sin-yong arrived here today for an official two-day visit, the first by a Seoul diplomatic chief since the establishment of diplomatic relations between France and South Korea in February 1949.

During his stay, Mr No is to meet President Francois Mitterrand, External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson (with whom he met last September at the United Nations), Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert and French business leaders.

Sources here said the talks would include the issue of Korean reunification, bilateral trade and human rights topics, specifically the case of imprisoned South Korean dissident Kim Tae-Chung.

France, which has contracts with South Korea for the construction of nuclear reactors and the sale of seven airbus jets, will be negotiating to provide an ultra-rapid "bullet train," as well as possible contracts for television satellites, natural gas stocking facilities and an underground metro system.

Mr No, who made a state visit to India en route to Paris, will be continuing on to Nigeria after his stay in France.

HERNU OUTLINES TECHNOLOGY EXPORT PROCEDURES

PM171139 Paris LE MONDE in French 13 Feb 82 p 17

[Maurice Delarue report: "France Has Created Its Own Procedure for Exports of 'Sensitive' Goods to the East"]

[Text] The government is establishing an entirely French procedure for controlling exchanges of technology which could have military repercussions, particularly with regard to Eastern countries. This was announced by Defense Minister Charles Hernu on Thursday 11 February to the diplomatic press in Paris. A commission under the prime minister consisting of the external relations and defense ministers and the secretary general for national defense will be assigned the task of "protecting sensitive French technologies." This procedure, Mr Hernu stressed, should not be confused with COCOM (Western commission which monitors the export of sensitive goods to the East), to which France still belongs.

Questioned on the sale of arms abroad, Mr Hernu stated that the government's policy was guided by three ideas: "respect for a promise given" (that is, the fulfillment of signed contracts); "the technical and financial impact" of these sales on national defense and the national economy; and the "reorientation" of French foreign policy. "We must be able to help our friends to build their own defense systems," Mr Hernu said, "and enable them to emerge from alignment with the United States or the Soviet Union." "In contrast to the previous government," the minister added, "we know to whom we are selling, and we are not ashamed to say so. The nations which we help do, perhaps, choose us, but in any case we choose them freely." There could be no question of selling arms to "dictatorships which repress popular forces."

As an example of this "gradual, slow reorientation," the minister cited arms sales to Nicaragua, of which he has informed the Americans on his own initiative and to which the Americans, he believes, attach no great importance. The sales to Nicaragua, he specified, consist of 45 trucks, 2 helicopters, 2 patrol boats, 7,000 air-to-surface missiles and 100 missile launchers "which cannot be fitted to Soviet aircraft."

"The reorientation of our arms sales policy is an act of assistance and friendship on our part with regard to countries likely gradually to effect a repprochement with France," the defense minister continued, pointing out that 7,000 trainee officers and technicians were undergoing instruction in France.

Questioned about European cooperation with regard to defense recommended by Giscard d'Estaing, Mr Hernu stated that the former president of the republic "has not changed, has understood nothing and lies like a tree pointing in the direction in which he has fallen." European military cooperation, "if it is a foreseeable long-term objective," Mr Hernu said, cannot exist for lack of a European political authority capable of "making a decision in 17 minutes". (The 17 minutes mentioned by Mr Hernu are the approximate time taken by a missile to travel from France to the Soviet Union.)

The minister sees in Mr Giscard d'Estaing's statement an "implicit" confirmation of the fact that, while the previous government readily advocated independent defense, "He did incline slightly toward NATO, without saying so." We are the only European country, with Britain to a small extent," he said, "to have a real, effective and credible deterrent. When the president of the republic travels abroad, this deterrent lends great weight to what he says."

Mr Hernu stressed that this deterrent comes within the "national province," that it cannot be transferred to any other country, and that the decision to use it lies with the head of state alone. "That does not mean to say," he added, "that it is only France which has to be defended, but that we do not want to be drawn into a conflict in which France has decided to take no part." Referring to Soviet intentions for including the French force in SALT III negotiations with the Americans, Mr Hernu stated that "the French megatons" could not be added to others and included in any sort of negotiations between the superpowers.

The minister also noted that French involvement in the multinational Sinai Force would be limited to approximately 80 servicemen, including "a large proportion of women" belonging either to the Health Corps or to Air Support (of which Britain would be in command) or to an amalgam of these three [as published] elements. He also confirmed that discussions were underway to build up the UN forces in Lebanon, including an increase in the French contingent (at present 600 men).

MIRAGE-2000 DEAL WITH INDIA TO BE SIGNED SOON

NC181424 Paris AFP in English 1405 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 18 Feb (AFP) -- The first commercial contracts for France's agreed sale to India of 150 Mirage-2000 fighters might be signed as early as the end of the month, a well-informed source said here today.

The first firm contracts would thus be signed a month after the two governments signed a protocol agreeing to the sales during a visit to New Delhi from January 21 to 24 by Jean Martre, the French Defence Ministry official in charge of arms matters.

The contracts will be drawn up between the Indian Hindustan Aeronautics Limited, of Bangalore, and the French constructors of the ultra-sophisticated fighters: Marcel Dassault Aeroplanes for the structure, Snecma for the engines and Thomson-CSF for the electornics.

The source said that negotiations were proceeding as planned, and that if all goes smoothly the contracts would be signed in the coming weeks, possibly by the end of this month. The first planes -- 40 to 45 -- are to be delivered starting in 1984 ready to fly, another group is to be assembled in Bangalore with parts manufactured in India and France, while a final batch, probably 60, is to be built in India under licence.

Exact delivery dates or the duration of each phase of the contract have not been announced. Neither has the total value of the deal. The only available figure is the price of an unarmed Mirage-2000, at around 90 million francs (15 million dollars).

The first 40-45 planes were expected to be delivered starting in 1984 in order to offset Pakistan's order last year of 40 U.S.-built F-16 fighters with a value of 1,100 million dollars.

The Mirage-2000's ordered by India will be fitted with a more powerful reactor than similar planes on order to the French Air Force for 1983. The Indian fighters will be fitted with the M.53-P2 type engine, with a thrust of 10,000 kilos. No details have been released on the type of radar equipment ordered by India, or what armaments the planes will carry.

PCI'S MINUCCI DEFENDS 'THIRD PHASE' THEORY

PM191631 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 14 Feb 82 pp 1, 16

[PCI Secretariat Member Adalberto Minucci article: "Let Us Look at the Facts and Reread Marx Properly"]

[Text] The very significant theory put forward by our Central Committee that a particular phase in the development of socialism (the one begun by the October Revolution and characterized by the centrality of the Soviet "model" and by its mechanical application in quite different countries) has exhausted its thrust is prompting a very broad debate. This is entirely understandable and legitimate. But some people are trying to insert into this debate an agitation based on ulterior motives designed to portray our theories in a false and distorted manner. How? Basically by trying to make people believe we want to challenge the great historical value of the October Revolution and of the ideas that it spread throughout the world; and that we intend to confront Italian Communists with the discouraging need to start from scratch again now that they have behind and around them nothing but failures, ruins and a scorched earth.

The issue therefore deserves to be tackled directly and with the utmost frankness. It does not stem, as some believe, from a moral assessment, still less a moralistic one, of the history of "real socialism"; nor can it be entirely attributed (though the connection is evident) to the reservations, criticisms or condemnations that we have expressed from time to time over the past decades regarding admittedly serious aspects of this history. It is in fact the result of an objective and scientific (I would venture to say materialist) analysis of history and of the real processes at present underway. And we are convinced that if this same field of analysis were now adopted -- with the courage required by all innovations -- by all the forces wanting the development of socialism, the entire revolutionary movement would take a step forward and put itself in a position to take up the chellenge presented to it by the world crisis and by the ways in which that is affecting "real socialism" itself.

Of course our opinion can be discussed and challenged. But I do not consider it excessive for us to demand observance of two fundamental conditions for a responsible discussion: 1) that the point of departure be the facts, the specific and indelible reality of the events and situations on which the PCI bases its opinion; and 2) that an objective attitude be adopted toward the political and strategic pointer that the Italian Communists draw from their analysis of the actual facts -- a pointer entirely opposed to the much feared "concessions" or "compromises," inasmuch as it aims to open up a new and more advanced phase in the struggle for socialism, to set free a development now hindered not only by the class enemies but also by increasingly acute internal contradictions and crises.

The refusal of some of our opponents to analyze the facts is paradoxical. For instance the Polish crisis, its causes and its tragic military outcome are literally eliminated from their reckoning. At best, in some cases we are enjoined to accept unquestioningly the Polish leaders' stances and to turn to them for all information. But which leaders: The ones who governed until recently or the ones governing now? In which case why not turn to the Polish Army?

It is no coincidence that the most radical objection to our analysis has come in the past few days from Franco Rodano, whose rigorously deductive logic makes any reference to reality (not even of the present, but of this century) purely accidental. He proceeds from an act of faith whereby it is unthinkable that a particular phase of history can "exhaust itself." The first deduction is that by talking in terms of exhaustion one creates an "unpleasant situation" with the Soviet Union and the other Eastern bloc countries, which allegedly feel excluded from "the task of progressive socialist building worldwide" and allegedly have to acknowledge "their essential irrelevance in the balances and developments of contemporary history." The second deduction leads to an indictment as Quixotism of the "third phase," in which Western communists allegedly "alone represent socialism." Last, the third deduction dismisses us as irredeemably subordinate to the hegemony of the social democrats, compared to whom we are allegedly "in a position of clear inferiority" in the places where capitalism has reached its peak.

This concept of history and of socialism itself is radically different not only from that of the Italian Communists but also from that of Marx and Lenin. For them, the transformation of society is a "lengthy" (Gramsci would say "very lengthy") historical process composed of several contrasting phases of advance and stasis, of crises and even regressions. "Proletarian revolution," Marx wrote in that masterpiece of historical analysis "The 18th Brumaire," "continuously criticize themselves and are continually interrupting their own course: they return to what seemed complete to start again from scratch: they deride themsleves pitilessly...for the weaknesses and wretchedness of their first attempts." Antonio Labriola, as if commenting on this, observes that understanding and analyzing crises, reactions and regressions "is like continuing the work of the revolution."

Why on earth, then, is it "sacrilege" (and even disagreeable and offensive) to talk in terms of the exhaustion of a particular phase in this extraordinary and turbulent historical process whose imagination fortunately transcends any kind of deductive logic? When we observe the phenomena of rigidity, paralysis and sometimes outright regression in certain situations in the countries of "existing socialism" and in relations among them, we are not in the least denying the decisive role of the October revolution in the "lengthy" and diversified historical process of the transformation of human societies or the part of its lesson that remains alive in us and in every fiber of the contemporary world. Still less do we underestimate -- indeed, could anybody? --the "substantial importance" of the Soviet Union "in the balances and developments of contemporary history," starting with the influence it exerts in international relations and in the affairs on which the very future of peace depends.

But the first and most serious sign of an "impasse," of an erosion of the potential for expansion, lies in the fact -- very easy to document -- that the Soviet Union's policy is now increasingly guided and sometimes dictated by "bloc logic" within a rigidly bipolar view of the evoution of the world. If, as is claimed, this enables it to respond to the imperialist bloc's pressure on the entire world chessboard, such a "response" nevertheless tends to be expressed basically in the field of military might, of power politics, which itself poses a very acute contradiction not only with the fundamental values of socialism, but also with the most immediate requirements of growth, innovation and autonomy of contemporary peoples and societies. This at a time when, as the facts demonstrate, the possibility is declining of a real hegemony of socialism in the economic, political and ideological fields, the challenge of the world crisis remains unanswered and scope is left for capitalism to use it to its own ends.

The "bloc spirit" has a mutual relationship of cause and effect with the bureaucratic rigidity, increasing in some respects, of the model of society and organization of power. There are clear signs here too of a deterioration, shown by the difficulties of economic planning and in the tendencies to depoliticization, especially among young people. And how can one fail to see that where there is an acute crisis in the model (as in Czechoslovakia, Afghanistan or Poland) zones of "insecurity," certainly not of "security," are being created -- with widespread phenomena of anti-Sovietism -- right on the USSR's borders, with the continuous recurrence of international tensions that are obviously being exploited by the imperialist bloc?

Last, the "impasse" is reflected in the workers movement in the capitalist countries themselves, especially in the communist parties, which, precisely where they persist in identifying their own prospects with the Soviet Union's model and dominant role, tend to lose any real relations with their own peoples and to degrade themselves to mere assenters. Rodano does not like social democratic hegemony and neither do we; but it is a fact that it occurs and spreads without encountering any obstacles in the very countries where there is no Marxist-inspired force capable of projecting socialism beyong the historical limits of "real socialism."

This analysis, which, we insist, is confirmed by the most significant events of our era, does not in the least rule out a priori the participation of the countries and forces headed by the Soviet Union in a new phase of "socialist building worldwide," as Rodano fears. Of course, it does presuppose too that there be change, regeneration and reform. And if it is true that the recurrence of crises and solutions such as the one in Poland seem to cast a shadow of pessimism over the hypothesis of the so-called "reformability" of those systems, this does not contradict, but confirms the substance of our strategy. This strategy gives priority to surmounting the bloc logic, to disarmament and therefore to the progressive loosening of the economic, political and ideological ties that the arms race and the "bloc mentality" brings to bear on the Wastern bloc countries and the rigidity of their systems.

But this presupposes a Western working class that is anything but isolated or self-sufficient. The struggle for detente and for a new order of international relations based on cooperation also demands and facilitates the involvement of vast forces -- at present potentially excluded -- which do not identify with the bloc policy and which want to eliminate bipolar rule. The linchpin of the world situation cannot remain East-West relations; it must also embrace and resolve North-South relations. By aiming at the Western workers movement's alliance with the nonaligned countries and with the vast liberation forces, we are in fact helping, as far as we can, to extend, not to restrict, the struggle front.

At the same time our initiative aims to impinge on the reality of the European socialist and social democratic movement. Its internal differences and crises, which are increasingly marked by the emergence of new leftward thrusts, are bound to be exacerbated by the erosion of the "welfare state," the disappearance of the old scope for reformism and the pressing need for reforms that will tackle the fundamental machinery of accumulation. It is significant that socialist leaders such as France's Jospin and Greece's Papandreou have issued an implicit acknowledgement of the value of the Italian Communists' deliberations inasmuch as they embody not only a rejection of the Soviet model but also a "rupture" with and transcending of the capitalist model. And it is no less significant that even at the recent PCF congress several representatives of newly independent countries and of Third World liberation movements showed curiosity, interest and in may cases support for our party's stances.

This all confirms the need for an open and frank debate, for a free circulation of ideas and experiences, involving the entire broad and diversified combination of forces moving toward progress and socialism. From this viewpoint one cannot fail to be struck by the fact that the Soviet comrades continue imperturbably to refuse to publish any of the PCI's stances in their newspapers. Comrade Zagladin maintains that CPSU members have in fact been kept in touch with the contrasting theses. Failing any subsequent explanations, I fear he is referring to the well-known "briefings" held over the past few weeks in Soviet local party organizations in which an official speaker is instructed to repeat (apparently often harshening their tone) PRAVDA's charges against the PCI, without any chance of hearing our real stances. Can socialism be based on fear of ideas?

PCI WANTS EQUAL, OBJECTIVE TALKS WITH CPSU

PM191123 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 14 Feb 82 pp 1, 16

[Commentary: "This Is No Dialogue"]

[Text] In PRAVDA's reply one is struck first by an extraordinary rhetorical trick whereby the CPSU daily restores a few elements of truth regarding our stances and opinions. After accusing the PCI on 22 January of being against the interests of peace and socialism, it now acknowledges our condemnation of U.S. aggressive actions, the fact that we talk respectfully and responsibly about Lenin, that we criticize capitalism, and so forth. However, the PCI and its leaders have allegedly been "forced" into this after the PRAVDA and KOMMUNIST articles. PRAVDA also notes that "at last the Italian comrades have begun to talk about the mass antiwar movement."

Our readers and PCI members have all the information they need to judge for themselves: Our criticism of Reagan's policy, our commitment to peace and disarmament, are certainly not recent discoveries for us, in our documents or in our political struggle; and when did we ever talk about Lenin other than responsibly and respectfully? One is prompted to wonder what reasons could have led PRAVDA to resort to such a trick. The need to amend certain assertions that most blatantly conflicted with the real nature of the PCI's stances and action? The desire to show its readers the effectiveness of its previous attacks? We cannot answer with any certainty.

What is certain is that all commentators and observers with a modicum of objectivity and responsibility have noted in our replies to PRAVDA and KOMMUNIST an absolute consistency with the stances adopted by the Directorate and Central Committee and with the arguments put forward to support them.

Moreover -- and this is the much more important point -- PRAVDA should not, and could not, use this tortuous trick if it had reported what we have been saying. Instead, 2 months after the introduction of martial law in Poland not a single line of our documents and articles has been published in the Soviet press. Soviet citizens know only the distortions that have been made of them, so that, having learned some weeks ago that the PCI was aligned with Reagan's stances, which "diverge" from those of the peace movements, they can now rejoice that the PCI is correcting and reappraising itself. In this way, however, all PRAVDA is doing is correcting its own distortions.

This is not merely a matter of method. Indeed, it also directly concerns the issue PRAVDA takes as its starting point -- whether our stance is a criticism or an attack and whether its own stance is an attack or a defense. But what else, if not an unacceptable attack, is the article now directed against us, with the persistent refusal to publish what we are really saying? Our readers are acquainted with PRAVDA's arguments, but Soviet readers do not know ours. Why are they not made known? If they are unacceptable attacks, response and condemnation will be all the more easy and convincing. Does PRAVDA regard as an attack the fact that we stress the need for reforms, for a regeneration of the Eastern bloc societies, which seems increasingly pressing but which in fact, we see with concern, is not being initiated? If so, it would be alarming. What we are doing is reasoning, trying to analyze new and often disconcerting events. Our opinions and analyses can be considered debatable, but for them to be properly discussed they must be understood and presented honestly. Quite clearly this point governs all the rest, because it enables PRAVDA to continue offering a glib version of our stances and thus to evade a real dialogue.

Let us take a brief look at what the dialogue should center on with regard to the two essential points, especially following this second article:

1. Poland: The picture painted by PRAVDA, which accuses us of "ideological sanctions," is, if possible, even more schematic than usual. Everything that has happened in Poland is attributable to "forces, which, together with imperialist reaction, intentionally misled part of the population, and so forth." We are allegedly guilty of having sided with these forces.

So in Poland all the blame lies with those who misled and who let themselves be misled -- not with the Polish United Workers Party or with the government. All the Polish leaders' self-criticism during the 18 months previous to 13 December no longer exists. Without taking these other responsibilities into account and without considering them decisive, how can one explain the fact that so many people, especially workers, were susceptible to the "deception," to use PRAVDA's term? The events in Poland demand a much greater effort of understanding if there is a real desire to understand why millions and millions of people -- workers -- adopted a stance of rejection with respect to that method of managing society and power.

And this effort of understanding must be made not only to analyze the past but also to build future prospects, which certainly cannot stem from the state of seige and the military regime. These are the harsh facts that must be faced up to. Talking about facts, PRAVDA refers us to Jaruzelski's speeches, or at least his speeches after 13 December, since in his previous ones there are many factors that conflict with the picture of Poland provided by the CPSU daily. But before Jaruzelski's speeches there were Kania's and before them Gierek's. The course of events shows incontrovertibly that what has happened in Poland cannot be appraised correctly within the guidelines provided at any one time by the speeches of the incumbent leader.

2. Peace: Having stated -- claiming all the merit for itself -- that "the PCI leaders are forced to say that they did not even consider denying the Soviet Union's role in the defense of peace," PRAVDA issues the same charge against us again. This is an extraordinary contradiction, but it is explained by the fact that we raised an entirely different issue, which PRAVDA evades entirely. We criticized, and still criticize, foreign policy decisions and actions of the USSR which reveal what we consider an erroneous interpretation of the role the USSR attributes to itself -- that is, a conception of the peace struggle which basically makes peace coincide with the strengthening of one of the blocs. We dealt fully with this subject in our reply to the KOMMUNIST article, which presented an outlook we consider mistaken -- the outlook whereby the future of peace is made to depend on what is defined as "the class struggle on the international scale" and which identifies this struggle with the balance of power between the blocs.

The PRAVDA article completely ignores what we have said in this regard and issues another charge against us: The Italian Communists' "politicomilitary backing" for the Chinese leaders, who are committeed to "an alliance with the United States, NATO and Japan on anti-Soviet bases," does not help detente. We do not know what PRAVDA means by "politicomilitary backing" and we consider its assessment of a foreign policy as complex as the PRC's extremely superficial and hasty. The PCI and CCP recently reestablished relations based on mutual respect, the quest for all possible forms of cooperation and the complete and honest acknowledgement of differing political stances, which would be the subject of free and open discussion between the two sides. This reference the PCI-CCP relations is in fact very significant for an understanding of the basic criterion adopted by PRAVDA in assessing contributions to the peace struggle: This criterion consists of complete and total identification with the USSR and with every act of its international activity. It is this very presumption that we consider mistaken. If this identification were taken as binding, what scope for initiative would be left to powerful peace forces such as the nonaligned movement, major European states and major people's movements characterized by strong autonomy and plurality of conduct? What would be the end product if everyone were forced within the framework of the "class struggle at the international level" and to choose only whether to side with one or other of the blocs, which are nowhere near representing the whole of the world today?

In the same way PRAVDA still refuses to consider the following very simple observation: The equation that the existence plus the power of the USSR equals the defense of peace, the peoples' emancipation and the progress of socialism, cannot be stated without proof, and the same applies to the claim that every Soviet action by definition is in the right direction. This formula must be submitted to a political test: The coincidence with objectives of peace, liberation and socialism cannot be stated a priori but must be proved by facts.

Apart from the positive evidence, it has happened on more than one occasion (Czechoslovakia, Afghanistan and Poland) that actions carried out with the claim of defending peace and strengthening socialism have been in entirely the opposite direction, in some cases exacerbating the international situation and hindering detente and in other cases weakening socialism's image and its force of attraction. We are not seeking an exacerbation of the polemic. What we want is an equal-based and objective discussion. Therefore there are two things we refuse to surrender: an analysis of the events and the free expression of our opinions. If there is a desire to discuss, then let both these things be discussed as they really are.

PARTY DIRECTORATE 'DEPLORES' COSSUTTA'S STANCE

[PCI Directorate 9 February statement]

[Text] The PCI has examined the debate on events in Poland, on their causes and the conclusions that should be drawn from them concerning the future of socialism. The debate is taking place in the freest and broadest possible forms, proving again the vitality and profoundly democratic character of our party, in which ideological efforts and the comparison of ideas nurture the awareness of shared aims. The basic objective of this is not only to analyze critically the vicissitudes of past full of gains and tragedies, which has brought about major transformations but which has also undergone, and is at present undergoing, retrograde processes, but also to help communists, workers, young people and intellectuals to realize, on the basis of the facts and the exhaustion of a historical phase, that the time has now come to begin a new and more advanced phase in the struggle for socialism in Italy and Europe. This will involve tackling unprecedented problems unresolved in the East or West, and critical threats to peace, to the peoples' freedom and to the advance of the workers movement -- threats exacerbated by the bloc logic. It involves dealing with the now evident inability of the ruling capitalist groups to provide positive answers to vital needs. Hence the pressing need to start right away a new and original process adapted to the present characteristics of European society, a socialist-oriented process, though it is inconceivable to implement Soviet-style models and impossible to repeat social democratic experiences, whose shortcomings are so evident as to prompt serious reappraisals among the very parties concerned.

This is our aim, the substance of our debate and our study. Therefore it would be entirely wrong and seriously damaging to crystallize stances. It would mean impeding and distorting our effort, preventing the party from performing its role and hindering the free contribution of all comrades and organizations to the development of our policy.

Partly on the basis of these considerations, the Directorate warns the party against the maneuvers that are emerging and that are sometimes encouraged and nurtured from outside -- maneuvers aimed at forming organized groups in opposition to the free debate taking place within the party.

The most responsible and strongest response to these maneuvers lies in the ability to conduct political dialogue and political struggle out in the open, with tolerance of everyone's ideas, and complete and rigorous observance of party rules, which protect everyone and which must apply to everyone. To break those rules would mean helping the party lose its autonomy and repeating the paralyzing experiences of certain socialist and social democratic parties; and it would also mean further hindering everyone's opportunity to express their own ideas and disagreements without the danger of them being manipulated.

The Directorate discussed Comrade Cossutta's stances and conduct in connection with the public meeting in Perugia. In his speech on that occasion Comrade Cossutta presented a distorted version of the leadership bodies' decisions and tried to dismiss as nonbinding ideological deliberations binding political decisions, such as those concerning the events in Poland, foreign policy, developments in the struggle for socialism and the nature of relations between the PCI and the other communist, workers, socialist and progressive parties. In this way he challenged the validity of those decisions, taken by a vast majority within the party leadership bodies, talking in terms of "fractionalism of the majority" and in effect urging comrades to ignore them. Among other things, this constituted a violation of an undertaking made to the Central Committee and Central Control Commission on 13 January to regard their decisions as valid for everyone.

The Directorate believes that such stances go beyond the expression of a legitimate disagreement and must therefore openly deplore them.

Cossutta 6 Feb Speech

PM171223 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 10 Feb 82 p 18

["Full text" of PCI Directorate Member Armando Cossutta 6 February speech in Perugia]

[Text] [L'UNITA introduction] We owe our readers an explanation of why we did not publish Comrade Cossutta's Perugia speech on Sunday and why we are doing so now, together with the Directorate document. As is apparent from the text of the speech, which Comrade Cossutta himself released, the speech contains stances of which L'UNITA gave a full account both by publishing an article in which Cossutta expressed his disagreement and in its report on the Central Committee debate. But apart from that, there is a final part containing assertions that challenge rules and forms of conduct that have hitherto guided and still guide the PCI's democratic life, and in particular the functioning of its leadership bodies, the responsibility of its members and the expression and organization of dissent.

It would have been possible to publish Cossutta's speech in two ways: Either without any comment, in which case (since the speech presents a line different from the one approved by the Central Committee, one Cossutta himself undertook to observe in a statement) we would have borne the responsibility of effectively ratifying a substantial innovation in the norms governing the party's life; or we could have expressed our critical appraisal regarding both substance and method; in which case we would have assumed a power that lies outside our province. In either case the party, the entire party, would have been entitled to reproach us. The problem that emerged with Comrade Cossutta's Perugia speech was purely political, and as such had to be examined first by the leadership bodies.

Realizing this, we decided to issue no censure but to await this examination, at least by the Directorate. Was it a mistake? It is a matter of opinion: Be that as it may, we wanted to avoid creating in one way or another a precedent that could in any way have hindered any decision in this regard. As for our undertaking to inform, which it is our resolute intention to honor, we honor it now that we can also supply the political verdict issued by the Directorate (which in this case we could not have taken on ourselves) so that everyone has all the information needed to form an appriasal and an opinion. [end L'UNITA introduction]

When polemics are needed, they must be conducted clearly and frankly, if necessary, they must be vigorous. But they must always be based on mutual respect.

We are dealing on the one hand, with the world's greatest communist party, the protagonist of a victorious revolution which not only permitted the building in an enormous country of the first socialist society but also established with it the presence in the world of a socialist "major power," which played a decisive role in the defeat of Nazi-fascism, the elimination of colonialism, the development of the liberation process and the emancipation of the peoples -- a "major power" that constitutes an irreplaceable counterweight to U.S. imperialist policy. On the other hand, we have the greatest communist party in the West, which became so through major -- and often heroic -- people's battles and struggles against fascism, for the defense and development of democracy, for Italy's social and civil progress, for the peoples' liberation, for detente, for disarmament and for peace.

If the theory that there is no socialism in the USSR really is unacceptable; if one cannot accept expressions that are themselves open to interpretation as summarily dismissive of the societies that stemmed from the October Revolution, of their capacity for progress and of their role in the revolutionary process, one can no more accept the assertion that our quest for the realization of socialism in the West by means of continuous struggle to develop democracy and to transcend capitalism constitutes an opportunist compromise or a deviation from our essential revolutionary objective. If it is unacceptable that, with regard to the formation and crystallization of the blocs and the present international crisis itself, the responsibilities of the United States and of the USSR be placed on the same level, it is equally unacceptable for our party to be accused of playing into imperialism's hands. If one cannot contemplate considering the USSR by the same yardstick as any Pietro Longo-style party, nor can the CPSU comtemplate dismissing the PCI's stances with the charge of seeking indlugence in the bourgeois world.

The truth is that for some time there has been a process of rupture between the parties, which has exacerbated. I still believe such a rupture would be disastrous. Criticism is useful. Rupture is damaging. Polemics can sometimes be helpful. A break can only cause harm. In its reply to PRAVDA L'UNITA does not withhold the acknowledgement that, thanks to the USSR's existence, imperialism "cannot do whatever it wants" in the world today. This is the basic point. As far as we are concerned it is of decisive importance not to blur the realization that, without this bastion, without this ultimate guarantee against the military and economic might of capitalism, there would be neither scope nor hope for the struggle either of the Third and Fourth World peoples or of the workers, people's and democratic movement in the West. From this fundamental acknowledgement one must also draw enlightenment for a specific and effective political commitment to surmounting the increasingly choking and stifling bloc logic -- a logic whose historical origins and highly topical origins lie precisely in the U.S. "unipolar" will on a world scale.

To acknowledge this fundamental and objective role of the USSR as a decisive factor of our analysis does not of course mean espousing all the USSR's decisions and stances. Indeed, for a long time we have regarded some of its decisions and actions as errors, sometimes serious ones. Nor does it mean abandoning the autonomy of our initiative and the diversity of our role, on both the national and international plane. One of our essential tasks is to achieve here the transcending of capitalism. To this we can only pursue hitherto unexplored paths, boldly and resolutely, with the conviction -- partly as a result of the teachings of Gramsci, Togliatti and Longo -- that the struggle for socialism is itself capable of prompting the energies, enthusiasm, innovative spirit and intelligence needed to advance and to win.

So much for the "old schemas" to which we are allegedly clinging, according to some anachronistic apologists of reformism. There is nothing older or more decrepit than capitalism, from which they do not even dare to think about emancipating themselves. And there is nothing more old or decrepit than anti-Sovietism, which is the principal mainstay of capitalism. Capitalism has succeeded in modernizing itself by intensified consumerism. So far the reformist forces have managed to attenuate its most glaring contradictions. But it remains the source of contradictions, imbalance, injustices, exploitation and underprivilege. It remains the cause of a general inhumanity in social and civil life, of the systematic alienation of people's spirit of solidarity with one another. For all these reasons it remains a powerful factor that encourages corruption and violence, because it remains based on and continues to subordinate the life of individuals and of society to the logic of private profit, yield and parasitism. So we want to pursue a path that will not only extend democracy but which will also really attack the problems of capitalism and extricate us from capitalism. We do not believe we can travel this path all at once and on our own. For, unlike extremists of all ages, we regard revolution not as an act but as a process, which also includes the admittedly necessary moments of "leaping" from the previous orders to new and qualitatively more advanced orders. We therefore believe that we can and must seek and find, within the very development of the process, convergence and cooperation, on an inalienable basis of equality, with other democratic and progressive forces, but with the capacity, which must always characterize us, to constantly assert the need not for the least possible change but for the maximum change objectively possible. In short, our policy is not and cannot be the social democratic one; either internally or internationally.

It is very significant that the party leadership has been able to conduct such an important debate, with respect for all stances, since the events in Poland. It must be possible to discuss divergences of analysis within and with the party, without splits. I have expressed my beliefs in the debate and through my vote. The stances I expressed are certainly not mine alone. A debate is taking place in all sections, and everyone must be guaranteed the opportunity to express and assert his own opinions. If a debate is starting within the party on the stances adopted by the leadership, it is inconceivable to reduce it to a mere "elucidation" campaign or to opinion polls that grant the choice of stating one's opinion only for or against something, not for anything else. This is the precondition not only for guaranteeing the comrades' real participation, in a party that is based on its masses and not on its apparatus in the formulation of policy, but also for preventing above all the alienation, detachment and disassociation of so many members. The principle that there must be no crystallization -- in other words, factionalism -- applies not only to minorities but also to majorities, since in both instances they must be determined in each individual case. The article in our rules that states that party membership is based on the acceptance of its program (but whoever is a Leninist cannot be prohibited from continuing to be one) must certainly not imply any decline in the pragmatism of our deliberations and of our debate, but it is equally certain that even in principle it rules out the possibility of imposing majority discipline in matters not strictly to do with the correct implementation of program and operational decisions.

The entire party -- the "collective intellect" -- must always maintain its internal dialectical freedom. Debates on theory, ideology and principle cannot be concluded with majority votes. It is even more necessary to exclude the imposition on everyone of the acceptance of formulas that are often vague and ambiguous and contain compromises and which can in any case always be revised and improved, and, on the contrary, to permit a substantial diversification of decisions and forms of conduct affecting policy and organizations. Furthermore, when the party is approaching a congress, not only must any differing stances be made clearly explicit but, in the event of differing analyses or theses within the Central Committee, each of them must be discussed by all party bodies, starting with cells and sections, since it is obvious that the assumption that only at the final conclusion will it be known which stances are of the majority and which of one or more minorities applies and must apply.

EVENTS OF 12 FEB GENERAL STRIKE STILL DISPUTED

LD200544 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2330 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] The 12 February general strike is still in the spotlight: Major Vasco Lourenco [acting spokesman for the Council of the Revolution] tonight reiterated that there were no reasons to characterize the situation as insurrectional or even subversive as the minister of internal administration did. Here is a report by Luis Carrido:

The spokesman for the Council of the Revolution had already said this on his way to the council meeting last Wednesday. On that occasion, he had also said that in his view the facts disclosed by Angelo Correia were much too insufficient to characterize the situation as the minister did. He had also said that not only was the Council of the Revolution not in possession of any further information about the matter, but that it would not be logical to think that the president of the republic should be in possession of such information, because if he had been he would have informed the Council of the Revolution.

Later, the Council of Ministers claimed that it had kept the president of the republic and the chief of the Armed Forces General Staff informed of the occurrences of the day in question.

Against this background, and in a statement released through the services of the Council of the Revolution tonight, Major Vasco Lourenco says that he never disputed the Council of Ministers claim, and that the stand adopted by the Council of Ministers only confirmed his own previous statements; that is, that there were no reasons to characterize the situation as insurrectional or even subversive. He adds that the information supplied to the president of the republic and the chief of the Armed Forces General Staff does not add anything to the facts that had already been made public and that they in themselves were not enough to characterize the situation in such terms. That was indeed the view expressed by both the president of the republic and the chief of the Armed Forces General Staff at the Council of the Revolution meeting, Major Vasco Lourenco says in the statement released tonight.

But the council spokesman goes even further: After stating that there was no justification for the spectacular police arrangements in force that day, Vasco Lourenco says that one could legitimately ask what aims the minister of internal administration was seeking to achieve when he addressed the Portuguese people the way he did, without any justifiable grounds. Words have specific meanings and the minister of internal administration, as the responsible figure that he ought to be, cannot ignore them.

As a final comment, the Council of the Revolution spokesman writes in his statement that proving that democracy can be defended by resorting to the security forces is not the way to consolidate the democratic state, particularly if the attempt to prove this is made through the manipulation and abuse of the main news media.

Vasco Lourenco further expresses his gratification at the extraordinary civic spirit displayed by the Portuguese people at large, who calmly refused to be dragged into the emotional climate to which they were insistently invited.

The prime minister's office immediately reacted to Major Vasco Lourenco's statement tonight, describing it as particularly grave and unacceptable. The secretary of state in the prime minister's office, Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa, begins by stating that yet another political oddity has cropped up in our country; namely, a quasi-communique from the Council of the Revolution which is not presented as such but rather as a statement by its spokesman.

Denying that the facts supplied to the president of the republic and the chief of the Armed Forces General Staff were only those which have been made public, Rebelo de Sousa describes as "an unprecedented fact" the disclosure of part of the matters discussed at the latest meeting of the Council of the Revolution; namely, the views expressed by Generals Ramalho Eanes and Melo Egidio. Note has been taken of this procedure, Rebelo de Sousa says, adding that it is surprising that such views were not conveyed first to the government by the president of the republic.

In the statement released by the prime minister's office, Rebelo de Sousa points out that Vasco Lourenco has not said anything about the slogans of the general strike of 12 February, basically calling for the overthrow of the government, dissolution of parliament and opposition to the revision of the constitution. Nor has he said anything, Rebelo de Sousa goes on, about other incidents that took place on the day of the strike, such as the climate of intimidation created by those supporting the strike, the illegal and criminal actions disrupting the supply of essential services, the physical intimidation of citizens and organized attacks on their property.

It would appear that in the eyes of Mr Vasco Lourenco all this is nothing but a cabal hatched by the government against defenseless workers, Rebelo de Sousa says. And he added: We have before us the classic tactic of seeking to isolate a member of the government, in this case the minister of internal administration, as part of an onslaught against the government.

Rebelo de Sousa then reiterates the government's stand on the events of the day of the general strike: They were serious, and one of them allowed the government to gain access to plans of a terrorist organization to interfere in the telecommunications network with the aim of broadcasting revolutionary proclamations in several areas in Lisbon and elsewhere. Rebelo de Sousa further says that in any democratic country, the activities of such terrorist organizations pose a threat of subversion of the situations [words indistinct].

Concluding the lengthy comment on Major Vasco Lourenco's statement, Rebelo de Sousa says: It is easy to understand the logic of the political discourse of the Portuguese Communist Party. It is, however, more difficult to understand its exact identification with the spokesman of the Council of the Revolution.

COMMERCIAL, PUBLIC RADIO SEPARATION -- Commercial radio in Portugal is to be made independent from public service radio broadcasting. This was stated yesterday by Jose Alfaia, secretary of state for social communication, at a meeting of the Reformist Tendency of Social-Democratic Trade-Unionists on the subject of the mass media. The government says that RDP is in a state of economic chaos. Alfaia said that a plan for the financial recovery of RDP will be concluded in the near future. That plan will envisage the separation to the ultimate consequences -- to quote Alfaia -- of public service radio and commercial radio. BASQUE PREMIER FORESEES 'OUTRIGHT CONFRONTATION'

PM151459 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 5 Feb 82 pp 5-6

[Excerpt] Madrid -- "There will be an outright confrontation over the issue of the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process: its consequences could be very grave for us, and in that sense I believe that the conversation had a substantial ingredient, and that is my quite bluntly expressed opinion to that effect," Carlos Garaikoetxea, premier of the Basque Autonomous Government, stated following the meeting which he held at noon yesterday with Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo.

Premier Garaikoetxea, who stated that "The organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process is like a badly tailored suit," was talking with Calvo-Sotelo, Minister of Territorial Administration Rafael Arias Salgado and the government's representative in the Basque country, Marcelino Oreja, for about 90 minutes. Judging by his statements, the meeting brought no solutions to the issues raised.

The Basque premier also told journalists that "Communication is always beneficial, and in that sense I believe that the regular nature of the meetings is a contribution to understanding the problems both of the state and at the level of the Basque country, which the prime minister and I view, of course, from different viewpoints."

"On many issues there are disagreements and agreements," he added. "I would say that an extremely grave concern on my part about the bills such as the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process, which are before parliament, and the consequences which they could have for public order, has been left unresolved. On an issue such as Lemoniz [site of nuclear power plant under construction], I expressed my annoyance at the prime minister's decision and reiterated at the same time the courteous and civilized manner in which we wish to deal with this matter within strict respect for the legal order."

"Without prejudice to the matter's clearing the parliamentary hurdles before it, we have decided that the Basque Government's Department of Industry and the Spanish Government's minister of industry and minister of territorial administration will take up the issue again to see what solution there may be within those alternative plans, which we have discussed, a strict and thorough public control."

Last, asked whether Mr Calvo-Sotelo sought future parliamentary support from the Basque Nationalist Party during the meeting, Garaikoetxea stated that over the bills which "conflict with our viewpoints, there will be considerable confrontation. The prime minister expressed his good intentions that there should be harmony in the remainder of this legislative term; I share his desires, but there are enormous obstacles which will be handled, of course, from conflicting viewpoints."

However, Arias Salgado told journalists that the assessment of the meeting as a whole was positive: "The meeting falls within the timetable [of meetings] which the prime minister has periodically with the premiers of the autonomous communities. Most of the conversation took place in a warm atmosphere and had as its aim an exchange of information."

The minister added that "as is natural and usual, the premier of the Basque autonomous community was interested in receiving information from the prime minister concerning Spain's overall political situation and concerning the socioeconomic situation, which is an object of concern for all Spanish people."

Asked whether any disagreement with Mr Garaikoetxea had been noted, he emphasized that "Some concern emerged. It is already known that there are disagreements as regards the implementation of the autonomy agreements between the Union of the Democratic Center and the Spanish Socialist Workers Party, and he expressed his concern about part of those agreements, such as the famous organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process."

DENMARK

DEFENSE MINISTER FAVORS BUYING THREE SUBMARINES

PM221421 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 18 Feb 82 p 7

["CB" report: "Poul Sogaard Wants To Spend 1 Billion Kroner on Submarines"]

[Text] Defense Minister Poul Sogaard will shortly begin talks with the representatives of the other parties which support defense legislation -- the Liberals, Conservatives, Center Democrats and the Christian People's Party -- in the so-called 11-Man Committee on the possible purchase of three new submarines during the present decade.

The new submarines would replace the four oldest of the navy's present total of 6 submarines. Sogaard has said that he is positively disposed toward the purchase.

The defense minister told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that as long as the submarines are ready for use around 1990 and it could thus be ensured that there would not be too large a gap between the phasing out of the old submarines and the introduction of the new ones, the politicians would reach a decision about purchase in the course of 1983. A new submarine costs around 300 million kroner today.

"One of the things we will discuss is how the future looks for submarine systems. I do not know whether there is any alternative to submarines, but this is one of the things we will discuss." One of the topics which will be considered in the discussions will be the consequences for employment that the purchase of new submarines for 1 billion kroner would have, and also the question of whether the submarines should be built at a Swedish or German shipyard or -- as a third possibility -- perhaps at a Danish shipyard. "We have two shipyards in our sights, a Swedish one and a German one, and of course we also have a Danish shipyard as a possiblity, even though it is many years since we built submarines in Denmark. We will look into the best way of spending the money so as to produce as much employment in Denmark as possible."

The Defense High Command has already informed the defense minister of its views on the question, but these will remain confidential for the time being. But according to Sogaard, the armed forces' leadership has not produced any alternatives able to carry out the submarines' military tasks, involving forward invasion defenses in particular. They are tasks which Sogaard said cannot be carried out in very many other ways. In addition, the submarines can also be used to combat foreign submarines invading Danish waters. "This is an area in which we have great expertise and are well to the fore. So I take a very positive view of acquiring the new submarines," Sogaard said.

SALVARDORAN OPPOSITION TO HAVE COPENHAGEN OFFICE

[Joern Mikkelsen report: "El Salvador Rebels To Be Given Office in Copenhagen"]

[Excerpt] The Danish Social Democratic Party will place an office in Copenhagen at the disposal of the socialist opposition in El Salvador. The announcement of this move comes only a few days after Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen's blunt criticism of the U.S. administration's support for the military government in El Salvador and the equally blunt U.S. response.

The office will be situated in a new center for the labor movement's work for solidarity and Third World aid. The center will occupy a building on Rewentlowsgade in Copenhagen. The Social Democratic Party, the Danish Trade Union Federation, the Labor Movement Solidarity Fund and the Social Democratic Youth Association are the organizations behind the center. Jyette Andersen, Social Democratic Folketing Group chairman, will be chairman of the center.

PAPAIOANNOU ADDRESS TO AKEL NICOSIA GATHERING

NC221920 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 21 Feb 82 pp 1, 3

[Excerpts] AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou has made a new appeal to all democratic and patriotic forces to unite their strength on the basis of a minimum program and measures for its implementation to avert the danger of having authority taken over by the forces of extreme rightwing reaction and fascism.

Papaioannou yesterday addressed a gathering of AKEL from the city and suburbs of Nicosia and emphasized that party interests and personal aspirations must give way in face of the interest of the people and their cause. AKEL, he declared, is, as always, ready to play its unselfish role, provided the victory of the democratic forces and implementation of the program to be agreed on are guaranteed. The AKEL secretary general also referred to the war hysteria which has taken over the U.S. imperialists, who threaten to lead mankind to a world thermonuclear war. Papaioannou called for a struggle for eviction of the British bases, for withdrawal of the Turkish forces and for the demilitarization of Cyprus so that the country may be saved from nuclear calamity.

Papaioannou stated: "We have reached a stage in which all those who underestimate the danger of a third world war, all those who fail to see the need for mobilization of the people to stay the hand of the U.S. leaders and to prevent them from leading mankind toward thermonuclear calamity, fail to grasp the true meaning of imperialist activities and unwittingly allow things to be led where the arsonists of a new war want to lead them. "At the time U.S. leaders are intervening in El Salvador and arming the fascist junta of this country so it can murder thousands of noncombatant democratic citizens; at the time they are preparing to intervene in Nicaragua and in Cuba; at the time they are feverishly arming the Zionists of Israel so they can attack Lebanon and Syria after they used the veto in the UN Security Council to prevent sanctions against Israel over its annexation of the Golan Heights; at the time they generously are arming the Turkish junta and preparing it for a new attack in Cyprus and in the area; at the time they continually and scandalously are intervening in the domestic affairs of the Polish People's Republic and assisting the counterrevolutionary and subversive elements; at the time they are preparing for chemical warfare and already are using such inhuman means against Cuba; at the time one hears only from the mouths of those who govern the United States expressions of anticommunism and anti-Sovietism and sees only an arms race, it would be the worst form of naivete if an objective observer failed to draw the conclusion that today's U.S. leadership, which expresses and represents the most reactionary circles of the multinational monopolies, which more than replaced the Hitlerite fascists of World War II, has taken the road toward a third world war; which this time will be a thermonuclear war.

"What is needed is a new and more mass and determined mobilizaton of the peoples of Western Europe -- stronger than ever before. It is essential that the peoples of Western Europe particularly should force their governments to take a more decisive stand toward the U.S. imperialist plans for installation of medium-range missiles in Europe. They must determinedly say 'no' to the Americans. Not only this, but they must also make Reagan and his gang understand that Europe and mankind will not tolerate a third world war. They must make them understand that there is only one way, and that is the way of detente, of control of strategic weapons, the way of disarmament and peace.

"It is not only the peoples of Western Europe, however, who have this supreme duty. Our own people, the long-suffering Cypriot people, also share it. The criminal and warlike plans of the U.S. imperialists also include Cyprus. The Americans plan to use the northern part of our fatherland, which is occupied by the Turkish troops, as a base for the Rapid Deployment Force they are organizing. They plan to use it as a base to launching missiles against the Soviet Union and other countries friendly to Cyprus.

"The British imperialists already have their 'sovereign' bases in the south, and they are being used by the U.S. imperialists.

"Cyprus runs the danger of being wiped off the map during a third world war. For our people, therefore, this is a matter of life or death. What is the use, therefore, of talking about independence and social progress when we will simply not exist after a third world war? The struggle to avert a third world war is also a supreme duty for us. This is the struggle for withdrawal of the Turkish occupation troops from our country, together with all other foreign troops. This is the struggle for the abolition of all foreign bases and for full demilitarization of Cyprus. There is no more direct, more imperative and more vital duty than this.

"Comrades, the presidential election in our country is only 11 months away, and there is no doubt that this election will be the most important in recent Cyprus history.

"The Western imperialist element -- and particularly U.S. imperialism -- has already started to act and intervene in a scandalous way in the domestic affairs of Cyprus. Utilizing, like Hitler, the communist danger, the imperialist element is attempting to put its servants in authority to bring about a partitionist solution to the Cyprus issue, for bases in the northern part of Cyprus and conversion of our country into the strongest NATO war bridgehead.

"U.S. and NATO imperialism want to disrupt the patriotic, democratic forces of the people of Cyprus so their own people, none other than the [Democratic] Rally and extreme rightwing coup leadership, may have the opportunity to take over authority. Utilizing various ruses, it is attempting to spread panic among the democratic rightwing, even the center rightwing, under the excuse that 'Cyprus is in danger from commumism.' This is the very same trick that was used, and is still used, in other countries to serve the imperialist, reactionary interests and to enslave various countries to imperialism."

KIPRIANOU-PAPANDREOU TALKS END IN ATHENS 23 FEB

NC231125 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1100 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] The talks between Prime Minister Papandreou and Cyprus President Kiprianou have concluded in Athens. The second phase of the talks will be continued in Cyprus during Papandreou's visit to Nicosia on Saturday.

The two leaders agreed last night at Kastri on promotion of new initiaitves on the Cyprus issue, without, naturally, predetermining the results of these initiatives and efforts. In a joint statement Papandreou and Kiprianou underlined that if coordinated efforts are continued -- something that will be done -- it is possible that favorable prospects for the Cyprus issue may become apparent within a few months. The two leaders also agreed to intensify their contacts with foreign governments. Kiprianou leaves for Nicosia this afternoon after his meeting with party leaders.

Background to Talks

NC222107 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 22 Feb 82

[Text] President Kiprianou and Prime Minister Papandreou had another meeting at Kastri at 2000 tonight. As has been revealed following tonight's meeting between President Kiprianou and Prime Minister Papandreou, it was necessary in fact for the Greek and Cypriot sides to give certain indications to third parties regarding willing initiatives in view of the international movement seen regarding the Cyprus issue. This made President Kiprianou's visit to Athens before Prime Minister Papandreou's visit to Cyprus imperative.

The first element is the expression of a specific willingness to undertake a role by a distinguished international figure who expected certain indications from the Greek and Cypriot side. It was also necessary to give answers to various soundings made as to whether Greece and Cyprus truly accept the convening of an international conference on the Cyprus issue. Both Mr Papandreou and Mr Kiprianou have agreed that both these cases must be promoted within the UN framework.

The two leaders agreed to continue high-level contacts with various governments, not only to preserve but also to intensify the international movement that can now be seen. The two indications that the two leaders gave were that Greece and Cyprus wish for every effort to be exerted for a total solution of the Cyprus issue that presupposes the end of occupation, without this meaning that they are against the inter-Cypriot dialogue that has as an objective the settlement of the domestic aspect of the Cyprus issue and which, in any eventuality, must end within a reasonable time, whether or not it is to bear fruit.

Statement Issued

NC222201 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 22 Feb 82

[Excerpts] President Kiprianou met Prime Minister Papandreou at Kastri this evening. The meeting was private and lasted for 1 hour. In a joint statement after the meeting, President Kiprianou and the Greek prime minister stated that following the exchange of views on the latest developments and the international movement that has been apparent recently, and as they cannot discount the results of all these initiatives and efforts, they believe if the coordinating efforts continue -- which they will -- auspicious prospects for the Cyprus issue cannot be precluded. The two leaders agreed on the further steps to be taken and said they will be in constant contact. They also agreed to intensify their high-level contacts with foreign governments. The joint statement also says it was judged that President Kiprianou's visit to Athens had a decisive importance and was productive.

Finally, it has become known that tremendous international interest is being expressed concerning the Greek prime minister's visit to Cyprus next Saturday. This visit is being characterized not simply as a courtesy visit, the first by a Greek prime minister, but as a historic event for developments in the Cyprus issue. President Kiprianou will return to Nicosia tomorrow afternoon.

CUMHURIYET ON TURKISH CYPRIOT ADMINISTRATION

TA200818 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 15 Feb 82 pp 3, 9

[Text] The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus [TFSC] celebrated its 7th birthday on 13 February. Seven years may be considered a short, indeed, a very short period in the life of a society. Yet, indicators useful and important for the future would emerge if we reviewed the reasons for and conditions during the establishment of the TFSC as well as the problems it has faced during the past 7 years.

It would be useful to point this out immediately: The establishment of the TFSC has left a lot to be desired. During the days and weeks following the "peace operation," it would have been the ideal solution to achieve, as soon as possible, a just and lasting peace based on a bicommunal federal system and to establish an independent, nonaligned bicommunal federal Cyprus republic purged from all bases and debarring the repetition of the events of 1963, 1967 or 1974. Unfortunately, such a solution has not been achieved. First, Ankara wasted precious time and opportunities because of the calculations of one wing of the Turkish Government of the time. Later, the governments that followed preferred to remain passive in order not to appear compromising. This also prevented a solution.

Also, Athens and the Greek Cypriot administration have always preferred to use their upper hand in international forums and to fully exploit their propaganda possibilities before the public, thus insisting on their game of isolating the Turkish Cypriot administration and of pushing Ankara into a corner. This is one of the factors preventing a solution in Cyprus. In other words, while trying to fully exploit its superior propaganda power, the Greek-Greek Cypriot side became almost a slave to it, gave second priority to a solution in the island and even adopted an attitude that prefers the problem to remain unresolved.

The TFSC was born because a solution was not being reached and because the game to push the Turkish Cypriot administration to isolation became obvious in February 1975. It can be said that, in a way, the TFSC was born because it was forced to be by certain events.

Yet it would be useful to acknowledge a defect in the birth, or rather, in the structure of the TFSC. The Turkish Cypriot administration turned into a "federated state" by means of a unilateral decision. HOwever, the Greek Cypriot administration, which must be the other side of the federal state, has insisted on seeing itself as the only legitimate state organization in Cyprus and has refused to recognize the TFSC and the Turkish Cypriot administration. This has created a crippled reaction.

Also, since a federated state cannot be recognized by foreign countries, as in the case of, say, Texas, the TFSC was left in quite a difficult position and became an unprecedented example of its kind in history. Maybe this situation should not be exaggerated, because, as we said, the TFSC was created as a result of extraordinary conditions.

There are several reasons to justify the existence of the TFSC internally. First and foremost, it was necessary for the Turkish Cypriot community -- which has managed to protect its existence despite heavy pressures for years -- to establish an organization, which even if not equal would be at least close to the Greek Cypriot community in the political, social and economic fields. This, in turn, was necessary for the creation of the stable conditions of a situation where, in the future, the two communities could live in peace and with increasing cooperation.

In short, the Turkish Cypriot community had to start to create the economic, political and social institutions of a federated state within a federal framework without wasting any time. Seen from this viewpoint, the establishment of the TFSC has been useful.

In the political field, even though it was a very young democracy, the TFSC managed to activate its parliamentary system successfully despite the difficulties created by its youth. However, the strengthening paternalistic tendencies during the recent government crisis, tendencies which are incompatible with parliamentarism, might constitute a serious danger in the political field.

It is impossible to say that the past 7 years have been very successful economically. The basic reason is that the civil servant-based structure of the TFSC has not been able to pursue a policy of mobilizing its own forces of production -- as much as possible -- and of aiming at teaching a level of production where it could be self-sufficient.

In the future, it is essential for the TFSC to give priority to initiatives that increase its own economic power and to pursue an economic policy that does not remain passive with the knowledge that aid will come from Ankara.

In the sociopolitical field, it would be useful if the TFSC pursued a tolerant policy that would ensure full conciliation within this small community, that would meet the requirements of all its cross-sections, and that would ensure the representation of almost all of these cross-sections in parliament.

Unquestionably, the only way of reaching these goals is tolerance. That which can be achieved through force and pressure is a dangerous silence, not conciliation. And what the TFSC needs if full social conciliation, not silence. In truth, it is not at all difficult to achieve such a conciliation within the structure of the TFSC.

PARIS ARABIC WEEKLY INTERVIEWS BULENT ULUSU

PM221309 Paris AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI in Arabic 15-21 Feb 82 pp 26, 27

[Interview granted by Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu to Maha Samarah as a member of an Arab press delegation in Ankara -- date not given]

[Text] Turkey has two experiences with the military. In both instances the generals restored power to the civilians. The generals in Ankara today promise to return power to its rightful owners by restoring democracy in 1983, that is, next year, as they promised in the "timetable." But the internal situation in Turkey and the circumstances involving this country's relations with its neighbors in the East and the West are different form those in the past. So, will the generals fulfill their promise?

Turkish Prime Minister Adm Bulent Ulusu, the second man in Turkey, was interviewed by an Arab press delegation which included AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI correspondent Maha Samarah. She put to him the following questions:

[Question] What are your government's objectives after 17 months in power? What have you achieved with regard to security and stability and are you satisfied with the results?

[Answer] After we came to power, we laid down a plan and we are now progressing according to it. Of course, security and stability have been our No 1 priority as they are actually our basic problem. We can say that we have succeeded to a great extent. After achieving political stability we have dealt with the economic problem which has become a universal problem. We admit that our economic problem in the past years was exacerbated because of the lack of political stability in the country. In the light of the stability that has been achieved and the economic measures we have taken, we have been able to improve the economic conditions and we consider ourselves to be pursuing the right path.

[Question] On two previous occasions the military returned power to civilians. Will you implement the timetable which you announced for the restoration of democracy in 1983?

[Answer] The Turkish Armed Forces honor their word and implement what they announce. It must be stressed that our armed forces are different from armed forces in other countries because we proceed in the light of Ataturk's principles that entrust the military establishment with the task of preserving these principles and depending the public. In fact, before 12 September 1980, the country was in a state of chaos and there was a need for someone to restore stability and impose the rule of the law. In some countries, the armed forces intervene in order to establish a dictatorial regime. This was not, and will not be, our objective because our basic task is to establish a true democratic regime free of chaos. We would like to point out here that the government departments before 12 September were paralyzed, democracy was not functioning, the unity of the country was in danger and the country was on the brink of a civil war. As for the implementation of the program, it is progressing according to the timetable and you will see that we will implement what we planned.

[Question] In one of your recent interviews, you mentioned that your government was able to achieve "miraculous" progress in fighting terror and improving the economy. Is it possible to let us know the achievements accomplished in these two fields?

[Answer] Before 12 September, Turkish society knew of several rightist and leftist terrorist organizations which had actually become influential in society in that they were able to penetrate the labor unions, student circles, the education sector, and the official departments. The previous government was unable to deal with terror which paralyzed our constitutional system which is based on three pillars. The executive authority had no influence and the legislative authority was unable to enact legislation that would curb terror and was so paralyzed that for 7 months it was unab le to elect a president for the republic. The judiciary was unable to implement the sentences passed against the troublemakers because of the ability of the terrorists to influence the judiciary system. Briefly, the state became ineffectual and the number of victims each day totalled 20 while the average of victims today is less than 1 daily. I emphasize less than one victim because we no longer have daily terrorist incidents. The state has become a real state and there is no longer need for extraordinary courts and new laws.

As regards the economy, the inflation rate was 100 percent or more, which has been reduced by 25 percent. The economic situation today is better than it was before. Consumer goods are available and there is no longer any waiting in line. Our balance of payments and foreign trade have improved by 4.4 percent. If we look at the economic situation in the world at large we would find that the growth rate there is much less. While the rate of exports in the world at large is falling, the rate of our industrial exports is increasing by 65 percent. For this reason we say that what we have achieved with regard to terror and the economy is a miracle.

[Question] What guarantees are there to prevent the terrorists from resuming their activities?

[Answer] The guarantee, in our view, is that those among the detainees whose guilt is proven will be punished. When the people see that no criminal will escape punishment, criminals will be deterred. Also we must consolidate our government establishments, particularly the security establishments, by raising the intelligence efficiency of our secret organs. There is no doubt that the effectiveness of these establishments as well as the neutrality of the government and its desire to ensure stability together with the great support the Turkish people have shown for our measures -- all these factors -- constitute the guarantee to prevent the return of the previous situation.

[Question] Has it been ascertained to your satisfaction that foreign hands played a part in the terror?

[Answer] We have confiscated 800,000 items of weaponry. Such a large number could not have dropped on Turkey from the sky. Definitely these did not arrive by plane but came from across neighboring territories. Smuggling of arms has now stopped and the measures we took have succeeded in putting an end to smuggling.

[Question] Sectors of the Turkish population have expressed the desire to go back to the roots of Islam instead of Western modernization.

[Answer] I would like to affirm that there is religious freedom in Turkey despite the fact that the majority is Muslim. We follow the principles of Ataturk which are based on religious freedom and on separation between the state and the religion. We are a secular state while Turkey is part of both the Western world and the Islamic world. We have strong relations with the Islamic world whose problems we consider as our problems because we are linked to it by a great ethical heritage. But this does not prevent our upholding the freedom of belief and securing it for everybody since sectors of our people want to live in accordance with the Islamic laws and others want secularism.

[Question] You personally took part in an Islamic delegation which the Islamic Conference held in At-Ta'if to mediate between Iraq and Iran. What have you achieved?

[Answer] We have tried our best to end the fighting but we were unable to achieve positive results this time. This does not mean that we have given in to pessimism, for we must continue the efforts to end fighting between two neighbors. Unfortunately, there is international interference to keep the Islamic world divided and not in solidarity.

[Question] What is Turkey's attitude toward the Arab-Israeli conflict?

[Answer] We support the Arab rights and the return of the Arab lands to their legitimate owners as well as the right of the Palestinian people to establish a state of their own. We have very low relations with Israel and we have in our embassy in Tel Aviv only one employee looking after our property. Turkey supports its Muslim confreres in international issues.

COURTS CHARGE MILITANTS, LABOR PARTY OFFICIALS

TA191800 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Summary] The press and public relations office of the Army IX Corps and the Erzurum, Agri, Kars and Artvin Martial Law Command has issued a statement saying that the command military public prosecutor's office has filed charges against 169 militants belonging to the Turkish Socialist Party of Kurdistan, the Freedom Path and the Partiya Karkere Kurdistan for secessionist activities, establishing the aforementioned illegal organizations, arming the Turkish people and inciting them to civil strife, causing rebellion, murder, attempted murder and assault. Of the 169, some 147 are leftists and the remaining 22 are rightists. The indictment demands the death penalty for 37 of the suspects.

Meanwhile, the 1st Army and Martial Law Command military prosecutor's office has filed charges against 80 of the founders and administrators of the Turkish Labor Party which has been closed down. Prison sentences ranging from 10 to 36 years are being demanded for the suspects. The indictment says that the suspects established a political party with the aim of securing the supremacy of one social class over other social classes and destroying the state's established economic and legal system, and that they encouraged citizens to commit crimes with the aim of achieving their goals. The indictment further says that the suspects were in cooperation with other illegal establishments with Marxist-Leninist principles and that they engaged in racist and secessionist propaganda in the eastern and southeastern regions.

POLISH AIRLINE TO RESUME FLIGHTS FROM FRANKFURT

LD211604 Hamburg DPA in German 1407 GMT 21 Feb 82

[Text] Frankfurt/Berlin, 21 Feb (DPA) -- Air traffic between the Federal Republic and Poland, suspended since the proclamation of martial law, will be resumed on 5 April. A spokesman for the Polish airline LOT said in Frankfurt today that as of that date LOT would be offering one flight per week from Frankfurt to Warsaw. However, the former connections from Cologne and Hamburg would not be resumed. The resumption of air traffic applied also to Deutsche Lufthansa, the spokesman said. In contrast, a Lufthansa spokesman in Berlin said in reply to an enquiry that his firm "still had no plans about when a regular service to Poland" would be resumed. The Federal Government had refused landing permission to LOT in the Federal Republic as long as Lufthansa was not allowed to fly to Polish airports. There was no comment available today from the Bonn Foreign Ministry concerning the announcement by the Polish authorities. Air traffic between Poland and Great Britain was resumed last Friday.

TELEVISION CREW HELD FOR 8 HOURS IN WARSAW

LD191234 Hamburg DPA in German 1038 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Warsaw, 19 Feb (DPA) -- The camera team of the German First Television Service was arrested in Warsaw yesterday during authorized filming activities and was detained for 8 hours. Some of this time had to be spent by the television crew -- cameramen Hans Gersonde, who is accredited in Warsaw, and four Polish assistants -- in a cell together with a number of drunks picked up in the course of the night. Neither the press attache of the German Embassy nor television correspondent Klaus Richter were allowed to contact the arrested team. With an official filming permit, the team had been shooting the checking of cars by the militia and the military in the afternoon. When they had finished filming they were detained and first taken to a military guard post, where they were accused of having also filmed a passing police convoy. From the military post they were later handed over to the police. At the police station they had to surrender their personal belongings and were locked up without interrogation in a cell measuring about 10 square meters containing, including the television crew, about 15 persons.

They were not released until 0100. No explanation was offered. Embassy Press Attache Klaus Reiff and the television correspondent who were waiting at the police station had been told earlier that the five men would have to remain at the station at least for the night. When the diplomat asked where they were being detained he was told that this would be decided later. The release was evidently the result of intervention by the Foreign Ministry. Two weeks ago the team of the Second German Television Service which had been engaged in authorized filming at a Warsaw weekly market, was similarly detained for about 3 hours.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

MINISTERS DEVALUE BELGIAN FRANC, DANISH KRONE

PA220424 Paris AFP in English 0341 GMT 22 Feb 82

[Text] Brussels, 22 Feb (AFP) -- European Economic Community (EEC) finance ministers agreed Sunday night to devalue the Belgian franc by 8.5 percent and the Danish crown by 3 percent against other currencies in the European Monetary System (EMS). The devaluations, to help the ailing economies of Belgium and Denmark, were considerably lower than the Belgian Government's request for a 12 percent cut in the franc's rate in the EMS and the Danish call for a 7 percent cut in the crown's value. Both requests met stiff opposition from other EEC ministers, who considered the figures excessive, community sources said. The Belgian request was further complicated by the fact that the Belgian franc is currently on parity with the Luxembourg franc within the European Monetary System. Therefore, any devaluation of the Belgian currency would also bring down the Luxembourg franc.

EEC MINISTERS AGREE TO CUT IMPORTS FROM USSR

NC232137 Paris AFP in English 2131 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Brussels, 23 Feb (AFP) -- European Economic Community (EEC) foreign ministers agreed today to cut imports of manufactured goods and luxury items from the Soviet Union, the European Commission announced here today.

Greece disagreed, as it did on January 4 when the EEC first announced the possibility of cutting back Soviet exports following the imposition of martial law in Poland in December.

In the next few days the European Commission, the administrative arm of the EEC, will decide which Soviet products will be affected by the decision and the size of the cuts. But EEC sources said the decision would not have much bite, since the import cut is unlikely to affect energy and other raw material imports that make up about 78 percent of Soviet exports to the EEC.

The commission has drawn up a list of Soviet products on which higher customs tariffs could be applied, including caviar, crabs, prawns and shrimps, salmon, vodka, furs, cut diamonds, pearls, carpets, cars and steel products. Some of these imports could be cut by as much as 50 percent, but others by much less, the sources said.

They added that the EEC list accounted for only a small 550 to 880 million dollar chunk of Soviet exports to the EEC, which currently totals 12,000 million dollars a year. Energy imports make up 69 per cent of the total, and other raw materials nine per cent.

The foreign ministers also gave their formal approval to a grant of eight million European currency units (ECU's) for food and pharmaceutical products to be sent to Poland by non-governmental humanitarian bodies.

MARTENS' U.S. VISIT BRINGS NO RESOLUTION

DW191307 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 19 Feb 82 p 10

[Commentary signed EIN.: "Contradictions"]

[Text] Europe can talk with many tongues in its exchange of views with the United States. This time it was the Belgians who lodged their complaints with the American partner. This is how it looked: Prime Minister Martens and External Affairs Minister Tindemans drew attention, on behalf of the European Community, to the divergent views which determine the economic policies of the United States and Europe. The politicians from the old continent lamented the U.S. high-interest rate policy which is partly responsible for an unemployment figure of an average of 10 percent in the community. President Reagan countered politely. He counteracted the accusations of his visitors with strategic questions: What about Europe's fulfillment of the second part of the NATO dual decision? Where are your sanctions in view of the Polish catastrophe? The Belgians asked for understanding for the special position of Europe as the next-door neighbor of the Russians. Their thesis is: Detente, yes; neutralism, no. Will that be enough in the long run to keep the United States on the course of a policy of: Europe, yes; isolationism, no?

MUHRI CREDITS SOCIALISTS WITH MAINTAINING PEACE

AU191802 Sofia BTA in English 1430 GMT 19 Feb 82

["Franz Muhri: No Peace Without USSR"]

[Text] Sofia, 19 Feb (BTA) -- "Without the USSR it would have been impossible to prevent a third world war," said Mr Franz Muhri, chairman of the Austrian Communist Party, in an interview for RABOTNICHESKO DELO. The Soviet Union and the socialist community countries are the major factor of peace. They play a decisive role in European detente, underlined Mr Muhri.

Under the conditions of the economic crisis in Austria, the relations with the socialist countries contribute to the employment of more Austrians. Without them, the number of the unemployed would have been greater, he pointed out further. The economic relations between Austria and the socialist countries are equitable and mutually advantageous, contrary to the relations with the foreign monopolies which are limiting Austria's independence.

The example set by the countries of real socialism, Mr Muhri went on to say further, alleviates the struggle of the working people for social and political rights under the specific local conditions in Austria. "The general laws of the building of socialism are equally valid for our party. Naturally, in the context of the specific for Austria conditions," said the chairman of the Austrian Communist Party.

Mr franz Muhri dwelt on three basic points in the new programme of the Austrian Communist Party. The party has declared support to the antimonopolist economic policy, for a state-owned industry, for reducing the share of foreign monopolies, for preventing unemployment and realizing a widescale social programme, especially in the field of housing construction.

The Austrian Communist Party is fighting in defence of and for spreading of democracy, namely for the absolute ban of neofascist propaganda, for democratization of the educational system, for a right of the internal workers' councils to control the work in the enterprises.

The Austrian Communist Party stands firmly against the NATO decision to deploy medium-range missiles in Western Europe and to produce the neutron bomb. It backs the proposals made by Mr Leonid Brezhnev during his visit to West Germany, because they correspond to the Austrian interests. The Communist Party has firmly denounced the development of arms production in that country.

Mr Franz Muhri stated that the relations between the communist parties of Bulgaria and Austria are traditionally very good. They are an expression of international solidarity and cooperation which should be protected and furthered in the future. The two parties, said he, have identical stands on the main questions at the present stage. "Bulgaria's achievements in the building of socialism are a particularly valuable and important help to the Austrian Communist Party, as we can explain in Austria what socialism brings to the working people," stressed Mr Muhri.

Dwelling on the centennial of the birth of Georgi Dimitrov, he emphasized that Dimitrov's ideas are vital today. On the basis of the idea of the united front it is now possible to launch in Austria a wide-scale drive for unity of communists, socialists and Christian democrats against neofascism and war, said Mr Franz Muhri.

NEW SANCTIONS ANNOUNCED AGAINST USSR, POLAND

LD231934 Montreal in English to Europe 1900 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Canada is imposing new sanctions against Warsaw and Moscow to protest the imposition of martial law on Poland. External Affairs Minister Mark MacGuigan says Canada will not extend any new commercial credits to Poland, except for those covering purchases of food, and he says Canada will postpone negotiations on rescheduling payments on the massive debts which Poland owes to the West. Other sanctions against Poland include restrictions on the movement of its diplomats in Canada and limits on flights by the Polish airline to Canada. The sanctions against the Soviet Union also include limits on airline flights, along with a delay in a planned meeting of the Soviet-Canadian mixed economic commission and postponement of other high-level contacts. Mr MacGuigan says the measures are in line with those being taken by Canada's allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Details Outlined

NC231951 Paris AFP in English 1945 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Ottawa, 23 Feb (AFP) -- The Foreign Ministry statement said Canada would continue to send grain to Poland on credit since "food for the use of the Polish people is essential at this time." The government is taking sanctions against the Soviet Union since Moscow "must be made aware of the concern we share with other members of the alliance over the Soviet attitude towards developments in Poland," it said. Poland and the Soviet Union must adhere to "internationally recognized standards of behavior," the ministry added. The sanctions against the Soviet Union include:

-- Possible reductions in high-level Canadian-Soviet contacts.

-- Postponing negotiations on science, cultural and education exchange programs.

-- Postponing the upcoming meeting of the joint Canadian-Soviet economic commission.

-- Limiting to twice a week (their current number) Soviet Aeroflot flights to Canada.

The sanctions against Poland include:

-- Restricting movements of Polish diplomats in Canada.

-- Joining North Atlantic Treaty Organization countries in refusing commercial credit to the Polish government for all dealings, except those concerning food.

-- Suspending Canada's academic exchange program with Poland.

-- Postponing all scheduled talks on the Polish debt.

-- Limiting Polish LOT airline flights to Canada to two a week (the current rate).

The Canadian Government in its communique announcing the measures stressed that in clamping down martial law on Poland Warsaw had ignored the Helsinki agreements which it signed in 1975. Canadian Foreign Minister Mark MacGuigan noted that Polish authorities had ignored a Western call to reopen the dialogue with the Catholic Church and the Solidarity Labor Union. It took Canada several weeks to take a decision with regard to sanctions against Moscow and Warsaw. Ottawa today apparently followed the lead taken by the United States and other North Atlantic Treaty Organization partners.

ECONOMICS MINISTER REVIEWS CEMA COUNTRIES' DEBTS

LD231640 Hamburg DPA in German 1508 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 23 Feb (DPA) -- According to the Federal Economics Ministry, the CEMA countries had debts of more than $80 billion to Western industrial nations at the end of last year. State secretary in the Economics Ministry Dieter von Wuerzen said on Tuesday in answer to a parliamentary question that the Federal Government has taken on sureties worth DM25.3 billion, including interest, for business with the CEMA countries. This overall obligation also contains loans which are only to be repaid at a later date. The Bundesbank put the total net debt of the CEMA countries to the FRG at DM18.6 billion in the middle of May. According to the Central Bank DM11.8 billion of this is in the form of bank credits to the Eastern bloc.

The Bonn state secretary said that so far there have been problems only in the repayment of loans made to Poland and Romania. Romania has run up over $1 billion of liabilities to the West, the repayment of which is causing considerable difficulties. So far Poland had fulfilled the commitments arising from the rescheduling of state-backed credits from the FRG in the past year. Regarding the demands of Western banks, Poland should be able to achieve the aim set in the rescheduling negotiations, Von Wuerzen said. Interest is continuing to be paid.

The state secretary said there are still delays in the payment of debts which were not rescheduled in the last year, mainly those owed to exporters to Poland. The Federal Government has intervened so that the payments can be facilitated to a large extent. The Polish Government has agreed meanwhile to continue to meet its obligations. On the other hand, the Economics Ministry still sees considerable risks for the loans in the face of the Polish economic situation. Approximately DM1.4 billion [interest and principal] in Polish debts to Germany will fall due this year.

RESHUFFLE RUMORS ILLUSTRATE COALITION SHAKINESS

[Manfred Schell commentary: "Wrecked"]

[Text] The carnival spectacle -- as the chancellor described rumors about an allegedly forthcoming cabinet reshuffle -- has become bitterly serious. There was no real reshuffle, though. But the instability from which reshuffles and other unpleasantness can develop has been strongly confirmed by the Bonn-on-the-Rhine spokesmen.

Genscher and Verheugen warned against "playing with fire" -- as if it were a fact that the wirepullers of the rumor were in leading positions of the coalition partner. And Genscher backed in due form the two FDP ministers, Graf Lambsdorff and Josef Ertl who were said to be dismissed -- as if Genscher were convinced that somebody was really proposing the fall of these two representatives of a definitely non-leftist wing.

Conversely, while Ehmke was strongly advising the SPD troika, Schmidt-Brandt-Wehner, to think about their successors, Minister for Housing Haak contributed to the rumors by saying that Defense Minister Apel has a "good chance" of becoming faction chief Wehner's successor in this legislative period. SPD Federal Manager Peter Glotz assured everybody who supported a termination of the Bonn coalition of his respect and a Berlin SPD deputy irreverently called Graf Lambsdorff a "nut."

The expression is justified insofar as Lambsdorff has been a steel pin holding the coalition together. But there are tones which can do more than just destroy glass. Is the SPD chairman aware of that, does he contribute a calming influence? Brandt announced this weekend that it has become clearer in the last year that agreement exists between the Social Democrats and the Free Democrats on important political questions particularly pertaining to foreign and economics policies.

He said that although he had just demanded an additional income tax revenue which is being strictly rejected by the FDP. So much for the party chairman's approach to the seriousness of the situation. Yippee -- as Lambsdorff put it so aptly.

SCHMIDT STRESSES ACCORD IN FRENCH RELATIONS

LD231352 Hamburg DPA in German 1302 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 23 Feb (DPA) -- Commenting on his upcoming meeting with French President Francois Mitterrand, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has noted that there is a general agreement of views on important political questions. In an interview given to LE MONDE, Schmidt said the following in answer to a question on Washington's demands concerning the stance on the sanction against Moscow and Warsaw: "There is not the slightest bit of difference between our stance and that of the French. And I believe that they will, like us, not change anything in the stance." The Federal Chancellor stressed "Europe's need, and thus also France's, for a close friendship and alliance between the French and Germans." Schmidt, who is going to Paris for 2 days within the framework of regular German-French consultations and will be meeting Mitterrand for the eighth time, also does not see "any differences in French and German conceptions of economic and monetary relations with the United States."

One exception to the accord between Bonn and Paris in fundamental questions, according to Schmidt, is the joint tank project desired by France. He gave the assurance that a final decision has not yet been reached and that he will try to convince the Defense Committee of the Bundestag of the need for closer cooperation between the two countries. The obstacles are mostly of a technical nature. In the "Leopard II," Bonn has a heavy tank which will last into the 1990's, whereas Paris, partly for reasons of export, wants to develop a new and lighter tank together with the Germans. "You can see that I have not yet given up all hope," Schmidt said. Schmidt expressed fundamental interest in a defense stressing the European aspect, but he did not think that France, as a nuclear power, is greatly in favor of such a concept.

DEUTSCHE WELLE PLANS CABLE TV PROJECT IN U.S.

LD240438 Hamburg DPA in German 1527 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Cologne/Guetersloh 23 Feb (DPA) -- Deutsche Welle intends to set up a cable television project in the United States together with a "commercial partner". It was learned from the Cologne radio station today that the aim of this project is to provide more information in the United States than hitherto about Germany and the problems of the Federal Republic. The program will consist of entertainment, information and cultural features. It was also stated that relevant talks are already being held with the Bertelsmann Publishing Group of Guetersloh, but that an offer had not been made to the publishing company. A Bertlesmann AG spokesman said, however, that his company had received a Deutsche Welle offer regarding the broadcasting of a trial program in an American city.

According to Deutsche Welle, advertizing "in acceptable form" will also be incorporated into the program. Obviously, with U.S. television in mind, however, it was said that advertising must in no way determine the program. The project, which according to Deutsche Welle is to be explored jointly with ARD [First German TV] and ZDF [Second German TV] is to be realized "as soon as possible" although it is considered hardly possible to do so before the beginning of 1983.

COMMUNICATIONS UNIONS STAGE 24-HOUR STRIKE

NC241236 Paris AFP in English 1218 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 24 Feb (AFP) -- French state television and radio were running reduced services today when most of the trade unions staged a 24-hour strike. The stoppage is to back demands for closer cooperation between unions and Communication Minister Georges Fillioud on reforms in the audio-visual sector.

The three TV channels were running news and films. The state radio channels were broadcasting some news and a joint recorded music programme.

Meanwhile power cuts took place today when the General Labour Confederation (CGT) staged a four-hour strike on pay, causing Electricite de France to reduce output by one third.

Some betting clerks at racetracks began an indefinite strike following violence at Auteuil track, West Paris. The conflict relates to a fifth week's holiday, shorter working hours and computerization.

CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT ARRIVES IN PARIS FOR SUMMIT

NC241223 Paris AFP in English 1211 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 24 Feb (AFP) -- West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt arrived here today for the 39th Franco-German summit. Accompanied by all his senior ministers, the chancellor was met by Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy. He begins talks with President Francois Mitterrand after lunch.

Will Seek Common Stand

NC231452 Paris AFP in English 1436 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 23 Feb (AFP) -- West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and French President Francois Mitterrand will seek a common stand on the future of Europe at their summit meeting starting here tomorrow, French Presidential Spokesman Michel Vauzelle said today. The two leaders will also try to define a European policy vis-a-vis the new monetary policies of United States President Ronald Reagan, he added.

In view of the "immediate risks" involved, President Mitterrand believes that this summit meeting, the 39th of its kind and the eighth between the two men, will be "extremely important," the spokesman said.

A new Euro-American relations policy and the quest for a more homogeneous Europe are two closely related points on the agenda, Mr Vauzelle said, adding that France "wants to find the ways and means of protecting the fragile economic balance of the European nations."

The main point of discord arises from Washington's desire to involve its Western European allies in the sanctions proposed against the Soviet Union over the Polish crisis. The Europeans, however, are more engrossed with President Reagan's financial policies and the rising U.S. involvement in Central American conflicts.

GISCARD D'ESTAING TO RUN IN CANTONAL ELECTIONS

LD241234 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Valery Giscard d'Estaing is to be a candidate in the cantonal elections [on 14 and 21 March 1982].

This cable which we have just received is having a bombshell effect in political circles. The former president of the republic will run in Chamaliere, one of the 160 new cantons created by the Ministry of the Interior. Giscard d'Estaing will give a press conference this afternoon to explain his return to political life.

MITTERRAND EXPRESSES SUPPORT TO IRAQI AMBASSADOR

JN232040 Baghdad INA in Arabic 1910 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 23 Feb (INA) -- French President Francois Mitterrand has stated that France's stand on the Iraqi-Iranian dispute must agree with that of Iraq because both of them support a solution that guarantees the legitimate rights of Iraq and Iran within an internationally recognized framework. In this spirit, the president added, France has supported and continues to support mediation efforts with the aim of reaching a negotiated settlement of the dispute. The French president was speaking at a reception held here this evening to receive the credentials of the new Iraqi ambassador Muhammad Sadiq al-Mashshat.

Addressing the new Iraqi ambassador, Mitterrand said: Your country is involved in a dispute with Iran. France is concerned with the threats to the stability in the Middle East posed by this dispute. The Iraqi officials have openly and on many occasions announced their desire for peace. The French president added: This common concern and the strong French-Iraqi relations necessitate continued dialogue between our two countries. Claude Cheysson's visit to Baghdad which followed Tariq 'Aziz's visit to Paris in August and Michel Jobert's visit to Baghdad in October was an occasion for a profound exchange of views on the major problems that were submitted for discussion. In my view this dialogue goes deeper than the events which we might be facing at present. It expresses our two countries' desire to safeguard their national independence and to preserve the regions to which they belong from foreign intervention and imperialist influence. The French president voiced his country's desire for peace based on justice and denounced the resort to the policy of faits accomplis.

The Iraqi ambassador made a speech in which he conveyed President Saddam Husayn's greetings to President Mitterrand. He reviewed the profound and advanced relations between the two countries and Iraq's Arab and international policies, its stands on the Palestinian and nonaligned problems and its intention to remain away from international blocs. On the Iraqi-Iranian dispute, the ambassador said: Since the outbreak of hostilities, Iraq announced its desire for peace and cease-fire. Iraq is adhering to its position which has been repeated several times and on numerous occasions to the various bodies which mediated in the dispute. He referred to the Persian regime's intransigence and its insistence of continuing its aggression against Iraq and the Arab nation.

The Iraqi ambassador said: Since the emergence of the 17 July Revolution, Iraq has adhered to the Ba'th Party principles of establishing relations with other states and, at the same time, adopting an independent policy which guarantees the Iraqi and Arab interests, rejects foreign intervention and fights against oppression and exploitation. Iraq has also adhered to a policy of support to nonaligned countries and Third World countries through direct and indirect means. In this regard, the Iraqi ambassador referred to President Saddam Husayn's proposal to establish an international fund to assist developing states.

BUFALINI: 'HISTORICAL DIVERGENCE' HAS OCCURRED

PM231145 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 15 Feb 82 p 2

[Text] Trieste -- The Trieste region communists' discussion of events in Poland and the PCI-CPSU polemic is influenced by a very special history, which is undoubtedly accentuating difficulties and turmoil, though without affecting the unity of an organization that has experienced some very tough ordeals. Recently in the sections and among party members there have been frequent references to 1948, to the break between the Cominform and Tito that prompted lacerations and traumas here still not entirely resolved (it is enough to consider how difficult it is to discuss, even within the context of historical research).

The words used by PRAVDA remind many people of the words used to "excommunicate" Yugoslavia. At that time the vast majority of the party aligned with the Soviet Union, and that majority also included comrades of Slovene nationality who, for the sake of declaring their loyalty to an internationalist outlook, rejected their homeland, which had been liberated a few years earlier by an armed struggle in which they had participated. This is why for some party members the present deliberations can prove even more agonizing and adherence to the party's stance is sometimes challenged.

There was a vigorous and broad reflection of these and other problems to be resolved at the federation aktiv meeting, which was widely attended and which ended with a speech by [PCI Directorate Member] Paolo Bufalini.

There were many expressions of dissent and many questions were asked. Sometimes the arguments failed to convince. Some comrades yielded to emotion and gave vent to pent-up anger. Some comrades questioned the exhaustion of the October Revolution's driving force and warned against "lapsing into social democratic stances." For some, we have gone beyond the congress resolutions. Others issue a severe verdict on some L'UNITA articles on the situation in the Eastern bloc countries. None of them is concerned with safeguarding party unity, defending its image and its line in the dialogue with the other parties, or sustaining the commitment to the struggles and resolving our country's problems. If some people have mentioned the workers' difficulty in fully understanding the significance of the party's recent resolutions, the debate here tried to answer these claims by presenting the very resolute analyses of the factory cadres: What is the working class' real power in Poland and the socialist countries? Why could Solidarity immediately rally millions of members (including communist workers) while the official trade unions were dissolved?

No debate is futile, Comrade Bufalini pointed out in his speech, and our debate must continue to develop freely, characterized by a spirit of unity. Our method of debate is democratic centralism, and that means differing stances cannot become opposing banners; otherwise there would be an inevitable split in our ranks. It was for this very reason that we deplored Comrade Cossuta's latest sallies. Having stated at the end of the latest Central Committee meeting that he had aligned with the decisions adopted, Cossutta supported stances opposed to those of the party at a public meeting to celebrate the PCI's 61st anniversary and went so far as to question the majority's right to be the majority.

We are not now denying the Soviet Union's role or the decisive changes that occurred worldwide following the October Revolution. The fact is that a historical divergence [divaricazione] has occurred, and we are fighting for a qualitatively different kind of socialism. In any case the Soviet comrades themselves denounced errors and aberrations at their 20th congress, but they then repeated them and restored the cult of personality. In the Yalta memorandum Togliatti raised crucial and unresolved questions, all of which recur in the tragic events in Poland: the relationship between party and trade union, nonbureaucratic economic planning, national feelings and the religious issue. The pluralism aimed at by the Italian Communists is no abstract model, but an irrespressible demand that socialism permit the utmost development of democracy.

Is another congress needed to ratify these things; Bufalini asked. Let us reread the theses and conclusions of our 15th congress. This will put an end to assertions both inside and outside the party that the third way is hazy and unclear. Its basic outlines are defined. Naturally its substance and instruments have to be specified. In any case not even Lenin in 1917 had a recipe available for socialist building in Russia.

Do these stances of ours have ulterior motives; Bufalini asked. On the contrary, their rigor and realism are gaining ground, persuading more and more people and enabling us to advance with our strategy for the country's socialist transformation.

CPSU CHARGED WITH PURSUING POLEMIC IN PRESS

PM240929 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 18 Feb 82 p 19

[Giulietto Chiesa dispatch]

[Text] Moscow -- None of the Soviet newspapers has yet published a single line -- literally not a line -- of the PCI's official document or the statements by individual party leaders concerning the events in Poland and the polemic that began following the announcement of martial law in Poland. So no Soviet reader has yet been able either to compare stances or indeed even to acquaint himself with any of the arguments employed by the Italian Communists.

Under this complete and, in fact, incredible information blackout the Soviet newspapers are continuing their polemic with the "PCI leadership's" stances, citing other sources, in line with a method contantly used by Moscow, and their responses to PRAVDA's second article, which ended with the assertion that "the CPSU is not interested in exacerbating the polemic."

Yesterday, for instance, TASS released an article from the weekly NOVOYE VREMYA (appearing tomorrow) that included a roundup of positions (which, from what we have heard and seen, are anything but unanimous, in fact) "concerning," NOVOYE VREMYA writes, "the polemical stances adopted by the PCI leadership regarding the socialist building experience in the Soviet Union and the other countries of true socialism." In view of the fact that NOVOYE VREMYA has an international circulation, there is a clear intention to pursue an outright campaign, in other words to go well beyond a discussion.

Resorting to manipulatory forms of conduct well tested by experience, the Soviet weekly begins a list of parties, movements and individuals who, one could say, have already decided with the utmost rapidity to "take sides." This is a very casual method, because the list includes stances which, as in Marchais' case, embody no explicit polemics with the PCI, or in which, as in the case of Cuba's Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, the tone was that of a simple discussion. The response, NOVOYE VREMYA writes, has been "broad." It is not difficult to imagine in which direction. TASS itself provides a detailed -- and what must be considered provisional, in view of its brevity -- list of its sources. It starts with TRYBUNA LUDU and continues with Rodriguez, Hungary's NEPSZABADSAG, BRATISLAVA PRAVDA (the Slovak Communist Party paper,) the GDR's NEUES DEUTSCHLAND, Georges Marchais, UNSERE ZEIT (West German Communist Party,) Franz Muhri (Austrian Communist Party chairman), the "Danish Communist Party press," the Finnish newspaper TIEDONANTAJA (which is not the Finnish Communist Party paper,) the Argentine newspaper QUE PASA and, last, Krishnan of the Communist Party of India's National Council.

According to the Soviet agency's account, the essence of these stances can be summed up in quotations from TRYBUNA LUDU ("the PCI leadership's position strays from the line of solidarity"); Georges Marchais ("like it or not, the class struggle has a world character"); and Krishnan ("the PCI leadership's viewpoint.... are gross interference in Polish affairs," and "the claim that the measures recently taken by the Polish United Workers Party (though it does not seem that it has taken any measures, since everything was decided by the military council) are the result of pressure from the CPSU is unfounded and not based on the facts." It can be observed that the expression "PCI leadership" as used by PRAVDA is systematically (and apparently not accidentally) taken up in several (not all) other statements.

VATICAN SOURCES APPRAISE POPE'S AFRICA TOUR

AU191115 Rome ANSA in English 0815 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Libreville, 19 Feb (ANSA) -- The Roman church may have to change its ways and "Africanize" its appeal if it wants to suceed in the "evangelization" campaign John Paul II is trying to promote this week in his second trip to Africa since becoming pope in October, 1978, according to Vatican experts following the tour. The transformation some African theologians are asking for entail revolutionary changes in liturgy as well as in the church's hierarchical structure and, possibly even some adjustments in the Christian life-style.

One liturgic rule being challenged by local theologians is the mandatory use of wheat as the substance of the eucharistic bread, and grapes for the sacramental wine. They would rather make the wafers with manoic and administer traditional African drinks, a symbol of hospitality and conviviality, for the commemoration of the passion and death of Christ. "White bread and wine", Upper Volta theologue Sidbe Sempore once wrote, "are symbols of white colonial power. How, then, can they be symbols of the brotherhood of Christ?" The Rome church has thus far stood firm against requests of this type to revolutionize two-thousand-year liturgical tenets, not least because a change in the "eucharistic matter" in Africa would inevitably lead to analogous changes elsewhere.

Although sixty million of the world's 750 million Roman Catholics are in Africa and, at the going rate of conversions, there must be as many as 150 million by the year 2000, only one African cardinal holds a post of prestige in the Vatican Curia, the bureaucratic power-house of world catholicism. He is Cardinal Bernardin Gantin, 58, chairman of the Papal Justice and Peace Commission, which coordinates the Vatican's moves for world peace, and head of the Cor Unum Council, which manages Catholic aid operations. Gantin is a native of Benin, the small, primarily animist state ruled by a Marxist-Leninist military government the pope visited Wednesday morning.

The picture in the papal diplomatic corps is worse -- there is not a single black bishop among the pope's foreign envoys, not even in Africa. African representation in the College of Cardinals is somewhat better, with 12 prelates out of the 109 who have the power to elect a new pope. Word got out in Rome Wednesday that a 38-year-old Zairois priest, Emery Kabongo, was appointed as Pope John Paul's second secretary to flank Stanislaw Dziwisz.

Another change some African bishops are asking for is that married men be admitted into the priesthood and that the church show at least a little tolerance towards the regions where polygamy is deeply-rooted in local custom. The African standard-bearers of the Roman church's strictures on the subject were the butt of a recent quip from Msgr Joachim N'Dayen, bishop of Bangui in the Central African Republic. "African bishops who never express any irritating opinions are often the recipients of graciously offered checks mailed to them from the banks of the Tiber," he wrote recently.

In this central African state with a 65 percent African population the pope visited Wednesday, many bishops have been complaining that polygamy, which seemed to have been on the decline in the past, was coming back just at a time when twentieth century social pressures have started breaking up monogamous couples. It was in "this first of African nations to receive the Gospel" starting in 1844 with the arrival of Msgr Jean Remy Besseiux, commemorated by the pope as soon as he disembarked from his plane, that Polish-born John Paul II warned the local priesthood against "relativizing" the sacrament they received when they donned their robes.

CARRILLO 5 FEB REPORT TO PCE CENTRAL COMMITTEE

PM191547 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 12-18 Feb 82 pp 5-12

[Apparent text of 5 February report by PCE Secretary General Santiago Carillo to PCE Central Committee Plenum: "To Avoid the Country's Swing to the Right"]

[Excerpts] Threat of Dissolution of the Cortes

We have recently seen the head of government threatening to dissolve the Cortes if the exodus of deputies from the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] continues. No one but the PCE has responded to Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo's bid to make the stability of the parliamentary institution dependent on his own stability as head of government. Is there no other possibility in this chamber than the one-party government of Calvo-Sotelo? Must we all, including the opposition, support the present prime minister in order to adhere to the election times laid down in the constitution?

It has to be remembered that there has already been an early dissolution -- that of the constituent Cortes -- which we criticized severely and which also came about because of the previous prime minister's wish to maintain a monochrome government. The early election resolved nothing and accentuated the instability of the political scheme and, hence, of the democratic institutions.

Could a repeat of the same game be tolerated now? It is true that the constitution offers the head of government the possibility of dissolving the Cortes. But this is a power to be used with great care at a time of such complex transition as ours, particularly after the result of previous experience. An early dissolution today would be a tremendous mistake endangering democracy.

Coinciding with Calvo-Sotelo's warning, the rumor was current in political circles that certain UCD ministers saw it as their party's only salvation to hold elections under the threat of fear, maintaining the trial of [those involved in the attempted coup of] 23 February as a sword of Damocles which would force the popular vote to the right.

If this were to happen, it would be a political scandal of enormous magnitude which could mark the beginning of the end of the so-called "reform," inaugurating a period of uncertainty about the future of Spain and of the institutions which we Spanish have given ourselves in a process of peaceful and democratic change. But, it cannot be denied that, whatever the results of the trial, it is most probable that the sentences will be appealed against, by one side or the other, and that the trial will continue to hang over national life for some time. This is one more reason why the general election should be held at the time laid down in the constitution and not before, either in spring or in fall.

Consequently, the preoccupation of truly responsible political leaders should be not so much to consult the oracle of opinion polls [sondeos electorales] every morning as to try to ensure governmental and parliamentary stability between now and March 1983. This stability would demand, in the first place, the existence of a secure and sound government, counting on broad popular and parliamentary support.

Only by a miracle could Calvo-Sotelo's present government survive until 1983, particularly after the more than probable punishment by the electorate to which it is exposing itself in the Andalusian election. It was a bold venture to form a government solely with a party which today has approximately 150 deputies in the congress, as we pointed out in the 5-minute turn which we had in parliament at the time of the reshuffle. Given the correlation of parliamentary forces, the logical thing would have been to form a coalition government with the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], to which we had offered support, provided that the program had our agreement.

But Calvo-Sotelo olympianly refused that solution, thinking not of the interests of Spain and democratic transition but of group politics, some of whose motives have still not been explained.

The fact is that the UCD is losing members of parliament and that this outflow could grow as the election approaches.

Socialist Support

On the other hand, there is the fact that Calvo-Sotelo is governing with the parliamentary support of the Socialists, without which his government would not last 48 hours.

The head of government does not want the PSOE inside his cabinet, but he cannot survive without its support. One sometimes gets the impression that this country has a two-man government -- Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo and Felipe Gonzalez, who make political decisions -- and some ministers who attend to current affairs and, from time-to-time, settle with the PSOE leaders the differences which arise in the application of the agreements reached between the two chiefs.

Of course, this peculiar form of participation in government policy suits Calvo-Sotelo and the UCD, which keep the portfolios with the support of a left party and, at the same time, have their hands free to organize the accession to power of the broad right. But does it also suit the PSOE?

The PSOE believes it acquires greater respectability in the eyes of the actual powers and the financial powers through Calvo-Sotelo's support: It hopes to snatch votes from the center.

But in the opinion of the left, anxiety is beginning to spread. Is the PSOE not giving in too much to a kind of rightwing political blackmail, which, with the alibi of the possible alternative, is committing it day after day to a government action in contradiction with what its grassroots and the left electorate want?

Is the PSOE not suffering a political erosion which could prove greater than it would face by participating directly in the government? Was it necessary for the PSOE to take a stand against the nationalizations in general, and not for reasons of expediency but from positions of principle which contradict the practice of socialist parties like the French Socialist Party or the Labor Party and which are rather in the ideological sphere of Bad Godesberg? Is Calvo-Sotelo not using the PSOE as a point of support in order, after the next election, better to prepare a government of the broad right in conjunction with Fraga Iribarne's party?

With an eye on the election, the UCD leaders -- and this is symptomatic -- are already beginning to speak of a Marxist and anti-Marxist vote. Apart from the Francoist connotation of this arbitrary division of the electorate, which has the aftertaste of the lead-up to the civil war and whose use in Spain signifies erasing at a stroke everything that the transition has been and the bases on which the constitution and coexistence are founded. The invoking of Marxism and anti-Marxism reveals intentions which are not exactly in the direction of a future center-left government.

And the PSOE statement excluding the PCE from a possible government coalition, under these conditions, is a free gift for the right, which is not strengthening its prospects or those which the working class could have in the near future.

In all responsibility we wish to declare that the PCE, earnestly committed to the process of democratic transition, does not consider the continuation of Calvo-Sotelo's government a guarantee of governmental and institutional stability but quite the opposite; the PCE regards as indispensable a change of government reflecting the composition of the present parliament, from which a different and far more solid ministerial combination can arise. For these reasons it will maintain and accentuate its policy of forthright opposition to the present government.

Consequently, it clearly follows from all the aforesaid that the PCE considers that the Calvo-Sotelo government has created a new political situation which threatens to initiate a process of return and regression, under the recomposed hegemony of oligarchic sectors and multinationals, supported by U.S. imperialism. Faced with this situation, the forces of the left must maintain a firm position which does not exclude, on the contrary, responsibility and commitment to the democratic process and all-out defense of the constitution.

But it is precisely out of fidelity to this commitment and this defense that they must not maintain any ambiguity toward a government which is endangering the achievements of this perior.

Although the PSOE and the PCE together had more votes than the UCD and the Democratic Coalition in the 1979 election, because of the characteristics of the electoral law we won fewer seats. It is not certain -- far from it -- that something similar will not happen in the next election. And if we communists -- each one of whose deputies represents 84,209 voters, whereas a UCD deputy represents only 37,296 voters and a PSOE deputy, 45,098 voters -- are opposed to revising this unjust electoral law, which does not correspont to the democratic principle of "one man one vote" -- in which case our minority would be almost twice what it is today -- this is because we are very afraid that a new electoral law, drafted at the last moment, would be still more unjust than the present one and would tend to crystallize the two party system. The UCD government should have submitted to the Cortes, at the beginning of legislature, a draft electoral law, and it may be suspected that it did not do so because it did not know which criterion would suit it best at the time it would have to be applied.

But what is obvious is that the left is sufficiently strong in this country, even today, to carry effective weight in national politics. If it has not succeeded in this, it is because of the lack of a leftwing stretegy oriented toward defending the rights of workers and modest people, collective and personal freedoms and Spain's economic progress.

Cooperation within the left between socialists and communists is that which today can draw the center-left and center forces to attract them to a genuine policy of progress. If that cooperation does not exist, it is, in short, the rightwing forces which -- as is happening already -- will draw the center toward them and will succeed in moving the PSOE itself increasingly toward the right. The moving of this country rightward will be intensified, and the people -- the most unfortunate -- will pay for the consequences.

Communists and Socialists

The PCE is not prepared to follow that path. Whatever the course of events, we will reamin within the field of the genuine left, which does not wish to postpone its blueprint for change for 25 years and which wishes to begin to change now as much as is possible and necessary, I repeat, in a responsible but also consistent manner.

Over the last few days we have demonstrated in the Madrid Municipal Council the importance we attach to unity with the socialists. The argument that we had no people qualified to retain the directorship of town planning was puerile; we had them and we put them forward. For reasons into which it is better not to enter, the socialist comrades demanded the directorship of town planning for themselves, breaching the pact signed in April 1979. In short, we gave in to that demand; we did not wish to endanger the repairing of the pact, which, in our opinion, is essential, over what might appear as the petty issue of keeping a post.

Perhaps it would be a good thing to recall that before the 1979 municipal elections, the PSOE did not assert the need to reach an agreement with the communists. But the municipal elections gave the communists a good result, and the PSOE, realizing that the only way to govern the municipalities was to reach agreement with the communists, accepted the proposal we made it on the very evening of election day. And I believe that the overall balance sheet of the left's municipal management has been positive, despite the lack of government experience.

The PSOE's attitude in Madrid made us fear that this development was the beginning of a general breach of the pacts on its part and of a rightward shift in its policy. Fortunately, this has not been the case which demonstrates, in short, that the PSOE is also sensitive to the leftwing electorate's desire for unity and that it has a presentiment that at the hour of truth the right will do it no special favors, however moderate and social democratic its offers may be.

For that reason, to the essential question we may be asked in an electoral year -- has the PCE any specific alternative to offer voters? -- our reply is in the affirmative. Fraga and Calvo-Sotelo have an alternative which can be clearly discerned, even if the latter does not admit it -- a broad rightwing government. In that respect voters should know what to expect.

The PSOE has so far been presenting itself as a government alternative. But the fact is that the PSOE leaders know that by themselves they are no government alternative, even if they present themselves as such and encourage hunting the so-called useful vote. In this country, no party has sufficient electoral support to govern on its own.

The PSOE leaders know that if they wish to govern after the election, they will have to do so in a coalition, and that if they then maintain their refusal to reach agreement with the PCE, they will find themselves obliged to govern with the right, as their French counterparts did when they were led by Guy Mollet, or as they have done in Italy, with the adverse results for these parties, which in Italy have not yet been surmounted and which were surmounted in France thanks to Mitterrand's policy of unity of the left.

Our alternative, the proposal which we would make in the next election to the voters, the real "useful" vote which we would propose to them, would be to place a strong communist representation in parliament to prevent a rightward shift and a regression of democracy and of the PSOE itself and to ensure that the future government must comprise the genuine left and practice a progressive policy.

The PSOE will have many votes; it already had them in 1977 and 1979. Probably some sectors which voted for the center will now give it their votes. What is needed is for leftwing men and women -- those who cherish ideals of a real and radical change of society and do not wish to wait 25 years, who are worried and are even abstaining in the light of the rightward shift, and fear that shift will even end up by dragging along the PSOE -- to come and increase and swell the 2 million votes the PCE won in 1979. If leftwing men and women do so, relations between the PSOE and the PCE will be strengthened and the next election will pave the way for a truly progressive policy which Spain needs so much.

We are aware that this is an electoral year and at the same time a year dangerous for democracy, and that we must tackle it by implementing the political line approved by the 10th congress. At this moment I would like to recall what the core of our self-criticism at the congress was: the need to reverse the process which had occurred in our party following our emergence from clandestinity, which moved our cadres from work in the grassroots and in the mass movements toward posts of public representation and the leadership bodies upward, creating barriers of lack of communication or defective communication between the party's leadership and grassroots.

We communists will not win the election principally in a 21-day election campaign which, however well directed, will always have less means than those of the PSOE and the rightwing parties. We will win them with constant work of strengthening and extending our organization, with constant work of popularization of our conduct in the municipal councils and of our deputies' conduct in parliament, and with real work in the mass movements.

Our Party Today

I wish to conclude this speech with some words concerning the state of the party. Those who follow the life of our organizations during this period will find that an active debate is proceeding within the PCE, with a greater turnout at meetings than was usual before the 10th congress, and that the most diverse opinions are expressed at them without the right to disagreement being limited.

Our party can accommodate all disagreements; those of the people who do not agree with the congress' stance and the central committee's decisions on the issues of the workers and liberation movement, because they believe that we go too far in our criticism, and those of the people who believe that the party's renewal is insufficient and that we fall very short.

We have begun the task of taking part actively in these debates, without issuing anathemas and displaying the greatest sensitivity toward the disagreements, in an effort to convince, to persuade and to update members' communist culture. And we are continuing in that direction.

However, in our party, as in all the others and as in any democratic community, there are some rules of the game which we must all observe. Those who do not observe them voluntarily exclude themselves. Those rules are laid down in the party rules. And those who believe that by breaking the rules and drafting documents or organizing meetings outside the organization at which the party's policy and leadership are attacked will force us to infronge the rules and agree on another policy or another leadership with them are mistaken.

Within the party all debate is possible: Outside there is no debate; there is hostility, denigration and attempts to split the party. So it is proving, with a well-orchestrated campaign in which the same councillors are resigning every 3 days, giving the impression that the resignations are multiplying and that there is no longer a single councillor left in the party.

So it is proving also with the repeated documents which are always signed by the same people but which give the impression of an unstoppable outflow of members and which sometimes include, in an abuse of confidence, signatures which have not been authorized, such as those of Comrades Caba and Jose Sacristan. The same thing is happening with certain meetings and articles which will not go down in history for their political or theoretical importance but which seek to give the impression that the party is disintegrating.

Are those who do this aware that those stances are being turned into a preliminary election campaign against the PCE? Certainly, we have already been told in advance about some people's gambling on an election defeat for the PCE in order to afterward change its policy and oust its leadership. They would be prepared to reign over a PCE in ruins. What do the interests of the working class matter? What does it matter if the country swings rightward? What does it matter if the party destroys itself? The important thing is to put out of action the PCE's policy, the PCE's leadership and the rules by which the PCE is governed: What matters is to be in command.

I believe, I wish to believe, that most of the comrades who are taking part in these stances are not aware that they are conducting an election campaign for the right, and I call on them from here -- I believe that I am interpreting the central committee's opinion -- to abandon that stance and defend their stances within the party's ranks, respecting its rules. The party is not closed to any revolutionary; only those who do not respect the rules of the game exclude themselves.

At any rate, they should realize that the party's grassroots and our voters are beginning to be weary, to suspect the aims and intentions they are pursuing and to believe that some people are simply preparing for a split and others for their flight toward new memberships of different parties.

As far as the party as a whole is concerned, we are confident. We will continue our work in earnest. We will take all necessary steps to prevent an early dissolution of the Cortes, which would be very detrimental to democracy, taking us by surprise.

We will maintain and enlarge our electoral area, certain that in this way we are serving the cause of democracy, socialism and communism; that is, the cause for which the PCE exists.

PRESS REVIEW OF JORGENSEN'S CRITICISM OF U.S.

PM181351 [Editorial report] Danish newspapers of 11 and 12 February carry editorials occasioned by Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen's critical comments on U.S. foreign policy toward El Salvador, Poland, and other military regimes. Copenhagen's BERLINGSKE TIDENDE is critical of the prime minister's remarks, which, it claims, reflect his tendency to speak first and think later. In its 11 February page 8 editorial the paper writes that Jorgensen's "double attack on President Reagan and Secretary of State Haig -- first to foreign journalists and then on the TV-Avisen program -- is a classic example of his desire to shoot from the hip without aiming or giving thought to his shot. His criticism of the ambiguity in the U.S. administration's policy toward military dictatorships is so over-simplified and emotional that it is extremely difficult to take it as an expression of the Danish Government's well-considered foreign policy." The paper concludes by stating that Jorgensen's remarks "give a distorted picture of our U.S. ally."

In its 12 February page 6 editorial BERLINGSKE TIDENDE examines the repercussions Jorgensen's remarks could have on U.S.-Danish relations. The paper writes: "The U.S. Government's reaction to Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen's statements on U.S. policy has been reserved and diplomatically phrased, but it has left no one in doubt that they are seen as a serious burden on relations between Denmark and the United States." The paper proceeds to expand on U.S. reaction and examine the possible motive for the Danish statements -- a Danish desire to mark a greater foreign policy independence. But, the paper writes, "there is a strong risk that Anker Jorgensen's renunciation of U.S. policy will be taken as a confirmation of the assumption that there is an increasingly marked neutralist tendency in Denmark's attitude." The paper ends with the judgments that "this is an attitide which will lead to a lack of confidence in our value as a partner in an alliance and also with regard to the usefulness of building a security policy on a commitment to cooperation with Denmark. It will be an urgent task for the government to change the misleading impression that it has created."

Copenhagen's AKTUELT in its 11 February page 2 editorial deals with the reaction of Conservative Party opposition leader Poul Schlueter to the prime minister's remarks. The paper dismisses Schlueter's criticism and in so doing expresses its support for the views expressed by Jorgensen. "Anker Jorgensen has made a clear statement of a Danish attitude. He has asked for U.S. consistency in its evaluation of dictatorships and in the deeply serious cases of violation of human rights in the Eastern bloc, in Central America, in Latin America and in Europe.

"Schlueter does not like this statement. We do not like dictatorships. It could very well be that the Soviet Union will misuse Anker Jorgensen's outburst against the United States. Let it misuse it. It will not be the first time, and it does not change the truth."

FINLAND

FLAWS SEEN IN ACADEMIC'S VIEW OF USSR TREATY

PM240949 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 20 Feb 82 p 2

[Jan-Magnus Jansson editorial: "A Sense of Reality, Please!"]

[Text] Prof Dag Anckar's "proposal" at a seminar in Stockholm for the termination of Finland's Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance Treaty with the Soviet Union can be taken as an example of the fact that only extreme statements concerning Finnish foreign policy succeed in making it over the news threshold and arousing general interest.

More subtle statements on the same subject are easily lumped together as "liturgy" and are met with a yawn even if they do happen to contain new views.

Perhaps Anckar's statement should be seen as a kind of trial balloon. He himself must be aware that it is a view which has little chance of realization in the world of real politics. Anckar has exercised his right to hold a different view -- the right of every citizen in our society. The political risk is that the foreign press could magnify the significance of the speech and turn it into an expression of public opinon in Finland.

Other newspapers have already had time to reject the speech and take offense at it. It would therefore be unnecessary to do so here. It seems more important to subject Anckar's views -- as they appear in the press reports -- to an analysis and show the shortcomings in his arguments. What is important is not whether the speech is unsuitable from the political viewpoint, but whether it is factually correct or not.

In Stockholm Anckar said that the Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance Treaty is by no means a document which supports Finland's policy of neutrality, but that -- because of the assistance and consultation mechanisms it contains -- it "demolishes" neutrality. Instead we should have a neutrality free from commitments enshrined in treaties and supported by a strong defense capacity. This would, in Anckar's view, be a better deterrent against attack than the present arrangements which could, on the contrary, attract potential attackers. Anckar also said that he was able to accept the treaty's nonmilitary clauses and the commitment made by Finland to ward off attacks contained in the text of the treaty.

The ideal picture being painted by Anckar is one of Finland as a second Sweden, nonaligned and well armed, but a little further east. One could also say that his Finland is reminiscent of our country before 1939 -- when we were also striving to be strictly neutral and were fairly well armed. However, it is probable that he is envisaging here a Finland without the strong anti-Russian feelings which were characteristic of our country before World War II.

Anckar's arguments contain two mistakes in our opinion. First, he sees the situation only from the Finnish viewpoint and takes account only of what -- in his view -- would be advantageous for Finland. However, a treaty situation always embraces two partners, one of which happens in the present case to be a superpower. Second, he takes an all too one-sided view of the treaty as a purely military arrangement, whereas in actual fact the central component is the political ties between Finland and the Soviet Union. The military clauses are an important part of this.

We see Anckar's disregard of the Soviet Union's historical endeavors to protect its security interests in the direction of Finland as a basic flaw in his arguments. If we only think of diplomatic activity and leave military events to one side, we find that both before and after World War II the Soviet Union was energetic in its efforts to win a security pact with Finland. The matter was raised during Mannerheim's presidency. However, the question only really became urgent during Paasikivi's term as president, when the cold war split Europe into two halves. Paasikivi's place in our history is partly due to the fact that he forced through a text which satisfied Finland's interests as far as possible.

The main political result of the treaty's signing was that it removed the Soviet Union's fears of attack via Finland and fixed a pattern -- acceptable to both Finland and the Soviet Union -- in the event of an attack or the threat of attack. It is obvious that without the treaty it would have been impossible to achieve the present relationship of confidence between Finland and the Soviet Union. Any suspension of the treaty would noticeably weaken existing good relations.

A couple of simple current examples give a palpable demonstration of what this confidence means for us today. Since the late fall of 1979 there has been a continual crisis in the relations between the superpowers.

How would Finland's position have been during the Afghan and Polish crises without political confidence between the Soviet Union and our country? And further, would it have been possible to hold the election of a successor to Urho Kekkonen during a dangerous world period without any external pressures at all, if the Soviet Union had not been convinced of "the line's" durability, in other words, had confidence in our country's interests regardless of changes of leadership?

Thus in peacetime the Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance Treaty is primarily a political instrument which guarantees the maintenance of confidence between the two states. In the final analysis it is also, of course, an agreement on certain military arrangements if peace does collapse. Here Prof Anckar is moving in better-charted terrain, because others -- and several of them in positions of responsibility -- have had to seek an answer to the question of what happens if the treaty's military clauses take effect. However, Anckar expresses himself unsubtly, to put it mildly, when he describes -- according to the press reports -- how the Soviet Union, with the support of the treaty, would "move into Finland" to give itself and us military protection.

According to the treaty's wording, the two sides must reach special agreement on the assistance which, under the terms of the treaty, will be given to Finland by the Soviet Union. It is clear that Finland's military and political decisionmakers are therefore determined that the assistance would be in a form reconcilable with Finland's interests and would not -- to use Anckar's word -- "gratuitously" entice a third party into attacking Finland.

For the Finnish state authorities to be able to retain control over our own policies and over the defense of our own country, which of course are our goals, two important things are necessary: First, the Soviet Union must be able to rely on us politically; and second, it must also have reasonable confidence in our defense capability. The former condition is fulfilled at present. The situation is more uncertain as far as the second is concerned. The appalling blindness current in some political circles about the military obligations which the treaty places on us does not bode well. But this is something on a different plane from Anckar's abstract speculations. Let us discuss the situation in realistic terms and not make use of ideas, which far from strengthening our position, could on the contrary weaken it.

KIPRIANOU RETURNS FROM ATHENS CONSULTATIONS

NC231849 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] President Kiprianou returned tonight from Athens, where he had talks on the Cyprus problem with the Greek Government. On his return to Larnaca Airport, President Kiprianou made the following statement:

[Begin recording] I have nothing to add, at least at present, to what has already been stated in connection with the talks I had in Athens with Greek Prime Minister Papandreou and the reasons that dictated by hasty visit to Athens. In any case, this visit was imperative, and there is no doubt about that. In connection with the content of the talks, enough has already become known. Perhaps still more will become known during the visit by the Greek prime minister to Cyprus next Saturday. What I would like to stress tonight is the harmonious cooperation and mutual understanding between the Greek and the Cypriot Governments and personally between the prime minister and me. This is real, admirable cooperation, which we all have a duty to safeguard like the apple of our eye. I would also like to stress what we have established: That internationally today there is still greater interest in the Cyprus problem and that it is necessary to utilize this climate properly without delay and according to plan. At this point I would like to stress that we have arrived at decisions in connection with short and long-term planning. During my stay in Athens I had the honor and pleasure to meet with President Karamanlis, whose interest in Cyprus never lags. I had the opportunity to meet with the official opposition leader, the KKE secretary general and representatives of all the parties. I am conveying a message of full support from all the political parties of Greece for Cyprus' struggle for freedom and justice. All the contacts have been useful.

Above all I wish to emphasize that the visit to Cyrpus by Greece's prime minister will take place next Saturday. This is not merely a demonstration and proof of the lively interest by Greece's prime minister and the Greek Government in Cyprus; I believe his visit is of historical importance from all aspects. As I said earlier, with Mr Papandreou -- with whom we examined in the greatest detail every aspect of the Cyprus problem -- we arrived at various conclusions. It has already become known that we have encouraged every initiative within the UN framework. It has already become known that we have arrived at a decision for dynamic projection and promotion of the idea and the proposal for an international conference within the UN framework. As Mr Papandreou has stated, I also firmly believe that with the existing coordination -- the existing full cooperation, which we are determined to continue -- the door will be opened for better days for Cyprus.

Because of talk about the question of the inter-Cypriot talks, the promotion of internationalization and an international conference does not aim at abolishing the procedure of the inter-Cypriot talks. The inter-Cypriot talks are engaged with the internal aspect of the Cyprus problem, and absolutely no one objects to this procedure. However, if within a reasonable time -- as we have stated repeatedly -- this procedure fails to be effective, then definitely it will not be continued simply for the sake of the procedure. And without denouncing the procedure, we shall proceed with other actions, including discussion of the Cyprus problem at the UN General Assembly.

As I said at the beginning, I do not have much to add because I am absolutely certain that the Greek prime minister will speak at greater length about the latest developments and the prospects during his press conference in Nicosia. I wish to express my pleasure at having had the opportunity for this close cooperation and mutual briefing and for an in-depth discussion on all the aspects of the Cyprus problem. Mr Papandreou is truly and sincerely interested in the promotion of an honorable Cyprus solution. It will be a great pleasure for me to welcome him in Cyprus, and I am sure this will be a great pleasure for all the Greek Cypriots as well. We are waiting for him to come Saturday. [end recording]

PAPANDREOU RECEIVES LIBYAN COMMERCE DELEGATION

[Text] Prime Minister Papandreou today received the Libyan commerical delegation headed by the secretary of planning, Musa Ahmad Abu Furaywah, which is now on an official visit to our country. Coordination Minister Lazaris was also present at the meeting. Abu Furaywah also visited Commerce Minister Akritidhis and held talks on bilateral commerical relations as well as on resolving various problems and pending issues in commercial exchanges.

PASOK, KKE OFFICIALS MEET SALVADORAN FRONT GROUP

NC192132 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] Roberto Castro, a leading member of the Revolutionary Democratic Front and the National Liberation Front of El Salvador, today visited the PASOK offices and met with a delegation of the movement. The PASOK delegation briefed Mr Castro on developments in Greece and assured him of the full support of the movement in the struggle of the El Salvador people against the junta. At the same time, Castro was received this afternoon by Mr Florakis, secretary general of the KKE Central Committee. Mr Florakis expressed the unreserved support and solidarity of the KKE with the heroic struggle of the El Salvador people for the liberation from the junta and imperialist dependency.

PASOK Statement on El Salvador

NC192130 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Text] The PASOK Executive Bureau has issued the following statement on the El Salvador issue:

The PASOK Executive Bureau addresses militant greetings to the people of El Salvador, who are struggling for freedom, democracy and national independence. We greet the fighters of the antidictatorial movement, the statement says, who, standing up to dictator Duarte and the threats of U.S. imperialism, are waging the battle for the ousting of the grim junta. The Greek people are well aware of the consequences of military dictatorship, which they themselves endured in the recent past. For this reason, the Greek people warmly support the nations who struggle for freedom, democracy and progress. The PASOK Executive Bureau once again declares its resolute solidarity with the people and fighters of El Salvador.

PAPANDREOU MEETS UK ENVOY ON CYPRUS ISSUE

NC232238 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Greek Prime Minister Papandreou today received British Ambassador Sutherland, with whom he discussed bilateral matters and the Cyprus issue. Responsible sources have revealed that the discussion of the Cyprus issue was held in Britain's capacity as a guarantor power and in the light of developments in the problem.

BRIEFS

ROMANIAN DELEGATION -- Talks between the Greek-Romanian mixed interministerial committee began at the Coordination Ministry today. Coordination Minister Lazaris is head of the Greek delegation, while the Romanian delegation is headed by Ghorghe Petrescu, minister of the machine-tool industry, electrical engineering and electronics. Matters concerning industry, manufacturing, the survey to find oil, commercial development and technical cooperation, as well as matters concerning Greek students in Romania and cultural issues were discussed. During Romanian President Ceausescu's visit to Athens in May it is believed a Greek-Romanian draft agreement will be signed for more permanent cooperation by the two countries in the economic sector in general. PAPER EVALUATES PAPANDREOU-KIPRIANOU MEETING

NC231003 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 20 Feb 82 pp 1, 9

[Ziya Akcapar dispatch]

[Text] Nicosia (HURRIYET) -- After yesterday's surprisingly sudden call by Greek Prime Minister Papandreou to Greek Cypriot leader Kiprianou, on his sickbed, requesting him to come to Athens, the French Government now announces that UN representative Hugo Gobbi is expected to go to Paris "for talks."

In view of these unexpected initiatives by Papandreou and French head of state Mitterrand, all countries concerned with the Cyprus issue and the Middle East have alerted their diplomats and intelligence officers to unravel the mystery of these relations.

It has been ascertained through several evaluations that a "satanic triangle" has been formed by Paris, Athens and the Greek Cypriot sector of Nicosia and that Greece and France have agreed to get the EEC involved in the Cyprus issue. As soon as this became known, it was learned that Britain and the FRG expressed opposition to the involvement of the EEC in the Cyprus issue on the grounds that "if the EEC is involved in the Cyprus dispute the Soviet Union will also become a party to it."

On the other hand, Gobbi's agreement to discuss the Cyprus issue with France -- a third country which is not a party to it -- is characterized as a diplomatic blunder that could lead to critical developments.

The Greek Cypriot leader had a high temperature when he went to Athens yesterday, where he will be briefed about the satanic plan designed against Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot community -- a plan which could lead to extremely serious problems concerning the EEC, NATO and the East-West dialogue in the period ahead. His foreign minister, Nikos Rolandhis, is accompanying Kiprianou on this visit.

The Greek Cypriot radio announced that secret talks between Papandreou and Rolandhis [as published] started immediately and will continue today.

In the meantime, this sudden decision to ask Kiprianou, who has been receiving medical treatment in bed, to come to Athens -- though it is known that Papandreou is due to visit Cyprus in a week -- has caused anxiety both in Greece and the Greek Cypriot sector of Cyprus.

As anxiety became widespread, the Greek Government spokesman issued a statement stressing that "there was no cause for anxiety and that, on the contrary, positive developments were expected." In a statement issued the previous day on the visit, it was said that information in the hands of the Greek Government on the probable developments of the Cyprus dispute necessitated urgent consultations between Papandreou and Kiprianou. It was stressed in the same statement that more information would be released after the talks between the two leaders.

These unexpected developments in the Cyprus issue are being watched "calmly" by Turkey, the TFSC and all countries directly or indirectly concerned with the issue. The common term used by these circles for the plan designed by the "satanic triangle," details and timing of which have not yet become known, is "dangerous relations."

In the meantime Turkey and the TFSC are evaluating probable developments. According to information at hand, one of these evaluations is connected with the possibility that Greece and France will include the Cyprus dispute on the EEC agenda to create an artificial crisis during which Greece will resort to a fait accompli and announce that it has extended its territorial waters to 12 miles.

It has also been reported that Papandreou and Mitterrand are taking into account the angry mood Turkey's abstention from denouncing Israel in the UN General Assembly created in the radical Arab states. They also hope the international feeling is favorable for any action that may be taken at this stage. A competent official summed up the situation in these words: "We are living in important days."

Official Denies Cyprus Plan

TA231607 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1550 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 23 Feb (AA) -- Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman denied press reports alleging plans were in the making for a settlement of the Cyprus issue by the U.S., France, Federal Germany or Italy. It was unlikely that the governments of these states would present such plans, as spokesmen for the French and Federal German Governments, and U.S. President Ronald Reagan himself has recently reiterated the belief that holding intercommunal talks was the best way to reach a settlement. The Turkish Government sees no other way to a settlement, Akiman added.

In Lefkosa [Nicosia], officials of the Turkish Federated State were quoted as stating the Cyprus issue was a matter that could be settled best between the two communities, and that intervention from outside would in no way facilitate a settlement. Turkish Cypriot officials denied reports appearing in the Greek Cypriot press about alleged initiatives by France, Italy and Federal Germany for mediation in the Cyprus issue. They declined to comment on the visit to France of the UN secretary general's representative to Cyprus Hugo Gobbi, but reiterated their opposition to the idea of "taking the Cyprus issue out of Cyprus."

WEST MUST 'CONTAIN' GREECE AGAINST TURKEY

NC241147 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 21 Feb 82 pp 1, 14

[Commentary by Prof Fahir Armaoglu: "Thasos and Its Aftermath"]

[Text] Turkish-Greek relations are worsening a little more every day. If this trend is not stopped somehow, an explosion is inevitable. Naturally not all explosions lead to a conflict, but no matter what the nature of the explosion may be, the Thasos incident will constitute a turning point in this deterioration. For it is observed that Greece is determined to scrap the 1976 Bern agreement and consequently bring Turkey and Greece again to the brink of a conflict, a situation which existed 6 or 7 years ago. Turkey is more determined than Greece. The question of the continental shelf in the Aegean is not only a question of an economic resource, but a question connected with breathing space in the Aegean, like the 12-mile territorial limit question.

This determined attitude by both sides can bring about a disruption in Turkish-Greek relations any minute. For the opposite side is performing a comedy of errors in an utterly irresponsible manner.

It is impossible not to discern a parallel between the intensification of Greece's anti-Turkish campaign and the coolness that has come about in Turkey's relations with the Council of Europe and Western Europe. France, which has lost its prestige in the eyes of the Turkish nation because of the Armenian issue, appears to be wishing to vindicate its damaged integrity and respectability through Greece and the Council of Europe. The frequent mention of Frances' name in recent days is indicative of this. We shall soon know whether Germany will allow itself to become an accomplice in this matter. But no one should doubt that the small Scandinavian and North Sea countries may ally themselves with Greece in its adventurous policy against Turkey.

However, we deem it useful to draw attention to one point: Cyprus and the Aegean have become national causes for Turkey. All Turkey wants in this national cause is mutual and balanced interest. There is not, and there will not be, a government in Turkey which can make any sacrifice on this policy. Therefore if the Council of Europe and Western Europe desire to use an unbalanced and adventuring Greek prime minister as an instrument in putting so-called pressure on Turkey, they should know that this is an extremely perilous undertaking.

Cyprus and the Aegean are issues to be resolved between Turkey and Greece. It would not be an auspicious effort at all either for Greece or Western Europe to take these issues out of their framework or to try to add other issues to this framework.

If it is desired that Turkish-Greek relations should cease to be dangerous headaches for the West, the remedy for this is not to incite Greece against Turkey, but on the contrary to contain Greece in such a manner as to allow a settlement through peaceful methods.

ARABIC WEEKLY INTERVIEWS FOREIGN MINISTER TURKMEN

PM221033 Paris AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI in Arabic 15-21 Feb 82 pp 27-29

[Maha Samarah interview with Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen in Ankara -- date not specified]

[Text] [Question] Is there a crisis between you and the Council of Europe?

[Answer] I wouldn't call it a crisis. There are some difficulties resulting from the attitude of certain European parliamentarians. The European parliamentary assembly has adopted a resolution (threatening to expel Turkey in protest against Turkey's failure to uphold human rights) and we have registered our objection to that resolution. We have not withdrawn from the council and we will continue to be a member. We hope to be able to surmount the difficulties facing us, but this requires the cooperation of the other members.

[Question] Is there a timetable for your entry into the EEC?

[Answer] There is no timetable for our full membership. All we have done so far is express our interest in developing our relations with the community in the long run, hoping that one day Turkey will be a full member. We have not submitted an application for membership because we realize this requires the return of parliamentary democracy to our country.

[Question] When do you expect a return of democracy to your country?

[Answer] According to the announced schedule, a referendum on the constitution should take place this year. When the constitution is approved a new electoral law and a law on the organization of political parties will be promulgated. The date set for parliamentary elections is the fall of 1983.

[Question] The Europeans have threatened to expel you from the Council of Europe, but we see that the United States is strengthening the Ankara regime. It has lifted the arms embargo and has given you more military and economic aid. How do you explain this? Why is Turkey important to the U.S. strategy?

[Answer] I do not agree with this comparison. The U.S. attitude is no different from that of Western Europe. Our problem is not with the European governments; our problem is with a group of European parliamentarians and with a section of the Western media. We have good relations and common interests with several European states, particularly Britain and West Germany. As far as the United States is concerned I wish to point out that the embargo was lifted in 1978, and it was not President Reagan's doing. True, we have been able to consolidate our relations with the present administration and we have managed to raise the level of military and economic aid. We are indeed very satisfied with our special relations with the United States, which in our view are a result of the strategic and political importance the United States attaches to Turkey. These are warm relations between two NATO members serving the goals of the alliance.

[Question] Aren't you afraid of the "Soviet threat" after what happened in Afghanistan and Poland, bearing in mind that you have a long border with the Soviet Union?

[Answer] The possibility of a military threat is always there. This is one of the reasons Turkey has been a NATO member since 1952. I agree that the general threat to our region increased after the Afghanistan events.

[Question] Don't you believe the world conflict affects you as a NATO member and places certain responsibilities on your shoulders, necessitating, for example, that you agree to the deployment of U.S. cruise and Pershing missiles?

[Answer] There is absolutely no need for the deployment of these missiles here. These missiles are meant for central Europe, and there are no plans to install them here. Of course as a NATO member on one hand and as a neighbor of the Soviet Union on the other, we are eager to develop our relations with Moscow and maintain stability with it.

[Question] What is your reply to Greece's claim that you harbor "aggressive intentions" toward it?

[Answer] Our reply is simple: We have no aggressive intentions toward Greece. Greece tried to raise this issue within the alliance. At the latest conference of the defense ministers in December it requested guarantees against Turkish threats. These accusations were not taken seriously by any state. I believe Greece realizes that it is difficult to convince the other members of its views on this.

[Question] There is a socialist government in Athens now. How do you read Papandreou's policies and how do you view Greek-Turkish relations while he is in power?

[Answer] There are longstanding differences between Turkey and Greece. The distinction between the present government and the previous government in Athens is that there were negotiations between us and the previous government. Mr Papandreou has chosen to stop the dialogue with us, and this has led to tension in our relations. We are still interested in dialogue, but we warn Greece against taking unilateral decisions or measures to predetermine the results of the negotiations.

[Question] Why has the dialogue between you stopped? Could this be attributed to the fact that the regimes in Ankara and Athens have different characteristics?

[Answer] The difference in the nature of the regimes has nothing to do with the real dispute between the two. This dispute is especially over the Aegean Sea.

[Question] Is there no connection between the Cyprus problem and the dispute between the two countries?

[Answer] The Cyprus problem is undoubtedly related, but the Cyprus question is outside the scope of negotiations between the two countries. The talks on the Cyprus problem are restricted to the representatives of the two Cypriot communities, with the approval of Turkey and Greece. In the past Cyprus did affect our relations with Greece. However, the main disagreement now is over the Aegean Sea and rights of aviation and territorial waters.

[Question] What in Turkey's opinion is the solution to the Cyprus problem and what are your conditions for withdrawing your army from the northern part of Cyprus?

[Answer] We believe a solution can be achieved through the current negotiations between the two communities under the supervision of the UN secretary general, who is authorized by the Security Council to work for a formula acceptable to both sides. The main point in the proposed formula is the formation of a federal state comprising both sectors.

[Question] The federation system is acceptable to Greece. The disagreement is over the area of the Turkish sector. Some people expect Ankara to put pressure on Denktas to make him settle for less territory.

[Answer] We undoubtedly have relations with President Denktas, but it is wrong to assume that we have the last word. We are surprised at the assumption that we can bring pressure to bear on Denktas. During the bilateral talks in August 1981 the Turkish community showed considerable flexibility, in harmony with the ratio approved by the United Nations.

[Question] What is the Aegean Sea dispute all about? Is it oil, aviation rights or territorial waters?

[Answer] We do not know if there is any oil in the Aegean. Turkey and Greece have agreed not to carry out any oil prospecting in the disputed areas. As for aviation rights, a solution can be found, provided Athens accepts the rules laid by the International Aviation Commission and provided it accepts the principles of international law. The problem lies in the Greek interpretation that sovereignty extends to tactical areas and thus gives it a right to territorial waters beyond the 6-mile limit. International law stipulates that aviation rights should correspond to the territorial waters limit. As far as we are concerned, we do not want to extend our territorial waters in the Aegean. We accept and are satisfied with the status quo. Every side is entitled to 6 miles, and we would like to remind Greece that it has no right to go beyond that limit. As for coastal demarcation, we believe a solution can be achieved through negotiations and on the basis of justice and equality. We seek equal settlement covering the very complex geographical areas.

[Question] After your government took over, we sensed an improvement in Turkey's relations with the Arabs, especially Saudi Arabia, Libya and Iraq. We have also noticed Turkey's mounting interest in the Middle East question. What is behind this change?

[Answer] I don't think there is a change. Under past regimes Turkey was also interested in good relations with the Arab World. One has to be fair. Our previous governments were interested in good relations with the Arab and Islamic Worlds, but our country was passing through difficult times and was suffering from instability, terrorism and chaos. There are two other reasons:

1. Some people held the view that rapprochement with the Arabs and Muslims would mean conflict with the West.

2. Our neighbors themselves did not regard Turkey as a stable state and were not interested in developing their relations with us.

This is actually where the change occurred. We are happy that our present government has taken important and specific steps in its relations with the Arab World.

[Question] The Islamic congress held in At-Ta'if and attended by Turkey discussed your relations with Israel and gave you 6 months to break off those relations. The deadline has now passed but you still have relations with Israel.

[Answer] There was no specific deadline. I don't recall that there was a decision on this. I know the Arabs want us to adopt a hard-line policy toward Israel, but they know our limitations resulting from our geographical and political positions and our security interests with the West.

As far as I know, the Arab and Islamic states appreciated our position at At-Ta'if. They asked us to reduce our diplomatic representation with Israel, which we did. We have recalled our embassy staff from Tel Aviv and have maintained representation there at the level of third secretary. We have also asked the Israeli Embassy in Ankara to do the same. We have nominal, not essential, relations with Israel.

[Question] What about your relations with the PLO?

[Answer] The PLO has a representative in Ankara and we have recognized its diplomatic status.

[Question] How does Ankara explain the Armenian Liberation Army's attack on its diplomats abroad and what concessions is it prepared to make in order to see an end to terrorism, considering that the victims now total 20 of your diplomats?

[Answer] First of all, terrorism cannot be ended with concessions. Turkey has no concessions to make to criminals. True, we have lost 20 diplomats in bestial and meaningless crimes. They provide false historical accounts to justify their crimes. Distorted historical facts cannot be accepted as a justification for inhuman acts. The world will soon know the historical truth about these Armenian claims. Meanwhile, terrorism will be terrorism. It is not enough to merely condemn terrorism. The only effective way to fight it is to fight it collectively through international cooperation. This is what we ask of other states.

Norwegian Interview

PM171627 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 10 Feb 82 p 9

[Arne B. Thorbjoernsen interview in Ankara with Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen; date not given]

[Text] Ankara, February [dateline as published] -- "It is remarkable that the criticism raised against Turkey abroad is inversely proportional to the progress we are making toward full democracy. Therefore it is clear that the criticism is due more to internal political considerations than concerns for democracy or human rights in Turkey. This could be seen very clearly in the resolution adopted by the Council of Europe."

Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said this in an interview with AFTENPOSTEN in his office in Ankara. He did not hide his bitterness about Norway's role in the condemnation of the incumbent military regime. He also questioned the timing of the growing tide of protest.

"The military intervention took place almost 18 months ago. In the time which has passed since then there has been a clear and concrete trend toward the restoration of full parliamentary democracy in our country. A timetable has also been made public. One could have expected that these developments, combined with the Turkish people's full confidence in the present government's promises, would have softened the worries which members of the Council of Europe have about the democratic process in Turkey."

[Question] How would the government react to steps to take Turkey to the human rights commission?

[Answer] We know that such a step would be within the framework of the statutes of the Council of Europe, but under the present circumstances such an initiative would have a clear political motivation. Even though we do not hope for very much, we expect the Norwegian Government to refrain from such a step. We think it ironic that Norway seems to be in the forefront of the nations which have adopted a less than friendly attitude to Turkey. The Norwegian Government has also damaged relations between our two countries in the cooperation on defense questions within the NATO framework to which we both belong.

So far Norway is the only country which has suspended the economic aid promised within the framework of the OECD. It is true that it is not a particularly significant sum (50 million kroner). And anyway we made it clear long ago that we would not accept economic aid dependent on political conditions. What shocked us was not so much the Norwegian decision as the way in which it was made public. What did the damage here was the way Norway "marketed" its decision. This shows how strongly the Norwegian Government's actions are motivated by internal political considerations. No other country reached such a striking decision, and this is not the only way in which Norway has distinguished itself. [answer ends]

Foreign Minister Turkmen is here referring to the fact that the Norwegian Government halted the supply of 32 outdated antiaircraft guns, and he stressed: "This happened despite existing agreements between the two countries and despite the fact that a Turkish ship was already in a Norwegian port ready to load the equipment."

[Question] An important reason for the reactions is because the process to reintroduce democracy is going slowly. The contents of the Constitution now being worked on are also being questioned.

[Answer] As yet we have no new Constitution, and it is already being criticized. I think this is highly irrational. As I have said on many other occasions, the roots of democracy are stronger in Turkey than they are in some of the countries whose leaders are today criticizing Turkey. I have no doubt that the Constitution which will be presented for approval in a referendum will contain all the principles in the statutes of the Council of Europe.

It is possible to discuss whether it was the Constitution which was bad or whether it was the political traditions. But quite definitely the constitution did have shortcomings. A good example is that it did not contain any regulations about the dissolution of the National Assembly in a political crisis situation. Of course this helped to worsen and lengthen every political crisis. The system meant that small extremist parties could win tremendous influence because they were able to sell their votes to the large parties. The situation before the military takeover was that the parliament had been unable to elect a new president for 7 months and had not passed a new law for 1 year. The government was so taken up with its efforts to survive that it was neither willing nor able to tackle the country's serious problems. In particular it was unable to combat terrorism.

[Question] Could the Constitution not be changed without the process taking such a long time?

[Answer] It could not happen without a military takeover for, as I have said, the situation in parliament was completely deadlocked. It was unable to pass a single law, and it would have been even less able to alter the Constitution. What is happening now is that the Constitution is being changed. We will have not a revolutionary constitution but an evolutionary constitution.

[Question] With Decree 52 the military authorities have put an end to all public debate about the Constitution. Would it not be correct to suspend this decree as soon as possible and open the doors for an open debate?

[Answer] I have no idea when this decree will be suspended, but I would remind you that the government is committed to submitting the proposal to a free rerefendum and to allowing political activity to resume as soon as the necessary laws affecting political parties and the electoral system have been passed.

[Question] Will this mean the exclusion of the men who were the country's leading politicians in the past?

[Answer] This will be decided by the Constitution. Our head of state (Gen Kenan Evren) has said that in his opinion these politicians should be excluded from political life for a certain period.

[Question] But extremist political parties will be forbidden.

[Answer] This is something else that we will only know when we see the draft constitution. But of course when we look at the sufferings Turkey has undergone because of extremism and extremist parties it would be natural to try to find a method which would prevent a recurrence.

[Question] Criticism has been voiced -- in Turkey too -- that the present regime is passing laws which could have a binding effect on the Consultative Assembly now meeting to work out a draft constitution.

[Answer] None of these laws will be permanent. There is no proof that they conflict with the principles in a democratic constitution, but if they do, there are no laws which cannot be changed.

[Question] Can we expect to see the Turkish trade unions have their bargaining rights returned?

[Answer] Naturally. And besides the Turkish trade unions have not been dissolved. Two unions have been suspended -- not because of their trade union activities, but because they were engaging in political activities contrary to the law. I would like to add that the so-called DISK trial has just begun. What surprises us is that certain sections of the European mass media are writing as if this trial were already over and the sentence passed.

PLANNED AEGEAN OIL SEARCH BY GREECE PROTESTED

NC240819 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 21 Feb 82 pp 1, 14

[Nur Batur report]

[Excerpt] Ankara -- Greece has been told that its intention to begin prospecting for oil in the Aegean, where the continental shelf has been disputed, would be a violation of the Bern agreement. According to well-informed sources, following Greece's announcement that the Greek Government has granted permission to a group of foreign oil companies to search for oil east of Thasos, Turkey has made representations to the Greek Foreign Ministry. In these representations, which were made in Athens, the Greek Government has been asked to say whether or not it recognizes the Bern agreement between Turkey and Greece of 1976 which stipulates that both sides should stop searching for oil until the continental shelf dispute is resolved.

In the representation it was noted that Turkey is determined to protect its rights and interests in the Aegean continental shelf. The Greek Foreign Ministry was also told that if Greece does not recognize the Bern agreement, then Turkey too has a right to prospect for oil in the Aegean. Moreover, Turkey once again stressed its view that the continental shelf issue should be resolved through negotiations.

On the other hand, the Hora, the seismic research ship undergoing maintenance and repairs at the Istinye dockyard in Istanbul, is now reported to be ready. Following evaluations made in Ankara last week, it has been decided that if Greece violates the Bern agreement and begins to search for oil in the Aegean, the Hora too will begin searching for oil. But at this stage, Ankara expects to hear from Greece first.

EVREN DEPARTS ON OFFICIAL VISIT TO BULGARIA

TA241048 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Head of state Gen Kenan Evren left Turkey today by air at 1030 for an official visit to Bulgaria as the guest of Bulgarian State Council Chairman Todor Zhivkov. In a written statement prior to his departure, General Evren said his visit was the expression of Turkey's desire to maintain good relations with its neighbors as well as all other countries.

General Evren's statement is as follows: I will pay an official 4-day visit to Bulgaria to return an official visit made by Bulgarian State Council Chairman Todor Zhivkov to Turkey 3-6 June 1976. This visit is an expression of Turkey's desire to maintain good relations with its neighbors as well as all other countries. It constitutes the first official visit ever paid by a Turkish head of state to Bulgaria. On this occasion, together with the Bulgarian State Council Chairman, we will conduct an exchange of views in a bid to reach concrete results that I am sure will be to the benefit of both countries. It is my conviction that our developing friendly and neighborly relations will be further enhanced through constructive, concrete and beneficial results to be reached in such visits. It is with these thoughts and feelings that I am departing for this visit.

General Evren was seen off with a military ceremony at Esenboga Airport. National Security Council members and Ground Forces Commander Nurettin Ersin, Air Force Commander Tashsin Sahinkaya, Naval Commander Nejat Tumer and Gendarme Commander Sedat Gelasun, as well as Consultative Assembly Speaker Sadi Irmak, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, some members of the Council of Ministers, military commanders and high government officials were present at the ceremony. Following the ceremony, General Evren and the delegation accompanying him left for Sofia on a special flight.

On his arrival at Sofia, General Evren was met by Chairman Zhivkov in a ceremony. Sofia Mayor (Meduresky) met General Evren at the Eagle Bridge at the entrance of the city and presented him with the capital city's golden emblem. Today General Evren will lay a wreath at the monument of the unknown soldier, and then official talks between Turkey and Bulgaria will begin. Bilateral relations and international issues will be taken up during the talks. The promotion of commercial and economic relations between the two countries will also be discussed. Evren will also tour installations in Sofia, Varna and their vicinity. Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen is accompanying General Evren.

General Evren and his delegation will return to Turkey on 27 February

LIQUIDATION BEGINS OF POLITICAL PARTY ASSETS

NC231935 Paris AFP in English 1910 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 23 Feb (AFP) -- Liquidation of assets of Turkish political parties, which were dissolved by the ruling National Security Council last October, began today, official sources announced. The seal on the Justice Party (JP-conservative) building was broken by a team composed of martial [words indistinct] members to begin evaluation work.

Meanwhile, a meeting was held between the board members and care-takers for the Republican People's Party (RPP-social democrat) for preliminary steps. Buildings of the JP and RPP will be turned over to the recently established "Higher Education Board," reliable sources here reported.

TURKMEN MEETS VISITING IRANIAN COUNTERPART

TA231632 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1610 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 23 Feb (AA) -- Iranian Foreign Minister 'Ali Akbar Velayeti had an hour-long tete-a-tete with Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen at Ankara's Esenboga Airport during the former's return flight from visits to Libya and Algeria.

In addition to discussing bilateral relations, regional developments and world affairs in general with his Iranian colleague, Foreign Ministry sources said, Turkmen seconded his government's request for the extradition of terrorist Isa Armagan, reportedly released after his recent arrest in Iran. Velayeti, who left Ankara shortly after noon Tuesday, promised to inquire into the Armagan case personally, the same sources said.

VAN DER STOEL DISCUSSES SOUTH AFRICAN MEASURES

[Excerpts] The Hague, 11 Feb -- The government will begin talks with Netherlands industry and commerce on economic sanctions against South Africa on a voluntary basis, against the background of an eventual statutory foundation for boycott measures.

Foreign Minister van der Stoel informed the Second Chamber in the debate on the Foreign Ministry's budget yesterday that what he meant by a voluntary boycott was the halting of exports of oil and oil products from The Netherlands to South Africa, a halt to imports from South Africa to The Netherlands, and a halt to investments in South Africa.

Van der Stoel said that he saw no signs of improvement in developments in Poland. The Solidarity Trade Union is being systematically broken up.

In its contacts with the Soviet Union -- especially bilateral contacts -- the Netherlands Government will observe a certain reserve and will also toughen the so-called COCOM list (with its restrictions on the export of certain strategic goods to the Soviet Union).

Van der Stoel said that he was sorry that he had to take the view that the question of whether The Netherlands should offer financial aid after the resumption of the liberalization process in Poland was purely an academic question.

As expected, a motion about Poland was tabled by Second Chamber Member Scholten (Christian Democratic Appeal) on behalf of all parties, with the exception of the Communist Party of The Netherlands. The motion condemns the Russian interference in Poland, supports the Netherlands Government's policy -- no economic aid until such time as the situation has returned to normal, but a continuation of humanitarian help -- and urges the continuation of arms limitation talks between East and West.

BLACK LEADER CALLS SANCTIONS 'COUNTERPRODUCTIVE'

PM231045 Paris LE MONDE in French 21-22 Feb 82 p 3

[Text] International sanctions against South Africa would hit blacks in particular and change nothing in that country's political situation, Mr David Thebehali, black mayor of Soweto -- the African satellite township of Johannesburg -- stated Friday, 19 February, in Paris. "Sanctions are a major issue in Europe, to such an extent that people believe that is what our people want," he said. "However, a boycott will bring about no change in South Africa. The reverse is true," added Mr Thebehali, who believes that it is economic expansion which will bring about a structural change. The mayor, who is touring Europe to give information about the situation in South Africa, was anxious to dispel the "bad publicity" about his township: "There are no shantytowns in Soweto," he said, stating that the township, where 1.5 million people live, has 350 schools.

MINISTER CLAIMS EEC AT 'LIMIT' ON UK REPAYMENTS

PM231237 Paris LE MONDE in French 20 Feb 82 p 30

["M.D." report: "It Would Be Better To Start Afresh With Six Members"]

[Text] "If everybody wants to bend the community to his view of it, it would be better to start afresh with six members," European Affairs Minister Chandernagor told the French diplomatic press on Thursday 18 February.

The minister was answering a question on Spain's membership, but he had just stated, "We do not want to find ourselves in the same situation as the one created by previous expansions," with "Britain, which feels ill-at-ease and wants to change the community," and Greece, which wants "special status." We have had our fingers burned twice; we do not want that to happen a third and fourth time."

Recalling that next month will see the 25th anniversary of the Treaty of Rome, which has "undoubtedly made some contribution" to the prosperity experienced by a Europe which emerged from the war drained and bankrupt, Mr Chandernagor continued: "Why must that celebration be tainted with bitterness?

"We are in a blind alley and are probably on the eve of a crisis whose seriousness nobody underestimates. However, we feel that if Europe did not exist it would be necessary to invent it. Just as we would not have been able to overcome our difficulties following 1945 without a European Community, we feel that the great challenge of next century... can only be met with a great degree of common ground. If there is no longer a community there will not be a Europe which is sure of itself and we will have lost the game for a long time, since the world's axis is in danger of shifting from the Atlantic to the Pacific.... We are capable of meeting the challenge provided [apparent line drop].

Mr Chandernagor expressed the view that Britain's partners had been very "kind" to it, although it refused to allow "any kind of decreasing scale" to be introduced into the repayments it is demanding. "We have gone to the furthest limit of what we can do," he said. Referring to a Europe -- whose budget would be kept within the present limits -- expanded to "new areas of poverty," with transfers of funds among rich countries, Mr Chandernagor added: "That is taking people for fools. Clearly that would no longer be a community. It would merely be a free trade area. If that is what the community is, there was no point in joining. Britain should have remained in the free trade zone in which it was. A choice will have to be made."

However, the minister thinks that European "attraction" will be exerted on Britain, whose trade is increasingly oriented toward the continent. "We think," Mr Chandernagor said, "that there will be a strong enough reflex for Europe to start afresh on its origianl bases, which are the only ones which really offer it a future."

"Nowhere do the treaties say," Mr Chandernagor also said, "that the sum of a check repaying money to Britain must be fixed before April or May," and it has already received the 1982 check. "But the prices must be fixed before the agricultural season. We are going to see whether the rest of the community has to jump to attention or fall flat just because Britain sneezes."

Finally, Mr Chandernagor said that European policy has been the subject of some cooperation between the government and the opposition. In Strasbourg on Wednesday he received more opposition deputies than majority deputies. "I found major areas of agreement on the essential issues," he said.

ALL-AUSTRIA PEACE MARCH PLANNED FOR 15 MAY

AU231140 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 23 Feb 82 p 3

[Text] Vienna (AZ) -- Under the motto "To Prevent Nuclear War -- To Disarm" an all-Austria peace march will be held in Vienna on Saturday, 15 May. The platform for this event was worked out at several meetings by more than 100 representatives of groups from the entire political, religious and trade union sphere as well as regional and supra-regional peace initiatives. To date, more than 30 organizations have declared their support for the planned event.

CRITICISM PROMPTS VIETNAM TO QUESTION NEUTRALITY

AU231144 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 23 Feb 82 p 3

[Text] Geneva (APA) -- Austria's latest criticism of the violation of human rights in Kampuchea has induced the Vietnamese delegation at the Geneva UN Human Rights Commission to call Austria's neutrality in question.

The fact that Austria, in line with the declaration of the International Kampuchea Conference (chaired by Foreign Minister Pahr), supports the draft resolution of the ASEAN states (which calls for the withdrawal of the Vietnamese troops and for free elections in Kampuchea) was described by the Vietnamese delegate as two-facedness.

At the beginning of the week the Vietnamese delegate posed the question whether Austria was "not merely 'neutral' in quotation marks." He also charged Austria with having constantly maintained good relations with the American imperialist aggressors during the Vietnamese freedom struggle.

Austria's delegate Walter Howadt declared that he could well understand the sharp reaction by the Vietnamese delegation. Certainly it is not pleasant to be criticized by a neutral country, he said, a country which "cannot be simply classed with any of the cliches of international politics." The statements by such a country just carry more weight, Howadt added. As far as the question of neutrality is concerned, the Austrian delegate stressed that there could not be any neutrality in the sphere of human rights.

In his speech at the commission's plenary session, Howadt had earlier condemned the Vietnamese presence in Kampuchea as a violation of international law, but at the same time he had pilloried the severe crimes of the former Pol Pot regime against the Kampuchean people.

OPPOSITION TO GOVERNMENT ANTI-AMERICANISM NOTED

[Ruth Pauli article: "Spokesman of Anti-Americanism? Criticism of Socialist Foreign Policy From Their Own Ranks"]

[Summary] Vienna -- "'Ludwig Steiner, foreign policy spokesman of the Austrian People's Party [OEVP], suggests that the Austrian Federal Government allows itself to be turned into an auxiliary propaganda arm of one side -- this can only possibly refer to the Soviet Union.' It is with this sentence that Heinz Fischer, Socialist Party [SPOE] floor leader, has outlined the criticism of his party's foreign policy line which particularly in the past few weeks has reflected especially strongly some sort of anti-Americanism. Fischer's counterargument, intended as a refutation (that Austria's voting attitude at the United Nations clearly converges with that of the other neutral and North European states, misses the leveled charges."

The trip to Moscow by Walter Hacker, international secretary of the SPOE, who had earlier been criticized for excessive friendliness to Soviet attitudes, has elicited feelings of disapproval even within the Socialist International.

Statements by SPOE figures, which sounded like "formulations from a communist newspaper" to OEVP foreign policy expert Andreas Khol, have failed to elicit among the ruling party "any reservations because of Poland." SPOE Chairman Karl Blecha has explained that "It is certain that we shall continue our autonomous policy and shall not arrange ourselves according to the signs fixed by another government."

But support for the anti-American foreign policy line within the SPOE has for a long time been less uniform than Blecha is suggesting. "More and more dissatisfied voices of those who do not want to join in treading the vigorously embarked upon 'third road' are sounding from the SPOE presidium. More and more pragmatists are not at all agreed on the possible consequences if attempts at an autonomous course between the two big powers, the United States and the USSR, in practice turn out in favor of the Eastern bloc states. The excessively long digressions by Kreisky at the presidium sessions are arising distrust above all in the trade union wing where people would rather have that same vigor applied to Austrian problems." But the anti-Americanism at the party's top has had effects, watered down in a rather peculiar manner, on the attitude of the lower party ranks.

Even the Austrian radio and television service has suffered from the dutiful execution of the will of the top leadership. In January when the relaying of the Hollywood spectacular staged by the Reagan administration, "Let Poland Be Poland," was being discussed it required hours of debates, persuasion and calming to finally transmit a half-hour summary in a late evening program, something that pleased no one.

"The obstacles erected by zealous SPOE trustees have remained hidden to the people, as have the chancellor's attacks on Ronald Reagan. The fact that Kreisky dismissed the U.S. President as a hypocrite and branded him as almost solely responsible for the bankruptcies of Austrian companies and for joblessness has been moved into the background because of the criticism of the Catholic Church of Poland and the subsequent conflict between Austrian bishops and the head of government."

Public opinion research has also confirmed that the government's anti-Americanism is not reflected in public consciousness. People are still convinced that it is the United States that protects the security of the Western World.

BRIEFS

OIL, GAS PRODUCTION -- As compared with 1980, Austrian domestic oil production in 1981 declined 9.3 percent to 1.34 million tons, and natural gas production 22.8 percent to 1.47 billion cubic meters. The nationalized Austrian Oil Administration [OEMV] turned out 1 million tons of oil, 11.8 percent less than in 1980, and 896 million cubic meters of natural gas, 27 percent less than in 1980. The Mobil Oil-affiliated Rag company which is operating mostly in Upper Austria turned out 297,000 tons of oil, 1.6 percent less than in 1980, and 573 million cubic meters of natural gas, 15 percent less than in 1980. The second private oil company operating in Austria, Van Sickle, increased oil production by 9.9 percent to 26,000 tons and natural gas production by 19.5 percent to 643,000 cubic meters. WEHNER BRIEFS SCHMIDT ON VISIT TO POLAND

LD241142 Hamburg DPA in German 1124 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 24 Feb (DPA) -- Chairman of the SPD Parliamentary Group Herbert Wehner briefed Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt during an approximately 1-hour meeting in Bonn today on the results of his 4 days of political talks in Warsaw. Nothing has yet been made known about the contents of these talks.

The chancellor afterwards flew to Paris for 2 days of German-French consultations. One of the topics to be discussed there is the situation in Poland.

Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher had earlier advised critics of Wehner's visit to Poland in an interview with West German radio to show "more composure." According to the radio station, Genscher said he had already received a report from the German Embassy in Warsaw on Wehner's visit to Poland.

Schmidt: 'Valuable Supplement'

LD241510 Hamburg DPA in German 1444 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 24 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt regards his briefing by SPD Parliamentary Group leader Herbert Wehner on the latter's recent trip to Poland as a "valuable supplement" to the Federal Government's picture of the situation in Poland. This was stated by Deputy Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl to newsmen in Bonn today following the 1-hour meeting between the chancellor and Wehner. Ruehl gave no details of the meeting.

In a lengthy series of questions and answers, Ruehl avoided making a preliminary assessment of the information conveyed to the chancellor by Wehner. Ruehl rejected as a "suggestive question" the view that saying that the briefing was "valuable supplement" to the Federal Government's picture of Poland to date meant, in effect, that Wehner had gained no real new information.

Wehner Says Talks 'Impressive'

LD241342 Hamburg DPA in German 1310 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 24 Feb (DPA) -- Chairman of the SPD Bundestag Parliamentary Group Herbert Wehner held "very impressive" talks during his 4-day visit to Poland. This was learned from Wehner's first public statement after his return to Bonn.

In an article for the HARBURGER ANZEIGEN UND NACHRICHTEN (Thursday's edition), which appears in his own constituency, Wehner stressed that all those he talked to had, with "impressive earnestness", expressed the fact that the people of Poland need raw materials and the bases for economic development in order to meet the needs of the entire Polish people. "Sanctions" against Poland are regarded with the greatest concern.

His impressions of the explanation and statements by his Polish partners in the talks have been "filed in my memory as carefully as is humanly possible," said Wehner. In this respect, he is "aware that I by no means comprehend everything." He wishes, however, to relay to the Federal Government his impressions from the talks in Warsaw and in this way to "help make" his contribution useful to the Federal Government in assessing and evaluating the developments in Warsaw.

Paper Doubts Private Nature

DW241510 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 24 Feb 82 p 4

[Commentary signed Schr.: "Waiting for Wehner"]

[Text] Herbert Wehner loves secret diplomacy and the lecturing of journalists. Had his trip to Warsaw served merely humanitarian purposes then such behavior would be quite understandable. There are many indications, however, that the chairman of the SPD Bundestag faction this time was pursuing political goals. In such a case, excessive secret-mongering can only be harmful because it might trigger wrong impressions in the public. This is why Wehner himself must inform the public quickly and extensively on what he has learned and achieved in Warsaw.

But already now a number of questions exist. Clarification is desired on whether Wehner had known that the Poles would issue a communique after his departure -- an action as extraordinary after a "private visit" as the placing of a Pullman car at his disposal for his journey home -- and on whether the content of the communique had been discussed with him. Some of its formulations are so ambitious the question of his approval poses itself. One gets the impression from the statement that the Polish leadership was not acting under Soviet pressure, that normalization of German-Polish relations was not affected by the events in Poland, that sanctions must be ruled out in the future, and that "stabilization" might be endangered through pressure and interference.

Judging by the formulations something could be directed against Moscow as well; but the Poles apparently see it differently. This apprehension suggests itself even more since after Wehner's departure a campaign against Walesa was started, the end of "Solidarity" was ushered in officially, the ties to Moscow were stressed and the trials of opponents of the regime were expedited. The Poles thereby, too, have raised the question about the value of Wehner's visit. Did he succeed -- in the event that it was his intention -- in making it plain to Warsaw that any aggravation of the situation was bound to have international repercussions?

LORD CARRINGTON ADDRESSES HAMBURG BANQUET

LD232204 Hamburg DPA in German 1651 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Hamburg, 23 Feb (DPA) -- According to British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, the Federal Republic has for a considerable time been no longer a political dwarf, but "has become a pillar of European security." Speaking to some 300 guests at a civic dinner in the Hamburg Town Hall today, he said that without the resources and the strength of will of the Federal Republic NATO would not be in a position to defend Europe. "But Germany's strength is also linked with its wise state leadership. In its firm position in the Western camp, the Federal Republic is at the same time aware in a unique way of the expression "Central Europe," Carrington said, adding that Bonn also "speaks with credibility about East-West relations."

Carrington strongly urged a reform of the European Community, especially of its agricultural policy, and called for a fair distribution of costs within the EC. He pointed out that Britain and the Federal Republic are the only net contributors to the European Community. Britain intends to remain so, "although only to a very slight extent," even though the level of the country's prosperity is below the EC average.

Lord Carrington opposed the view that, with its EC policy, Britain is merely trying to impose its will or even to destroy the basis of the community. He summarized his commitment to Europe as follows: "We have, just like you, committed ourselves completely to the development of a strong and healthy community, for the sake both of its members and of the important contribution it must make to the creation of the secure and prosperous Europe which we are all striving for."

MITTERRAND ON FRG RELATIONS, OTHER TOPICS

DW241209 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2015 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Correspondent Peter Scholl-Latour interview with French President Francois Mitterrand in Paris; date not given; with superimposed German translation -- videotaped]

[Text] [Question] Mr President, before you assumed the office of president, it was occasionally said that you did not think much of Germany. Is this true and what is your approach to what may be rightly called in France the German uncertainties?

[Answer] Who said that?

[Question] It was said in the French, and sometimes also in the German, press.

[Answer] You have been poorly informed. I attended the first European Congress. I think it was in 1947, some 2 years after the war. I met with German representatives there. As I said, this meeting took place 2 years after the wounds from which we all suffered so much. The meeting took place in The Hague, I believe, and there was a second congress in Rome which I also attended. I had already made up my mind by then -- I had decided in favor of German-French reconciliation. Since then I have not been content just to wish for reconciliation and, fortunately, it has taken place. I hope that our ties will be strengthened and that we will follow a joint policy, if possible. This is what I am pursuing now.

[Question] Regarding the future of Germany, there is a certain pacifist trend in the air. You once mentioned the realities of peace and the illusions of pacifism, and there is also the neutralist aspect which you reject. On the other hand, there is the aspect of possible German reunification in the long run. What would your approach be with regard to such reunification developments? You have said, after all, that we must move away from Yalta.

[Answer] You are touching on a problem which -- if it comes up as you have formulated it -- will have to be dealt with by one of my successors. In any event, we must strive to reshape Europe. We cannot achieve this kind of Europe through tensions between the blocs, particularly since these two blocs have come about since the end of World War II on the basis of a balance of power which still exists. You can see that in Poland.

All European countries, and particularly those which are not big powers, must deal with this reality today. If Europe wants to some day have the instruments of independence, then a spiritual development is called for. The willpower of the West Europeans must be mobilized to stress their economic unity and a uniform political concept must be developed. Only in such a way will Europe be in a position to shape its future on its own. Such a development will naturally have considerable consequences for Germany.

Regarding the problem of reunification, I will not stand in the way of historical developments. I understand very well how a big nation such as yours wants to regain the unity to which it is entitled in so many ways. However, this historically based aspect is not in line with current realities. I believe, therefore, that we ought to approach other problems, and first try to deal with current international problems.

[Question] Do you, in the concrete case of Poland, see differences between the German and the French approaches?

[Answer] In this matter, as well as in all others, I had good contacts with Chancellor Schmidt. Due to the situations of our two countries and their history, there are certain differences, particularly regarding Poland. There is no need for me to outline this for you. There were, however, no significant differences of opinion on this special Polish situation. If there was something of the kind as a result of the initial shock, there has been a definite rapprochement in the meantime. In any event there was no German-French crisis.

[Question] In talks about European unity the military aspect is sometimes neglected. Shouldn't we aim for European defense autonomy within the Atlantic Alliance? Differences probably exist because France does not suffer from a nuclear complex as does the Federal Republic. Do you see a possibility to overcome these differences?

[Answer] Our individual situations are most different, but our will can be the same. We know the barriers obstructing the creation of European military unity today. However, this aspect should not be abandoned. We know the limitations, and if both of us are not in a similar strategic situation today, this is due to the consequences of World War II. However, as I just said, we should develop a common will to implement West European independence.

This cannot take place in opposition to the Atlantic Alliance to which we belong. Germany is a NATO member. We don't belong to this organization any more, but France is a part of the Atlantic Alliance. If we strive for greater European independence, it would not be in a conflict situation with regard to the Atlantic Alliance which guarantees our security.

On the other hand, we do not want to build up the increased unity of Western Europe as some sort of a vanguard position against the Eastern camp. I think that we cannot achieve anything positive by deepening the grave tension currently burdening the world, and particularly Europe.

[Question] Would France be involved directly, physically so to speak, if military complications were to develop on the borders of the Federal Republic?

[Answer] Naturally, naturally.

[Question] Remarkable continuity exists in German-French relations since General de Gaulle and even earlier, since Robert Schuman. Since then there were close relations between Chancellor Schmidt and President Giscard d'Estaing. Today they move along the same line. Do you think that in the event of a government change in Bonn there would also be close cooperation with a CDU chancellor?

[Answer] Regarding the first part of your question, I can only point out again my presence at the first and second European congresses. Reconciliation was under way then as well as the mutual recognition of each other by two European civilization forms, two cultures and two nations which had often misunderstood each other although they had so many reasons to be united. No problems exist in this respect.

Your additional question regarding a change of government in Bonn is rather superfluous. The answer is known. Would I negotiate with another German Government if the occasion arose? Certainly. France and Germany must build the bases of increasingly closer understanding. Governments pass, as you have seen in France. But policies must continue. In my capacity as President of the French Republic, I don't want to interfere in any way in German domestic policy. All I am saying is that the political and personal relations I have with the current German Government are good, and that I have found partners there with whom we Frenchmen get along well. I can only wish that all of France's partners moved along that line. It is none of my business to select a German leadership. That is up to the German people.

[Question] You are looking for a type of socialism in France which should not be in line with social democracy but which also rejects Marxism-Leninism. How do you define French socialism?

[Answer] There are many forms of socialism which have rejected Marxism-Leninism. There is Scandinavian socialism, which calls itself social democracy. There are all kinds of German socialism, which are also based on social democracy. Social democracy existed prior to the Russian revolution and Lenin.

There is also the British Labor Party and there is Yugoslav communism. As an extreme example although no real comparisons are possible, Russian communism must be also mentioned. In addition there are all those who believe in socialism in the Third World and who naturally cannot identify with European experiences.

Latin socialism, as expressed in Portugal, Spain and Italy, represents other categories. There is a socialist government in Greece today. Why shouldn't there also be French socialism? French socialism has come about and developed after an open breach in 1920. The old French section of the Workers International, which was a merger of various socialist trends prior to 1905, was deeply disturbed at that time by the appearance of the Third International. However, we socialists had a great tradition in France. In this century we can look back at the tradition of Jean Jaures and Leon Blum. They ruled for just a very short time. There was just one real socialist experiment in France -- the People's Front in 1936. Later there were just coalition governments where it was impossible to develop a socialist program.

Now, after World War II, we are making a second socialist attempt. This time the experiment is even more authentic because in 1981 the president of the French Republic emerged from the ranks of the socialists. The absolute majority in the national assembly is socialist. The French people have given us their confidence within the framework of the constitution, and we have a considerable time given us in advance: some 5 years of National Assembly majority and 7 years in office for the president of the republic -- if it is possible to make predictions at all. The actual length of time will be determined by the people if they again give us their confidence.

Today we are trying to do the following: We want to merge the fruits of our reflections -- we had a lot of time to reflect when we were not in power -- with those of experience. In this respect the experiences made in Scandinavia, Germany, England and particularly in Austria have been very useful for us. We have seen where successes have been achieved and we have observed the limits and even failures. We are now simply trying calmly, in all modesty and without claiming that we French socialists have discovered the philosophers' stone, to continue by learning from this experience. In doing this we have come to the conclusion that a socialist government with a lasting effect on events and people can develop only within the democratic framework. If the overall economic situation is to be changed, we must stay within this framework.

We have, therefore, challenged a system which long ago went beyond the limits of its effectiveness -- a sort of large-scale capitalism which has remained rather wild and which was spreading at the expense of medium- and small-scale capitalism with disregard for the demands for equality and social justice. At the same time we fully back freedom, individual as well as collective, and the liberties of social achievements. We feel committed to the victory of the human spirit over one's own production and even over science and technology. In short, we are deeply democratic to our very souls. We take pains to insure that the development of socialism, the socialism I have just broadly outlined, will respect the liberties and the rights of the individual. All social categories, all social strata must be respected in connection with what is indispensable for them, namely their right to free expression and their claim to defend their own interests according to the law.

In other countries -- such as yours also -- persistent Social Democrats have made great achievements. I believe that our socialism, with consideration of the French temperament, must do the following: Create a broad public economic sector which will permit us to plan and guide our economic development. On the other hand, we want to respect the private economic sector. We are not striving to collectivize enterprises -- that applies to all those areas where the significant interests of national life are not affected. Most of all, we will protect the liberties of our fellow citizens as if they were our dearest possession. That is our task, and especially mine.

[Question] Occasionally there has been talk of broad European social legislation despite all the differences in national temperaments. In Germany we do not think much of the dirigisme which has existed in France for a long time -- since Colbert. Is there a common denominator somewhere?

[Answer] Our temperaments and our traditions are different, as you say. This must be taken into consideration. I am not reaching for the moon but only for what is possible to achieve. However, if we are not able in the Europe of The Ten to develop even a minimum common policy to fight unemployment and inflation, if we do not support the rights of workers and their influence on public institutions as well as their right to codetermination, and if we do not offer career possibilities to the broad strata of people, we ought to be worried.

A dialogue in this respect is already under way, particularly with the Federal Republic which is governed by men who can give us valuable advice in many ways and whose personal as well as political actions are very much related to ours.

[Question] In Germany and elsewhere there is much talk about the fact that communist ministers are part of the French Government. Tensions certainly exist, particularly with regard to the Polish issue. Do you see the possibility of a breach, and don't you fear that the presence of communists in the government represents an insecurity factor for the Atlantic alliance?

[Answer] If I believed that, there would not be any communists in the government of the French Republic. The decision lies with the French people. Other countries have the right to assess and judge this, and to agree or disagree. But the decision belongs to us.

I wanted to gather all vital forces of my country. I tried to gather a broad strata from the people to bring about a political change. I have demonstrated that the French people can trust the socialists whom I represent. We demonstrated earlier that within the various leftist tendencies socialism can express itself in the name of the entire country. We won a victory.

We socialists have an absolute majority in the National Assembly. We can adopt bills without external help in the name of all who helped elect me as president of the republic. It is now my task and function to rally as many Frenchmen around me as possible. First those who support the aims of the left because this is my natural starting point. However, my wish goes further: I hope that increasing numbers of Frenchmen who have so far not belonged to the left will declare their solidarity with our action program. Our action is aimed at reactivating the forces within us, at greater freedom in the true and full meaning of the word. Our action is also aimed at a courageous policy with regard to relations with the Third World. As a consequence of this action, France should be even more proud of itself at international meetings.

I repeat: the French communists who voted for me in the second round of the presidential elections as well as the social strata they represent, by them have their place in the French government. However, as the president of the republic, I am responsible according to the constitution for defining the policy of France and particularly for making the major foreign policy decisions. The government I have appointed will implement this policy. The Atlantic alliance is one of the foundations of our international action.

The independence of French decisions in the military field, particularly regarding nuclear strategy, forms another basis of our international policy. Our options are known. We certainly want to maintain the dialogue as long as possible with our most important partners, and especially with the Soviet Union, and therefore we agree with the negotiations between the two superpowers in Geneva. However, we have also not abandoned anything regarding our principles. We will not accept anything that could be detrimental to the West with regard to the military balance.

From the very beginning, therefore, I have objected to the deployment of the Soviet SS-20 missiles and I will not accept the slightest weakness in the face of Soviet power. We respect the Soviet Union and we want it to respect us. We have learned during this century that there are ties between the Russian and the French people. We believe that peace is necessary not at any price, but at a high price. Major foreign policy decisions do not depend on this or that political or social group. I do not intend to yield to any forces other than the will of the French voters.

I am, therefore, absolutely reassured regarding France's foreign policy course no matter what the composition of the current government and the current parliamentary majority.

39TH FRENCH-GERMAN SUMMIT BEGINS IN PARIS

NC241402 Paris AFP in English 1351 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 24 Feb (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand and West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today began private talks marking the opening of the 39th bilateral summit here. The talks are expected to confirm the vital role of good relations between the two countries in European affairs.

Chancellor Schmidt was accompanied by five ministers when he met President Mitterrand on the lawn of the Elysee Palace before the private talks, which were to be followed by a luncheon with a restricted number of guests.

Two main subjects, described by both sides as "extremely important", were on the agenda. The first was relations between the United States and Europe. These have been upset by U.S. monetary policy, and by Washington's desire to push its European allies into taking economic sanctions against the Soviet Union because of martial law in Poland.

The second was the crisis within the European Economic Community concerning the annual round of farm price fixing talks, and the size of Britain's contribution to the community budget.

Mr Schmidt was due later to meet French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy. Meanwhile, the five German ministers were scheduled to hold talks with eight French ministers.

France Supports Dual Decision

LD242110 Hamburg DPA in German 2005 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 24 Feb (DPA) -- The French president, Francois Mitterrand, today supported Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Paris in his resolution to hold fast to the NATO dual decision on stationing medium-range missiles in Europe. According to this decision American Pershing-II missiles are to be stationed in West Europe if there is no firm agreement at the Geneva talks on the reduction of Soviet superiority in Europe by the middle of next year.

According to reports by the German delegation, this is one of the results of the first day of the 39th German-French summit in Paris, which is to end tomorrow (Thursday) with a joint statement on East-West policy, Europe and EEC-U.S. relations. During the afternoon, Federal Chancellor Schmidt, answering a question on whether the summit is intended to send political signals to East and West, said: "signals in all directions."

Both sides emphasized the excellent, open and trusting climate of the talks between Mitterrand and Schmidt, which are intended to further strengthen German-French connections. The announcement that Schmidt and Mitterrand intended in future to telephone one another, with the help of interpreters, is assessed in Paris as an outward sign of the return to the close and direct talks which existed up to the start of Mitterrand's term of office.

Schmidt also discussed with Mitterrand the economic problems resulting from the American high interest rate policy for Europe, and later, for 3 hours, with Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy. But no agreement has yet been reached as to how European dependance on the the high interest rates and the great fluctuations in the dollar could be reduced.

The chancellor discussed with Mauroy the different developments on the employment market. He acquainted himself with the reduction of the working week in France to 39 hours. The two politicians also discussed a plan to introduce the 260-kilometer per hour French high-speed train on the Paris-Cologne route.

'Agreement' on Economy

LD251340 Hamburg DPA in German 1217 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 25 Feb (DPA) -- The Federal Republic and France have established that there is extensive agreement between them on economic questions. This was stated in Paris today following a talk between French and German Government members at the office of Premier Pierre Mauroy on the 2d day of the 39th French-German summit meeting. According to this information there is "increasingly clear agreement" on the assessment of the economic situation in Europe and the two countries.

Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer and Otto Schlecht, state secretary in the Economics Ministry, agreed with Mauroy and with Minister of Economy and Finance Jacques Delors, and Laurent Fabius, minister delegate to the minister of economy and finance, on the need for a French-German understanding as the basis for European cooperation.

In their opinion, both countries must exert a decisive influence on the revival of the European Community with joint monetary, technical and financial initiatives, while also countering American economic policy and high interest rate policy. Mauroy condemned the protectionist efforts of the U.S. and Japan in world trade and urged as a reply a joint European policy that shows "more cohesion and strength" externally. The French Government members welcomed a Federal Government policy directed at an economic upturn, which has, however, lagged behind the French efforts for economic revival, so far.

Action on U.S. Money Policy

NC251425 Paris AFP in English 1420 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 25 Feb (AFP) -- France and West Germany have decided to "take initiatives" in the face of the United States' policy of high interest rates, French President Francois Mitterrand said today at the end of a two-day bilateral summit. These initiatives will be discussed and agreed in detail in the near future, Mr Mitterrand said, adding that they would then be put to other members of the European Economic Community (EEC).

The French president also said that he will visit Bonn on June 9 before a summit of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO). Observers said this might give Mr Mitterrand the opportunity to meet U.S. President Ronald Reagan in Bonn.

A joint statement issued after the 39th bilateral summit said the two sides consider "the repressive measures taken by the Polish leadership under pressure from, and with the backing of the Soviet Union, as a violation of human rights and of the Final Act of Helsinki".

The statement also said that the measures in Poland were "a heavy handicap weighing on East-West relations".

The two leaders added that "the political behaviour of the Soviet Union and Poland cannot continue without repercussions on their overall relations with the two countries".

They called for closer co-operation between Europe and the United States, and said that it was vital to tighten links between the U.S. and other members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO). The two men also decided that their two countries should "tighten further their co-operation over foreign policy...and that in-depth exchanges of views would be held on problems of security".

They "decided to develop Europe's weight in the world", the statement said, adding that this meant the community must resolve without delay the problems hindering its operation and development. This should be done in a spirit of solidarity which went beyond the national interests of each member country.

On East-West relations, they said they were convinced that favourable development could be achieved "only on the basis of a solidly established balance of forces". They added that they were opposed to any transfer of the East-West conflict into the arena of the North-South dialogue involving the Third World.

MINISTRY ISSUES STATEMENT ON CHAD POLICY

PM241345 Paris LE MONDE in French 20 Feb 82 p 4

[Text] With regard to the suspension of French arms sales to Ndjamena (LE MONDE 19 February), the Quai d'Orsay stated late in the afternoon of Thursday 18 February: "authoritative circles point out that no official French source gave such information." The External Relations Ministry communique adds: "The same circles add that, as regards France's attitude toward Chad, the government made its viewpoint known in the External Relations Ministry spokesman's statement made on 17 February in reply to questions."

In the statement in question, the French Government had, in particular, "expressed its concern to increase its efforts to help rebuild the country through active technical cooperation with the Chadian authorities." (Our information, which AFP also attributed to an official source, is in no way invalidated by this clarification -- LE MONDE note)

CHILEAN ENVOY RECALLED FOR ANTICOMMUNIST REMARKS

NC231607 Paris AFP in English 1329 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 23 Feb (AFP) -- The French ambassador to Chile, Leon Bouvier, has been summoned to Paris for consultations after derogatory statements about Cuba and about French communism were attributed to him in a Santiago magazine.

Mr Bouvier, who was appointed to Santiago in December, was quoted in COSAS magazine as saying that "Cuba is the least free country in Latin America".

He was also quoted as telling the magazine that though he respected the beliefs of French communists -- who hold four portfolios in the French Socialist Government -- "It would be a difficult choice the day they had to choose between the Soviet Union and France".

SANCTIONS AGAINST POLAND, USSR BEING CONSIDERED

LD242216 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Speaking in Rome today, Portuguese Foreign Minister Andre Goncalves Pereira admitted that the Portuguese Government might announce this Friday a series of sanctions against Poland and the USSR. This was disclosed by Goncalves Pereira at the end of a meeting with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo before leaving for The Hague.

During the meeting, the two sides touched upon the aforementioned sanctions which Portugal is to adopt as a NATO member in protest against the present situation in Poland, following the crushing of the Solidarity movement.

Regarding the sanctions to be applied by Portugal, Goncalves Pereira merely said that they will be reduced scope in the economic sphere because Portugal is not in a position to adopt a strong stance in this field.

This afternoon, we managed to establish that the Portuguese sanctions are currently being finalized and that they are to be publicly announced by the appropriate channels of the Portuguese Foreign Ministry.

APPLICATION TO JOIN EEC PROGRESSING WELL

LD231506 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Remarks by Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao at Lisbon airport on 23 February prior to his departure for Italy and The Netherlands -- recorded]

[Text] This trip to Italy and The Netherlands is in the framework of visits which I feel I should pay to the EEC member-countries in order to convey directly to their heads of government and ministers for foreign affairs our political commitment to Portugal's forthcoming entry into the community and, at the same time, to raise matters that directly concern us in the context of the present negotiations as well as bilateral issues which invariably arise -- although in the specific cases of Italy and The Netherlands they are of minor importance -- and which must therefore be discussed.

I am starting this trip secure in the knowledge that the first set of dossiers pertaining to our membership application was successfully negotiated in Brussels yesterday. As you know, at our Brussels meeting with the EEC we agreed upon a certain timetable for the various dossiers to be negotiated in a series of packages, so to speak. The first of these packages was negotiated yesterday, with virtually definitive solutions having been agreed for its five dossiers. The next negotiations on a package of five or six dossiers -- the exact number will be agreed in the meantime at a lower level -- have already been scheduled for June. If we keep to this schedule, the timetable which will end with a third ministerial meeting in October, will be fulfilled, and this will enable us to reach an agreement with the community by the end of the year.

FORMAL NEGOTIATIONS ON USSR GAS DEAL PLANNED

LD241432 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1400 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] The Soviet Union has approved the Spanish proposal to begin talks on the purchase of Siberian gas by the national gas company Enagas. The newspaper EL PAIS confirmed this yesterday, quoting reliable sources. Formal negotiations are expected to begin in April. The Soviet reply accepts the Spanish proposal, pending the fixing of a timetable for the talks. It has also been said by reliable sources that Spain is presently considering a concrete offer to be made to the Soviet Union when the negotiations begin in April.

MOROCCO'S KING HASSAN II ARRIVES FOR TALKS

LD242322 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Shortly after 1800 the Moroccan Jumbo 747 carrying King Hassan II of Morocco touched down at San Juan airbase. Accompanying the Moroccan king are his brother, Moulay Abdallah, his son, Sidi Mohamed, Foreign Minister Mohamed Boucetta and a team of advisers. The visit is taking place at the request of the Moroccan monarch.

At the moment both heads of state are meeting in the Marivent Palace accompanied by Spanish Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca, who arrived back from Budapest tonight, and the Moroccan foreign minister Boucetta. There has been no information on the subject of the talks. In principle, it is scheduled for King Hassan II to extend his stay in Palma to Friday when he will return to Rabat and not travel to the United States as was thought.

DEFENSE ATTORNEYS REFUSE TO ATTEND COUP TRIAL

NC231219 Paris AFP in English 1126 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Madrid, 23 Feb (AFP) -- Defence attorneys in the trial arising from last year's attempted military coup in Spain today refused to attend court because of the publication of a newspaper article deemed damaging to their clients.

The lawyers were angry with an interview with an unidentified military police officer in today's DIARIO 16 newspaper saying one of the accused allegedly threatened to shoot his men if they refused to take over the parliament during the attempted putsch a year ago today.

Thirty-two people are on trial before a military court here for alleged involvement in the coup attempt.

NATIONAL POLICE REPORT DISTURBANCES IN MADRID

LD240220 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0100 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] The national police this evening arrested nine people in the course of disturbances in different parts of Madrid. Two of the arrests were made in the Glorieta de Quevedo Square, where a gasoline bomb was thrown at a vehicle, and the rest were made in the vicinity of the Palace Hotel [adjacent to the parliament building] and on Mejia Lequerica Street, two areas where a number of incidents occurred.

SPOKESMAN DECLINES COMMENT ON BRANDT MEDIATION

NC241844 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Asked if press reports that Social Democratic Party leader Brandt is to be a mediator in the Cyprus problem, the government spokesman said that at this stage he does not wish to comment on that question.

LONDON ARABIC WEEKLY INTERVIEWS KIPRIANOU

PM241255 London AL-MAJALLAH in Arabic 20-26 Feb 82 pp 39-41

["Exclusive" interview with President Kiprianou in Athens; date not given]

[Excerpt] [Question] Greek Prime Minister Papandreou says the Cyprus problem concerns two states, Turkey and Cyprus, and that Cyprus should talk to Turkey to settle the issue. Would you agree to direct negotiations with Ankara?

[Answer] We have always felt there should be a dialogue between Nicosia and Ankara apart from the international efforts. Surely it is logical and right for Cyprus to hold talks with its adversary. Yes, we feel we should welcome such a thing. I am prepared to hold direct negotiations with the Turks. Turkish governments have, for various reasons, so far rejected this course.

[Question] Would you regard it as a positive move if Athens were to hold direct negotiations with the Turkish Cypriot community?

[Answer] No. That is a completely different matter. Cyprus is an independent state and a UN member. Greece provides support for our efforts, but the dispute is not between Greece and Turkey or between Greece and the Turkish Cypriots; it is a dispute between Cyprus and Turkey, and so there is no room for negotiations on this matter between the Greek Government and Ankara or between the Greek Government and the Turkish Cypriots.

[Question] Turkey and Britain are guarantor states for Cyprus. Why shouldn't representatives from these two states participate in the negotiations?

[Answer] The first reason is that one of these two states, Turkey, has invaded Cyprus and still controls a large part of the island. As for the second guarantor state, Britain, it has no desire to take any initiative or step in that direction. In fact I do not hesitate to say that Britain has not honored its commitments and undertakings as a guarantor state. When Greece speaks as a guarantor state, it is actually trying to restore the people's rights and safeguard Cyprus' existence as a fully independent state. It is quite clear that the Greek efforts are peaceful, and there is no possibility of a military adventure by Greece.

[Question] You don't believe Britain is interested in a settlement of the Cyprus problem?

[Answer] I certainly do. Britain could play an important part, but so far it has been unwilling to do so.

[Question] You have said that a settlement in Cyprus should include demilitarization of the island. Britain has two military bases in Cyprus. Do you mean demilitarization of these two areas as well?

[Answer] The bases of other states do not fall within the framework of the present conflict between Turkey and Cyprus. They are a completely different matter. We advocate the demilitarization of the Republic of Cyprus (the two bases are part of areas under British sovereignty). However, it would be in everyone's interest if all Cyprus became a demilitarized zone because of its location in this sensitive part of the world.

[Question] Do the two bases constitute an obstacle in the way of a settlement?

[Answer] I don't believe so. Britain has always said it will not hesitate to hand over the two bases if the Cyprus problem is solved, but I don't know whether the British really mean it or not. Anyway, this is a problem between the Cyprus Government and the British Government. It will be discussed at a later stage.

[Question] Could you sum up the results of your talks with Prime Minister Papandreou?

[Answer] We have agreed to continue with the dialogue to the maximum limit possible and see what results emerge. We also agreed to take the Cyprus question to the UN General Assembly, and probably to the UN Security Council, if there is no progress. It has also been agreed that the Governments of Greece and Cyprus will seek to convince other governments that they should bring their influence to bear on Turkey to change its position. Greece will do this within the context of its general foreign policy, which gives Cyprus top priority. It will especially approach NATO, the EEC and the United States.

PAPAIOANNOU EXPLAINS IMPERIALIST AIMS IN REGION

NC241258 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0807 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Speech by AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou during budget debate in the House of Representatives 24 February -- live]

[Excerpts] Mr Chairman, colleagues: We are debating the republic's two budgets for 1982 under conditions of international tension, particularly in the eastern Mediterranean, as well as the Middle East. It is at the same time no exaggeration to state that we are closer to a third world war today than at any time since World War II. It is therefore impossible to discuss state budgets without looking at the international political-economic conditions within which we are obliged to define our own policy.

The first thing we must conclude is that the world crisis is becoming more severe for the capitalists. This crisis is seen in the decrease in the rate of development, the closing of many factories, the mass unemployment and the inflationary pressures. Unemployment in Britain has reached 3 million, and in the other countries of Western Europe it has reached 7 million. In the United States unemployment has reached 16 million. The Japanese economy, which until recently showed an upward trend, has started downward, and the same is happening with the West German, French and Italian economies. Between the countries of the EEC, Japan and the United States there is a relentless and undeclared economic war while at the same time differences and conflicting interests between them are also increasing. Inflation in the capitalist countries has reached unbelievable proportions, while salaries and wages do not correspond to the rise in the cost of living.

The armaments race, led by U.S. circles, further deteriorates the economic situation because it absorbs funds that could be utilized for productive purposes, instead of for unproductive ones. International tension directly endangering world peace and the specter of thermonuclear annihilation is the result of the aggressiveness of the imperialists, and particularly of the U.S. reactionary circles. At a time when the USSR has prepared and proposed a full program for the preservation and protection of world peace, the reactionary U.S. imperialist circles, who appear displeased by the resolutions of the European summit at Helsinki, have started to spend unbelievable amounts of money -- $267 billion in 1 year -- on the production of chemical and nuclear weapons, thus replacing the policy of international detente with international tension and the arms race.

This policy is expressed through abrogation of the SALT II agreement; through the decision on the manufacture and installation of medium-range missiles in West Europe; through the decision on the manufacture of the inhuman neutron bomb; through concentration of the U.S. fleet in various seas, from which they provoke and blackmail various countries; through organization and readiness of rapid deployment forces in conjunction with provocative maneuvers in the Mediterranean, off the Gulf states, in the Indian Ocean, the Caribbean, in Egypt and elsewhere; through military aid to the barbaric and tyrannical fascist regime of El Salvador; through support of the racist, aggressive regime of South Africa; through the signing of a military agreement with Israel; through the arming and encouragement of the Israeli Zionists to attack the Palestinians in southern Lebanon and to annex the Syrian Golan Heights; through the support and arming of the dictatorial Turkish regime; through intervention in the domestic affairs of the Polish Peoples Republic and financing of the counterrevolution in that country; through repeated provocations against Iran, Libya and threats against Cuba; through the encouragement and support of the dictatorial regime of Turkey to continue its occupation of 40 percent of Cyprus territory and through the plans for U.S. bases in northern Cyprus.

The aggressive policy of the U.S. imperialist circles, which was inaugurated under the Carter administration, was developed and completed by the Reagan administration. It is based on the anachronistic, antiquated philosophy of gunboat diplomacy from a position of strength. This is an outmoded and terribly dangerous policy that underestimates nuclear weapons, as proved by the fact that it speaks of limited nuclear war while, as very correctly pointed out by USSR President and Secretary General of the CPSU Central Committee Brezhnev, the use of any form of nuclear weapons anywhere will lead to a third world thermonuclear war.

The position of strength policy leads to the arms race and this in turn leads to thermonuclear annihilation. There is no other course for mankind, which wants to live and create higher standards of civilization, than the course of detente, disarmament and peace. There is no course for solving existing problems and differences other than the negotiations table. The Soviet proposals point the way to detente and peace. Today, the people of the world have no more direct, imperative and vital duty than that of struggling to prevent thermonuclear annihilation.

Mr Chairman, the harshly-tested Cypriot people, who are conducting a titanic struggle for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from their territory, for disbanding of all foreign bases and for the full demilitarization of their country, have demonstrated -- with mass marches and protests against the neutron bomb, against nuclear armaments and against their territory being used for surveillance flights and provocative military maneuvers -- that they have understood the terrible dangers inherent in the revival of the cold war and the armaments race for themselves as well as for mankind.

The Cyprus problem is an inseparable part of the people's struggle for detente, prevention of thermonuclear annihilation, disarmament and lasting peace. The struggle of the people of Cyprus for independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, for a federal nonaligned and demilitarized Cyprus, is an inseparable part of the popular struggle for international detente, peace, democracy, independence and social progress.

Some may wonder why things are being seen from such an international angle. What relation is there, or can there be, to the state budget we are debating? The reply is that it would be totally pointless to discuss the Cyprus issue and the budget without understanding the international situation that directly influences both the Cyprus issue and the budget.

Let us deal with the Cyprus issue. Why has it not yet been solved after nearly 8 years of Turkish occupation? Who is preventing its solution? Why is it that there has been no basic progress after 18 months of continual intercommunal negotiations? Why has not even one portion of the UN General Assembly and Security Council resolutions been implemented? Naturally there is Turkish intransigence, which stems from the chauvinist and dictatorial circles of Ankara. Someone, however, is encouraging and feeding Turkish intransigence. This someone is none other than the U.S. imperialists and the reactionary circles of NATO, who are supplying arms to Turkey as well as economic and political support.

Today Turkey has so many weapons that it is able to sell to others. The U.S. imperialists, on the other hand, who are shedding crocodile tears about the situation in Poland, which they themselves created, have only praise for the dictatorial terrorist regime in Turkey, which continually is exterminating patriots and democratic dissenters.

The U.S. imperialists are the primary force behind the Turkish intransigence because they want their own solution to the Cyprus issue. They want Cyprus partitioned so they may guarantee their own bases for themselves in northern Cyprus, in the same way that the British have their own in south. They want Cyprus as a NATO missile base and a base for the Rapid Deployment Force. They want to put into operation -- if they are not already -- the three spy radio receiving stations they have in the territories occupied by the Turkish troops, and they are already planning their bases on the northern coast of Cyprus. The U.S. imperialists, successors to the Hitlerite aggressive spirit, feverishly arm Turkey and Israel in order to use them as gendarmes and aggressors in the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East. They intend Cyprus to be a strong, strategic point in their criminal plans.

If, therefore, we want to take the bull by the horns, as the popular saying goes, then we must understand that those who encourage and feed Turkish intransigence on the Cyprus issue, those who insist on solutions based on the invasion and occupation faits accomplis, are none other than the U.S. imperialists and the most reactionary NATO circles. U.S. imperialism and its servants in NATO are the fly in the ointment for the Cyprus issue. Turkey and the Turkish leadership would not have been able to last under international pressure if U.S. imperialism did not stand behind them.

The struggle of the Cyprus people has been and remains an anti-imperialist struggle, an antioccupation struggle. It is the struggle for removal of the Turkish occupation troops and all other foreign troops from Cyprus territory, for the return of the refugees to their homes and properties under conditions of security, for establishing the fate of the missing persons and for solution of the Cyprus issue on the basis of independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity and for a federal, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyprus. It is the struggle for abolition of the British sovereign bases and the U.S. spy radio monitoring stations which operate on Cyprus territory. In this struggle there is also room for the Turkish Cypriots who see that both the interests and the struggle are common ones.

Chauvinists from both sides may ridicule this absolutely anti-imperialist and correct position. We are glad because ever increasing numbers of Turkish Cypriots are understanding the anti-imperialist, antioccupation context of the struggle and the need for rapprochement between Greek and Turkish Cypriots. We are certain the process of differentiation between the Turkish Cypriots would have taken ever wider dimensions if there were no chauvinist manifestations from both sides, if the Greek Cypriot side as a whole viewed the question of rapprochement with courage and adopted the necessary measures toward this end.

If we want to isolate imperialism and its flunkies, if we want to pull the rug from under their feet, then we must study various methods for the rapprochement of Greek and Turkish Cypriots, different methods for restoring mutual confidence, methods for pulling down the wall of hatred, suspicion and division which was erected by imperialism, chauvinism and their flunkies.

It is not the Turkish Cypriots who are our enemies; they never were. Our truly implacable enemies are the imperialists, the chauvinists from both sides and the flunkies of imperialism, who have every reason to keep the two communities separate and at odds.

AKEL believes we should exhaust all possible limits in the intercommunal talks for fundamental progress on the basis of the UN resolutions and the summit agreements, and only after is is proved beyond the shadow of any doubt that intransigence continues should we appeal to the UN General Assembly and Security Council in order to request decisive measures for the success of the intrcommunal talks. This appeal would in no way supplant the intercommunal negotiations for the solution of the domestic aspect of the Cyprus issue, but would simply strengthen it.

With our recourse we shall ask for the convening of an international conference within the UN framework for solution of the external aspects of our problem. I reiterate: We reject without discussion any solution based on the faits accomplis of the invasion and occupation. We insist steadfastly and firmly on a solution to the Cyprus problem's internal aspect through the intercommunal talks within the framework and under the auspices of the United Nations on the basis of its resolutions and the summit agreements. This solution envisages a biregional status but never a confederation, which we also reject. The only solution we accept is a truly independent, sovereign, territorially integral federated, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyrpus, a center of peace, friendship and cooperation of all peoples in the area.

Mr President, in the titanic struggle for liberation that the Cyprus people are waging, they need, they absolutely need, a strong, united internal front. AKEL has done and will do much in the direction of unity and cooperation among patriotic democratic forces. Since its inception AKEL has worked unceasingly for the people's anti-imperialist, liberating unity.

Some people talk of a need for a change in our country's internal and economic affairs. We not only agree but call even more for a change. However, what kind of change? Because the leadership of the Democratic Rally [DP] also speaks of change. However, the change the DP leadership seeks in our country consists of politically abandoning our nonaligned foreign policy and attaching Cyprus to NATO, having the Cyprus problem solved by the Americans and the Western imperialists in NATO's interest, intensifyin, anti-communism so as to cover up the cruel exploitation of the working people by the establishment of the oligarcy of wealth and monopolistic capital to satisfy imperialism, making the rich even richer and the poor even poorer so that the very rich may live a life of opulence and laziness at the expense of the working people. This is so because in the last analysis the question that arises is which class' interests the DP expresses, represents and supports. Most certainly the interests of the oligarchy of wealth, the interests of big capital.

However, as the party of the working class and the working people, AKEL serves the interests of the people's vast majority. Therefore when change is mentioned we mean the change desired by the people. We mean democratic, progressive change, change that will strike mercilessly at every impropriety, inaugurate a new economic policy for the people's benefit and which can be implemented only with the working class and the working people as its principal lever.

No instance exists in man's history when a progressive change to benefit the people, a change for the benefit of the working people and the people's vast majority, which consists of the working people, was brought about by large exploitive capital and the oligarchy of wealth.

BILEN: U.S. MAKING JUNTA'S POLICIES HARSHER

TA171207 (Clandestine) Voice of the Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 17 Feb 82

[Interview with Turkish communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Comrade Bilen, the junta placed new bans on the press and the trade unions. New arrests are being made. It is observed that the oppression of the workers and searches have intensified. Under these conditions, John Tower, the chairman of the U.S. Senate Armed Forces Committee, arrived in Turkey. Haig, who held a meeting with Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen in Madrid, said: I am not thinking of going to Turkey just now because differences of opinion no longer exist between us. Would it be correct to say that in the face of all this, the junta's domestic and foreign policies and its attitude have become more openly reactionary?

[Answer] It would be correct. It is impossible to separate the junta's domestic and foreign policies completely from each other. From the first day, the junta has followed in the footsteps of the expansionist U.S. imperialism [word indistinct] within NATO. Today, the Reagan administration pursues an insane policy. There is no longer a sensible or realistic aspect to the Americans' policies. The Reagan administration exerts pressure on its partners and satellites in NATO. It undermined the Madrid conference. It resists the Soviet Union's constant desire to limit nuclear arms. It insists on placing missiles of death in the middle of Europe. There is displeasure and resistance against this policy even within NATO.

However, the junta's foreign minister, Turkmen, waits for Haig's instructions. He does whatever Haig tells him to do. As you said, Haig is very pleased. Just at this time, Tower arrived in Turkey. He came for the implementation of the issues on which the junta reached an agreement with Haig. This Tower is the chairman of the Joint Turkish-American Defense Group. He came to Turkey last year as well. At the time, the [word indistinct] agreement had gone into effect. This time, the issues are the RDF, ways of increasing the U.S. military presence in the region, the Joint Defense Group agreement and the issue of dragging Turkey into new aggressive blocs in the Middle East.

[Question] Comrade Bilen, how are all these things reflected in the junta's domestic policies?

[Answer] In that the junta's domestic policies are becoming even harsher. The more the junta opens its arms to U.S. imperialism and the more its domestic policies become harsher, the faster the process of its isolation. The more it becomes isolated, the more it becomes harsh and aggressive. Furthermore, it has not been able to and can never solve any basic problem. Inflation continues to grow, unemployment has become a disaster. The junta incites anticommunism, anti-Sovietism and chauvinism in order to conceal these things from the people. Recently, anti-Armenianism flared up once again in the reactionary press. Anti-communism and chauvinism are racing at the forefront. This chauvinist campaign was raised while the military maneuvers in Erzurum were going on. The first Armenian massacre occurred in 1915. Now, efforts are being made to remind the people of that. The junta leaders are trying to be like Enver and Talat. This campaign is directed against the Kurdish people. The oppression of these people and the terrorism against them continues to grow. Chauvinism is warmongering. It is aggression. During the maneuvers, Evren said: This time, we will not repeat the mistakes we made at Sarikamis during World War I.

This means exerting pressure and threatening our people with brute force. It means assuming a warmongering attitude against our neighbors and the Soviet Union. These developments undoubtedly bring new threats for peace, for our region and our people.

[Question] Comrade Bilen, in your letter of 11 January to President Reagan, you disclosed these threats to the world public. What is the real source of these threats?

[Answer] The source is the policy of tension and confrontation pursued by the Reagan administration. The Reagan administration allotted 40 percent of the budget to armaments. Even this is enough to point out the aim of the Reagan administration. The junta follows this path as well. That is the main source of the main threat.

The attempts of the U.S. administration to interfere in Poland's internal affairs is an extension of its policy which backs the junta in Turkey.

[Question] Comrade Bilen, the junta has turned the trial of the officials of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] into an active war against the working class. However, an increasingly growing campaign is being raised against the DISK trial. Can you tell us about the developments regarding this issue?

[Answer] From the day it came to power, the junta directed its attacks against the working class in line with demands of the collaborationist and monopolist bourgoisie. This ferocious and vengeful attack triggered widespread reactions both in our country and abroad. It lit up a powerful fire of solidarity. It turned the eyes of the entire world onto Turkey. Representative of millions of workers, from the biggest trade unions arrived in Turkey to observe the DISK trial. This trial, where DISK officals and thousands of workers are being prosecuted, was discussed at the European Parliament. It was reflected in the press of several socialist and capitalist countries. The reaction continues to grow. Recently, it was discussed at the 10th World Trade Unions Congress held in Cuba. This problem was heard once again when DISK Executive Council member Kemal Daysal held a news conference. Thus it is observed that the junta's attack boomeranged. It created a powerful solidarity throughout the world. This is an important gain. The working class and our people have not surrendered to the junta. Food boycotts were held for days in some of the factories of the biggest holdings such as Eczacibasi. The martial law authorities were able to stop a strike at the (Natas) factory only by arresting 300 people.

Reactions continue on the side of the small producers and villagers. Wide circles are demanding a democratic constitution. The resistance of the working class and of the masses will grow further. Oppression and terror cannot prevent this. The solidarity which is developing in the entire world with the Turkish people is not less important. Warm voices of solidarity are rising from the four continents. Also, all the peace forces in the world, and mainly the Soviet Union and the socialist countries, are continuing to wage their powerful struggle to protect peace and detente. This strengthens us as well.

[Question] Comrade Bilen, at a time when the dangers grow while new possibilities appear [as heard], what is the situation of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] and its struggle line?

[Answer] During its latest plenum, our party organized reinforcing activities according to the new struggle conditons. It protected its cadres and its struggle power against the giant attack aimed against it. It reacted to this attack. With this power, it was able to organize the working class and the masses. Today the attacks continue. The trials continue. However, our party organizations and the communists are waging a struggle under harsh conditions with all their heart. The enemies, which claim to have disbanded the TCP, are aware of the concrete results of these activities.

Recently several of our party organizations issued statements. Our Marmara and Central Anatolia regional committees issued statements. This shows that the TCP protects its struggle power and continues to struggle.

[Question] Recently there have been wide echoes of the joint struggle appeal issued by the Turkish Labor Party, the Turkish Socialist Workers party and the TCP. Wide coverage is being given to that in the socialist and progressive press. Could you comment on this important development?

[Answer] The TCP has always tried to ensure the unity of the working class. That is the thing that comes first. The TCP has always tried to ensure the unity of action and of front of the widest democratic forces. This issue becomes an even more burning one today, when the process of the junta's isolation has speeded up. The three parties are acting with an awareness of their historical responsiblities. They took this joint step, despite their differences of opinion just on time. This step must be and can be a point of attraction for the unity of the other democratic forces. The unity of action and of front is the real [word indistinct]. It is the only way of facing the attacks of imperialism, of internal and external reaction and of the junta and of ensuring peace, democracy and freedom. Our working class and our people expect that from us. The TCP is waging and will continue to wage this struggle without moving an inch from the Marxist-Leninist line.

[Question] Comrade Bilen, you draw a concrete picture of the present situation and duties. Thank you for your comments.

TCP MEMBERS TOLD HOW TO DEAL WITH POLICE

TA210824 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 21 Feb 82

[Commentary: "A Successful Campaign, A Looming Danger"]

[Text] Comrades, those who rejoiced at the thought that the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] had been destroyed are today enraged to observe that the TCP is continuing to operate. Yes, that is right; the TCP is active, very much alive and continuing to wage its struggle. It has not stopped its struggle for a moment against the reactionaries and the pro-American monopolies. It is waging this struggle with the slogan of unity of the national democratic forces. The TCP is fighting against pressure and terror being exerted on the progressive democrats and against murders and threats of death sentences. The party's goal is to transform into one united blow all the campaigns being waged both inside and outside the country by all nationalist and democratic forces. These efforts, comrades, are yielding results.

The junta is currently being isolated and left without any support. The solidarity campaign being waged in favor of the 52 DISK officials facing the death sentence has reached large proportions, evoking international reaction. Workers around the world, as well as a large part of the world democratic public, are supporting this campaign, which is strengthening the fight in favor of the drafting of a democratic constitution. The TCP, with all its regional organizations, on the one hand is exerting efforts to recover from the blow of the May 1981 arrests, and on the other it is engaging in the struggle with all its force.

This was the case on 13 February, the 15th anniversary of DISK, when workers belonging both to the Turkish Confederation of Labor and DISK made their voice heard in all factories and districts. They distributed tracts protesting both the DISK and TCP trials. These tracts, which have been widely distributed in various parts of the country -- particularly in Istanbul, Ankara and Eskisehir -- are being passed from one person to another. It can be said that there is no place they have not reached.

But these tracts, which were distributed among the masses, were also obtained by the enemies of the working class. One of these, a military prosecutor, had to exclaim: Are they still active? Our party organizations, communists, have been able to carry out a successful campaign, acting bravely and with sacrifice despite heavy pressures.

Comrades, currently the police, the National Intelligence Organization and the martial law commands have engaged in a new countrywide operation. Arrests have been made. Particularly the Istanbul streets are abounding with informers, agents and police. Police teams that conducted operations against the TCP in other provinces have all arrived in Istanbul. They have all engaged in large-scale raids. All suspects in the streets are being detained on the spot. Photos are being used. Tortures are continuing fiercely.

Our party organizations, which have succeeded in recovering from the blow of the May arrests and which have been able recently to carry out the successful DISK campaign, must now set another successful example of defense in the face of this new aggression. Until new directives are issued, relations among members must be lowered to a minimum. Those of the TCP organizations active directly among the masses must reveal to them the realities and the meaning of the campaigns being waged by the party, paying attention to the possibility of conspiracy. The radio programs must be listened to carefully. The VOTCP is providing party members with the chance to be informed closely of party policies. Efforts must be exerted to involve even the most reactionary parts of the masses in these campaigns in a bid to explain the realities to them.

Comrades, in the event you learn about a communist or party sympathizer being captured by the police, interest must be expressed in the fate of that person through statements, letters, telephone calls and through relatives. Efforts must be made to prevent the torture of the captured. Progressives and democrats abroad must be informed through all available means on torture being exerted on the captured and on all other particulars about the incident.

The torturers will grow more barbarious as they feel that they are being isolated. We, on the other hand, will continue our activities despite all conditions, making efforts to intensify them. It is clear that such a stand will also increase the dangers. Arrests may result. There is nothing to be surprised about. Let us take the necessary precautions with cool heads. These precautions must provide for better and more effective party work. The struggle must now go on more than ever together with the masses, but with the utmost attention to conspiracy and using all our minds and experience in illegal work.

PALESTINIAN ARRESTED FOR ARRANGING ESCAPES

NC242140 Paris AFP in English 1523 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 24 Feb (AFP) -- Police in Ankara have arrested a Palestinian student accused of arranging the escape abroad of a large number of alleged Turkish terrorists, reliable sources reported here today. Tariq Zayyat, 28, who has been attending an Ankara university for the past eight years, was also the representative here of George Habash's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), the same sources said.

Police discovered a number of forged passports in a raid on the Palestinian's home and found "conclusive evidence" that Mr Zayyat helped many wanted leftists to flee to country [as received]. They included Pasa Guven, leader of DEV-SOL (Revolutionary Left), a group advocating political violence, and Sarp Kuray, one of the leaders of DEV-YOL (Revolutionary Path), Turkey's largest leftist underground organisation.

Police detained Mr Zayyat acting on information obtained from another Palestinian arrested in Istanbul last year and identified as Wa'il Hilal.

NEARLY 50,000 PERSONS SAID CURRENTLY ON TRIAL

NC222239 Paris AFP in English 1001 GMT 22 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 22 Feb (AFP) -- Nearly 50,000 people are currently on trial in Turkish military courts, the Martial Law Coordination Office announced here today, adding that this figure excludes those under detention or awaiting trial. The charges range from attempts to change the constitutional order to carrying weapons, forming armed gangs, murder, communism, racism, fascism, separatism and anti-secularism.

Of the 46,721 accused, some of whom are not under arrest, 43,986 are being tried for belonging to underground organizations, 2,075 at trade union trials, and 660 face political party trials.

SUSPECTS REPORTED TO BE DEAD MEET PRESS

TA241849 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] Two suspects Amnesty International claimed died as a result of torture at Usak prison, met journalists in Izmir today.

Last 4 June it was decided that Guner Akkus, who was being held for joining the Usak branch of the Revolutionary Path organization and for organizing women and workers, would be tried without being detained. Akkus met the press at the Aegean Army and Martial Law Dommand's press and public relations office today. Akkus, who is still free, was brought from Usak's Esme District to Izmir to meet journalists following Amnesty International claim. Zeki Dumen, a suspect at the Usak Revolutionary Path organization trial and who is under detention, was shown to newsmen at the Aegean Army Command (Sirinyer) prison.

Of those captured, 9 are Revolutionary Path organization members, 3 are from the Revolutionary Left Organization, 18 are from the Turkish Peoples Liberation Party Front-Revolutionary Path and 18 belong to various rightist organizations.

ANKARA TRIAL OF 11 LEFTIST MILITANTS BEGINS

TA181605 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1550 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 18 Feb (AA) -- The trial of 11 members of the illegal organization calling itself DEV-YOL 'Revolutionary Path' in the Ankara area started in a martial law court Thursday. The defendants included Utkan and Kutlan Gunes, sons of former Interior Minister Hasan Fehmi Gunes. The prosecution is demanding prison sentences of up to 15 months on charges of membership in an illegal organization, unauthorized carrying of firearms and larceny. The defendants questionsed rejected the charges, and the hearing was postponed until Monday, 22 February, to allow the rest of the defendants to be heard.

In Antalya, security forces apprehended 26 militants belonging to factions of the illegal organization calling itself People's Liberation Party-Front (THKP-C), on charges of killing two and injuring five persons, in addition to other crimes.

Iskenderun Trial of 121

TA241855 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Summary] The Iskenderun Revolutionary Path organization trial has begun. Of the 121 suspects standing trial, 21 are charged with attempting to overthrow the constitutional order and replace it with a Marxist-Leninist system. The death penalty is demanded for the 21.

The indictment was read at the trial, which began today in Iskenderun at the VI Corps and Martial Law Command 3d Military Court. Prison sentences ranging from 3 to 20 years are being demanded for the other suspects. Of the 121 suspects, 87 are under detention and the rest are free.

Death Sought for 9

TA221647 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Feb 82

[Summary] In the trial of 38 suspects belonging to the Turkish People's Liberation Party Front-Liberation organization being held at the 2d Military Court in Istanbul, the military prosecutor asked the death sentence for 9 and prison sentences ranging up to 36 years for the others. They are accused of subversive activities aimed at establishing a proletarian dictatorship to replace the existing constitutional order.

3 Condemned to Death

TA152026 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 15 Feb 82

[Text] The 2d Izmir Military Court condemned three militants to death today for being involved in the escape of Turkish worker Peasant Liberation Army leader Orhan Bakir while he was detained in Izmir. Bakir escaped 4 years ago in an operation undertaken by his followers while he was being taken to the dentistry school of the Aegean university for treatment. Bayram Ozcan, a gendarme, was killed in the ensuing fight. Sedat Yilmazsoy, Feridun Ihsan Berkin and Muzaffer Ozturk, who were involved in the incident, were condemned to death. The court condemned 11 militants to prison sentences ranging from 3 to 15 years.

Death for Rightists

TA192040 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 19 Feb 82

[Excerpt] The Aegean Army and Martial Law Command's 1st Military Court in Izmir has sentenced to death 2 of the 26 rightist militants who were being tried for attempting to forcefully change the constitutional order and to secure the state's administration by a single person. The court commuted the death sentence of one of the militants to life imprisonment by implementing the discretionary reduction provision.

At the trial, which ended today, the court sentenced to death Erbil Kuru and Hunkar (Gecekli), finding them guilty of activities aimed at overthrowing the constitutional order. However, the sentence on (Gecekli) was commuted to life imprisonment.

Sentence on Guney

NC231959 Paris AFP in English 1903 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Ankara, 23 Feb (AFP) -- Turkish actor-director-writer Yilmaz Guney has been sentenced in absentia to five years in jail by the Golcuk (Marmara region) martial law court, official sources said today. Guney, assumed to be living in Europe since he escaped from prison last October, was sentenced for "causing loss of prestige to Turkey" by a letter he sent to the Festival Committee in Spain for a "cinema week" in October 1980.

ROYAL NAVY TASK FORCE CUTS SAILINGS, SAVES FUEL

PM221627 London DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 22 Feb 82 p 7

[Desmond Wettern report: "Navy Cuts Sailings To Save Fuel"]

[Text] The number of ships in the Royal Navy Task Force sailing East of Suez this summer is to be halved to save fuel and other costs. It was planned that the 18-month old carrier Invincible should head the force, but her future programme is now uncertain until it is known whether the Australians intend to buy her.

Normally a 10 to 12 ship force spends up to seven months each year visiting ports and carrying out exercises in many parts of the Middle and Far East, but this year the force is expected to number only five or six ships. The last cruise in 1980, which included the first visit by Royal Navy ships to visit Shanghai for more than 30 years, was highly successful. It contributed towards the Chinese decision to modernise nine destroyers with British missiles and other equipment. Last year the cruise was cancelled partly because since October 1980 the navy has had to keep four destroyers and frigates in the Indian Ocean keeping watch on merchant shipping entering and leaving the Persian Gulf.

Not Concerned

The absence of Royal Navy ships for long periods from many important trading areas is coming under growing criticism from shipowners although Mr Nott, the defense secretary, has stressed the importance of British warships operating outside the NATO area.

The concern of many shipowners was voiced by Mr John Metcalf of the London shipowners Gulf Shipping, following last week's sailing of the company's 10,500-ton cargo ship, Gulf Hawk, after being delayed for a month waiting to sail in convoy from an Iranian port. Another of Gulf's ships has now been written off by the insurers as a constructive total loss as she has been trapped at Basra in Iraq since the start of the war between Iran and Iraq in Autumn 1980.

"Whitehall just isn't concerned about British ships outside the NATO area any more," Mr Metcalf claimed. "We are going to make our concern felt very forcibly to the General Council of British Shipping. "The government is cutting the navy's surface fleet to such an extent that there is no way it can provide even token security for British merchant ships outside the North Atlantic." The navy's warships patrolling the Straits of Hormuz and the entrance to the Persian Gulf are forbidden by Whitehall to enter the Gulf itself. Apart from a frigate guardship of Belize and another at Gibraltar, the only other British warships now regularly operating overseas are five old former wooden minesweepers which patrol the territorial waters around Hongkong.

PORTUGUESE PRIME MINISTER TALKS WITH LEADERS

LD242054 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 24 Feb 82

[Text] The negotiations for Portugal's entry into the EEC were the main subject of the political talks which Portuguese Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao had at the presidential palace with President Pertini and at the prime minister's office with Spadolini and Colombo. The Portuguese side expressed concern at the slowness of the negotiations, which are also hampered by the lack of agreement among The Ten on a global agricultural policy. The Italian side, while confirming the existing difficulties, reiterated its support for the Portuguese requests. Prime Minister Spadolini has been invited to pay an official visit to Lisbon.

SPOKESMAN DENIES DEMAND FOR BEGIN APOLOGY

LD251540 Hamburg DPA in German 1438 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 25 Feb (DPA) -- Government Spokesman Kurt Becker has described allegations in the Israeli press to the effect that Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said that he would make a visit to Israel conditional on Begin's making a public apology as "a product of pure fantasy." The chancellor has never made any such statement or passed any similar judgment, Becker stressed in a statement issued in Bonn.

GDR TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS LIBERALLY ADMINISTERED

LD251258 Hamburg DPA in German 1034 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 25 Feb (DPA) -- The GDR announcement of 11 February regarding the relaxation of travel restrictions to the Federal Republic and West Berlin for those GDR citizens below pension age who are traveling on urgent family business, is obviously being more liberally administered than the actual text of the announcement would suggest. This was noted by the Inner-German Relations Ministry in Bonn today on the basis of experiences of the first travellers under the new regulations. The GDR authorities demonstrated flexibility regarding the degree of kinship and also appeared to be allowing exceptions.

The Federal minister for inner-German relations, Egon Franke, welcomed the improvements and assessed them as a first result of the meeting between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and GDR Council of State Chairman Erich Honecker at Werbellinsee in December.

Over the past 10 years an annual average of 40,000 visits by GDR citizens on urgent family business were registered. But according to information from Bonn, the actual number was probably much higher during the past few years because it was not always possible to establish the exact number of visits.

WEHNER DENIES AGREEING ON POLISH 'COMMUNIQUE'

LD251414 Hamburg DPA in German 1129 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 25 Feb (DPA) -- The leader of the SED Parliamentary Group, Herbert Wehner, is sticking to his intention of easing the possible process of reducing tension by not publicizing information on talks held during his recent visit to Poland. In an interview with the Parliamentary Political Press Service, which is close to the SPD, Wehner replied in answer to a question on whether he broached the subject of detainees in Warsaw: "Do you really think you can coax me to say anything in public which could harm those concerned?"

Wehner also said that a text published by PAP after his visit to Poland was not agreed on with him and was not a "communique." The Polish side "Put its own opinion on paper. I can and will not agree to this text in the form I have read it."

Opposed to Sanctions

LD261114 Hamburg DPA in German 1014 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 26 Feb (DPA) -- Following his visit to Poland, chairman of the SPD Parliamentary Group, Herbert Wehner has spoken out against imposing sanctions against Warsaw because of martial law in that country. The Polish military government could not be "talked away" nor "sanctioned away", Wehner wrote in an article in the ESSLINGER ZEITUNG (Saturday edition) which was released by the SPD in Bonn today.

The SPD politician stressed that during his visit he was greatly impressed by the concern with which Warsaw views sanctions against Poland. Sanctions would place even greater burdens on the already heavily suffering Polish people and would aggravate the internal political situation of the country. The consequences, which could not easily be calculated, could also easily have an effect on the FRG too. The important thing now is to help the Polish people.

Wehner further wrote that he does not intend to indulge in a "great public self-presentation" on the information and impressions which he gained in Warsaw beyond his report to the chancellor. Detailed reports of the thinking and presentation on his part or of his Polish partners in the talks are of no use to anyone in the final analysis. He did not go on a "state visit". Nor did he hold "negotiations" with anybody. Rather, the aim of his trip was to acquaint himself directly with the situation in his function as a member of parliament who sees his life's task to work for conciliation and rapprochement between the German and the Polish peoples.

'Unsuccessful Visit'

[W. Hertz-Eichenrode commentary: "Unsuccessful Visit"]

[Text] What Herbert Wehner has reported to the Federal chancellor about his visit to Poland remains unknown. However, Wehner has written to the local paper in his Hamburg election district. His information is very meager, so he clings to the word "impressive" in characterizing his Warsaw talks. He uses that word five times in the relatively short text and even raises it to "particularly impressive." He seems to be fully under the spell of these talks.

Insiders have a very plausible explanation for the obvious scarcity of information given by the zealous traveller to Poland. Nothing of political substance has come from all the talks. Naturally, this does not mean that the Polish military regime got nothing from the visit. After all, Wehner has made public statements and the following must be noted:

1. Wehner has not said one word to contradict the statement published in Poland on the results of his visit. He allows the bad impression created by the statement to continue, so the text seems to reflect the truth.

2. In his report to the paper of his election district, there is no mention of either workers' leader Walesa or the Solidarity Trade Union. Instead, Wehner seems "particularly impressed" by the story about ensuring domestic peace in Poland which was outlined to him by the current rulers.

3. Wehner practically confirms that part of the statement published in Poland which quotes his unwarranted opinion that a considerable part of the political forces and an overwhelming majority of the West German society are against sanctions.

The question is raised as to whether it is not too midly put to say that Wehner has provided an example of cooperation with military despotism in Poland. It is intolerable to create this kind of cooperation by referring to German-Polish relations and their history full of suffering as well as to the consiliatory spirit of the Warsaw pact.

JOINT STATEMENT ISSUED ON FRENCH-GERMAN SUMMIT

LD251510 Hamburg DPA in German 1351 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 25 Feb (DPA) -- The text of the German-French statement on the 39th summit meeting published in Paris on Thursday is as follows:

1. In view of the deterioration of East-West relations, the world economic crisis and problems faced by the European Community, the FRG and the French Republic reaffirm the fundamental importance of their (?cooperation). They will act together even more closely.

2. Both states are determined to increase Europe's weight in the world. To this end the (?community) must at once -- in a spirit of solidarity which transcends the interests of its member-states -- overcome the difficulties that inhibit its ability to function and develop. It is indeed indispensable that, despite the economic environment, the European Community fulfill its external and internal tasks in order to make the most progress toward (?strengthening) cohesion and expansion. European political cooperation must also be intensified. Both states want to make rapid progress toward political union. These aims are served by the German-Italian initiative of European union and the French proposals for European revival.

3. The FRG and France are concerned about the deterioration of East-West relations caused by Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, the grave developments in Poland and the Soviet Union's excessive arming. They note that the political actions of the Soviet Union and Poland cannot remain without effect on the total relations between these two countries. They believe that in East-West relations, a strict equilibrium of mutual advantages must continue to be the decisive criterium. They will not deviate from the principles which they, as democratic countries, support and they insist in particular on the principles of the people's right to self-determination and respect for human rights. Like their partners in the community and their allies they are convinced that East-West relations can only develop favorably on the basis of a firmly established military balance. They therefore regard as inseparable the two parts of the dual decision which the NATO member-countries adopted on 12 December 1979. They are of the opinion that arms control and disarmament efforts must continue. They place value on the CSCE process, particularly that the application of the Helsinki Final Act is upheld. That is why they will continue their dialogue with countries in the East in the above-outlined spirit.

4. They regard the repressive measures taken by the Polish leadership under pressure from and with the support of the Soviet Union as a violation of human rights and the Helsinki Final Act and as a severe strain on East-West relations. They renew their urgent appeal to lift martial law in Poland, release the prisoners and resume a real dialogue between government, church and the Solidarity leadership. The goal of their policy continues to be to help the Polish people.

5. The FRG and France recall the importance they attach to the development of countries in the south. This policy should serve progress and social justice and thus make a contribution to the safeguarding of world peace. They note that true nonalignment serves this aim. They therefore oppose the transfer of East-West differences to the Third World.

6. The FRG and France, both firmly embedded in the Atlantic alliance, consider the consolidation of bonds of solidarity between the United States and other members of the Atlantic alliance to be vital. These bonds will be closer the sooner comprehensive consultations take place between Europeans and Americans on a better definition of their joint aims and on a better coordination of their interests. They are determined to promote, with all their strength, mutual understanding between the people and especially with the coming generation on this side and the other side of the Atlantic.

7. The (?difficulties) of the world economy make it necessary in their opinion for Western governments to contribute -- through an energetic revival of international cooperation -- to a reduction in unemployment, to economic growth and to the development of international trade. This policy must also include monetary policy. The extremely high level of interest rates in the United States has very grave consequences for the European economies. The FRG and France will energetically strive, together with their partners in the community, to master this situation. To this end they will strive to get the support of their partners in the community. For this purpose they will launch initiatives to stimulate investment and to allow their companies to strengthen their capacity for innovation and modernization. The FRG and France are determined to continue and stimulate anew their cooperation in (?large-scale) industrial projects and technological developments.

8. The Federal chancellor of the FRG and the president of the French Republic have, in the spirit of the French-German Treaty of 22 January 1963, decided that their two countries will coordinate their foreign policy more closely.

In this spirit they also decided to hold a (word indistinct) exchange of views between the two governments on security questions.

Schmidt 'Very Satisfied'

LD251348 Hamburg DPA in German 1315 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 25 Feb (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, at the end of the French-German summit in the Elysee Palace at midday today, said that he was "very happy and very satisfied" with the results. Schmidt and French President Francois Mitterrand said that French-German friendship would be further deepened. The joint statement, which urges a new upturn in Europe as soon as possible will, in Schmidt's words, "make an impression in Warsaw, Moscow, and in Western capitals." In conclusion Schmidt pointed to the 20th anniversary of the Elysee treaty next year, which "brilliantly proved its worth."

Mauroy Holds Breakfast Meeting

NC251427 Paris AFP in English 1311 GMT 25 Feb 82

[By Daniele de Meyer]

[Text] Paris, 25 Feb (AFP) -- Increasing Franco-German convergence in the economic sector emerged today at an "economic breakfast" here between French Premier Pierre Mauroy, Finance Minister Jacques Delors, Budget Minister Laurent Fabius and West German Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer accompanied by Otto Schlecht who is secretary of state for economy.

The gathering took place as part of the 39th Franco-German summit meeting. It covered international, European and national topics, officials at the premier's office said. There was growing convergence on the adverse effects of U.S. economic policy, particularly high American interest rates [and] also on the way both countries could handle unemployment.

The French side welcomed West Germany's readiness to further growth through investment, which lined up to some extent with French strategy. Europe's economic future was a major topic, along with the two nations' position in the European Economic Community (EEC). Mr Mauroy gave assurances to West German colleagues on his government's intentions in the field of "winning back the home market."

Mr Schlecht advised the French to call it "a policy for encouraging competitiveness". It would be less controversial. Mr Mauroy urged for a "more coherent and stronger" external economic policy on the part of the EEC. He affirmed that countries like the United States and Japan, who posed as champions of liberalism, had protection systems that were far tougher in fact than those adopted by the West European countries.

The West Germans at the meeting criticized the functioning of the EEC institutions, which they saw as too bureaucratic. Mr Mauroy said that France, now up before the European Court and suspected of "protectionist intentions", had less severe views than West Germany on this subject.

After the meeting, close aides of Mr Mauroy said the two sides agreed that Franco-German entente was still the keystone of European cooperation. In the face of U.S. economic policy, "a certain egocentrism" by the British, and the absence of new projects at EEC level, France and West Germany had to boost their cooperation in all spheres, particularly in monetary, technical and financial affairs, they said.

The summit, which featured eight hours of talks between French President Francois Mitterrand and West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, wound up with a lunch at the residence of Bonn's ambassador here.

GOVERNMENT WILL LAUNCH SPY SATELLITE IN 1986

PM191213 Paris LE FIGARO in French 17 Feb 82 pp 1, 15

[Jean-Paul Croize article: "A Spy Satellite for France"]

[Text] France is being equipped with spy satellites. The news should be officially confirmed in a month or two. Indeed, the government has given the go-ahead for the production of an initial device which will be put into orbit in 4 years' time, 1986. This satellite, named SAMRO, will make our country the third nation in the world to practice "space surveillance." Of course that surveillance will still be less accurate than that which has been performed by the Russians and Americans for 20 years now. But thanks to the "electronic vision" with which this device will be equipped, it will nonetheless make it possible to detect strategic installations or armored vehicle movements anywhere in the world. Hence France will be better able to react if there are problems in the regions in which it is diplomatically or militarily involved.

The idea of giving France a space surveillance capability is not new. Strategists have been considering it since the middle of the last decade. And since 1977 the Defense Ministry has been making a financial contribution to the production of the civilian spot observation satellites which the country will launch in 1984 and 1985. So far the SAMRO -- military reconnaissance and observations satellite -- project has not received any official consent. But that is now imminent: An inner Defense Council meeting will be held at the end of March or during April to ratify the manufacture of the device already under way in Toulouse with an industrial assembly similar to that used for the two spot satellites. Matra will produce the satellite itself in cooperation with the National Aerospace Industry Company [SNIAS], while the provision of the ground observations reception stations will be entrusted to SNIAS and the European Propulsion Company, which has already been chosen to provide the spot reception equipment.

From the technological viewpoint SAMRO will differ radically from the Soviet and American spy satellites. The latter use the principle of photography, which forces their satellites to fly very low (at an altitude of between 150 and 180 km) in order to provide materials revealing details several centimeters in dimension. There is a high price for that performance: Because they maneuver at such low altitudes, these satellites can stay in orbit for scarcely more than a few months, and the retrieval of the photographs they take over zones of tension requires both the Americans and the Soviets to carry out complex missions to recover the capsules containing the films ejected by those satellites.

To give some idea of the spending involved in this type of activity, it is important to know that in 1981 alone the USSR launched some 30 Cosmos spy satellites, and in the United States the space surveillance budget is higher than that of the CIA.

On the other side of the Atlantic spy satellites are divided into two ultrasophisticated categories: the "big birds" weighing 4 tons which fly at altitudes of less than 200 km and spy in two modes, with a resolution of a few meters on a routine mission and a few centimeters over a "hot zone"; and, much higher, at an altitude of 36,000 km, the Americans have placed "forward monitoring" satellites [satellites de "veille avancee"] equipped with detectors sensitive to infrared and X-rays. The latter have the role of detecting the launching of missiles -- by means of the heat they produce -- and the radioactivity released by nuclear explosions.

France, which was, of course, unable to make the financial effort necessary for establishing and maintaining such a network, turned to another system; SAMRO will be a "video spy" equipped with an electronic rather than an optical eye. The light intensity it registers will be translated into numerical data by an on-board computer which will relay its information in the form of radio waves each time the satellite passes over the national territory.

This procedure, similar to the one designed for the civilian spot satellites, will have several advantages. First, that of being relatively inexpensive. Like the spot satellites, it will be possible to place SAMRO at an altitude of around 800 km, which will give it several years of life, limited only by the durability of the on-board equipment. Second, its orbit will be "polar." It will orbit the globe via the poles -- a trajectory which, combined with the rotation of the earth, will enable it to sweep all regions of the planet in 24 hours. That period will be reduced to 12 hours -- and even less over some regions -- if, as some people think, two spy satellites are in fact launched. On the balance sheet SAMRO should not cost more than Fr2 billion, launching (atop the Ariane rocket) and ground reception system included.

As far as the results are concerned, the electronic system chosen has been sufficiently "refined" over the past few years to provide materials which can be used by the military: The system developed by Matra for the spot family will reveal ground details of a dimension of slightly less than 10 meters. And defense circles maintain that the resolution offered by SAMRO will be even better. In any case, the "gaze" of the French spy satellite will certainly disturb the established order which has prevailed in this sphere for around 20 years: The Soviets have already made an official protest at the United Nations, demanding that all satellites capable of revealing details smaller than 50 meters in dimension should be the subject of a procedure aimed at preventing the owners from publishing those observations without the consent of the countries observed.

The "Blue Satellites"

With SAMRO, France will be able to be informed virtually instantaneously of troop movements at any point in the world. Finally, it should also be stressed that France is planning to use its new access to the sphere of space observation to create, in the framework of the United Nations, an international agency of "blue satellites": spy satellites enabling any country which feels threatened by another country to appeal to the cosmos -- and to this agency's bodies -- to confirm its anxieties.

Very advanced technical and diplomatic studies have already been made to prepare the way in which that agency would operate. At the technical level it would be possible to process the materials electronically and to juggle with their resolution to reveal only the things which prove vital on a given territory, while completely respecting the "privacy" of neighboring regions.

MITTERRAND TALKS ON U.S. CENTRAL AMERICA POLICY

NC251724 Paris AFP in English 1717 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 25 Feb (AFP) -- President Francois Mitterrand expressed support here today for "the American plan for development of the Caribbean," but said he differs strongly with President Ronald Reagan's assessment of the military situation in Central America.

Mr Mitterrand, in remarks following the latest Franco-West German summit here, said the development plan, although perhaps not quite what France would have produced, "points in the right direction."

On Central America, however, he said that everyone knew France's position "toward the claims and opinions of most of the peoples of Central America who aspire to be masters of their own destiny and to escape from the oligarchies that dominate them and the dictatorships that have bloodied them."

"Greater understanding of their problems by the West," he said, "might save them from despair and turning toward a camp that could give them the weapons and the means.

"Between President Reagan and myself there is a difference of analysis on Central America and I fervently hope that our two countries, which are friends, can constantly discuss this to avoid mistakes."

U.S. 'Pressuring' Socialists

PM221325 Paris LE MONDE in French 21-22 Feb 82 p 2

[Text] The American authorities are bringing pressure to bear on the French Socialist leaders to change their open attitude toward certain Latin American countries and liberation movements. According to the PS, very pressing action has been taken at a time when a PS delegation headed by Assistant National Secretary for International Relations Hutzinger is in that region.

The PS thinks that the postponement of the Socialist International bureau meeting, which was to be held in Caracas 24 and 25 February, was decided "after such approaches." The French Socialist delegation is to visit Nicaragua, Cuba, Costa Rica, Venezuela and Panama.

ROK MINISTER VISITS WITH MITTERRAND, CHEYSSON

PM251025 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Feb 82 p 6

[Text] South Korean Foreign Minister No Sin-Yong, on an official visit to France, met with Messrs Mitterrand and Beregovoy at the Elysee Palace 22 February for 1 hour 40 minutes. Among other things, Mr No delivered to the head of state a message from General Chon, President of the Republic of South Korea, presenting Seoul's viewpoints concerning the reunification of the peninsula and urging a favorable evolution of relations with France. On leaving the Elysee Palace Mr No said that he had had "a friendly and satisfying conversation" with Mr Mitterrand.

The South Korean side is also satisfied with Mr No's talks Monday evening with Messrs Jobert and Cheysson. The French external relations minister, who gave a working dinner for Mr No, will visit South Korea this year, according to South Korean sources. On Tuesday, after visiting the Tricastin nuclear power plant and lunching at the Nuclear Energy Commission, Mr No gave a reception at Paris' Crillon Hotel. He left France at the end of the day.

QATAR HAS 'CRISIS OF CONFIDENCE' IN FRANCE

PM241311 Paris LE MONDE in French 23 Feb 82 p 5

[Eric Rouleau dispatch: "The Qatar Government Seems To Have 'Frozen' the Development of Economic Relations with France"]

[Excerpts] Doha -- Qatar is rejoicing. The 230,000 or so inhabitants of this tiny emirate on the Arab-Persian Gulf are celebrating this Monday, 22 February, the 10th anniversary of the accession to power of Shaykh Khalifa ibn Hamad al-Thani, who is called here the "builder of the modern state."

But even though the leaders have some reasons to feel pleased with the domestic situation, the situation in the region is causing them very great concern. In their view the Iranian Revolution, the war between Tehran and Baghdad and, above all, the Israeli-Arab conflict are dangerous factors of destabilization.

An Israeli offensive against Palestinians in Lebanon leading to a confrontation with the Syrian army, they say, could well result in an extension of the war to the entire Near East, involving the Gulf countries in one way or another. A confrontation with the Western powers which support Israel would become unavoidable, to the Soviet Union's greatest advantage. The Qataris have long hoped for understanding from Europe in general and France in particular to enable them to avoid a head-to-head with Moscow and its allies. Hence, the disillusioned comments, stamped with bitterness, which can be heard everywhere about the French Government's Near East policy.

[French External Relations Minister] Claude Cheysson's recent statements, which were supposed to be reassuring, made both before and during his visit to the neighboring emirate of Abu Dhabi "have satisfied only those willing to be satisfied with them," Dr Hasan Kamil, minister counsellor to the ruler, told us. The government press has been denouncing France's "double talk," and the main daily newspaper AR-RAYAH has not hesitated to write that "the mask which hid Paris' partiality for the Zionist state has dropped."

The crisis of confidence goes much deeper than one may be inclined to believe. "Your government lacks credibility," a high official, who wants to remain unnamed, told us after quoting various statements deemed pro-Israeli made by Mr Cheysson and Mr Mitterrand. The "little sentence" uttered by the head of state on 9 December 1981 concerning the possibility of establishing a Palestinian state on the West Bank or in Jordan" -- that is, outside the borders of former Palestine -- is still "rankling" despite the assurance given by Mr Cheysson during an interview last week that such a state should naturally be born on the soil of the territories occupied by Israel. "We will be quite prepared to believe the French minister of external relations when he reiterates his statement in an official document to which we could refer," a personality close to the sovereign stated. According to that personality, France's sincerity will be demonstrated when Paris recognizes the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

Like the other Gulf states, Qatar has so far refrained from officially criticizing French policy. Everybody is awaiting the results of Mr Mitterrand's visit to Israel next month. "At first sight, this visit arouses suspicion inasmuch as it seems to be an expression of support for Israel's expansionist and aggressive policy," the minister counsellor to the court began. "However, in view of President Mitterrand's perspicacity and his attachment to peoples' right to self-determination, we have not given up hope that he will exert pressure on Mr Begin's government to induce it to adopt a policy of peace."

Meanwhile, everything seems to indicate that the Qatari Government has decided to "freeze" the development of its economic relations with France. Negotiations concerning certain matters have been dragging on, and the signing of contracts has been "postponed." The Renault state enterprise has been put on the Boycott Bureau blacklist because of its relations with Israel. Information Minister 'Isa Ghanim al-Kuwari, who is also head of the sovereign's office, denies any hidden motives and emphasizes that "only 300 French companies have been blacklisted, whereas more than 2,900 American companies have found themselves in a similar situation." This comparison could also serve as a warning which is especially disturbing because France is both one of the main purchases of Qatari oil and principal supplier of arms to the shaykhdom's army.

ETA GROUP ANNOUNCES RETURN TO ARMED STRUGGLE

LD251944 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] San Sebastian -- The majority wing of ETA-Politico-Militar [Basque Fatherland and Liberty Political-Military Organization], which henceforth will call itself ETA-Politico-Militar Octava Asamblea [Eighth Assembly], officially announced today that it is breaking the truce initiated a year ago and thus is returning to the armed struggle. This announcement was made at a press conference a few hours ago at an unspecified place. This wing of the terrorist organization comprises approximately 75 to 76 percent of the political-military section. As you will recall, last Monday, the 22d, the other group, the self-styled Seventh Assembly, announced that it will hold to the truce.

LABOR MINISTER MEETS WITH ANARCHIST UNION

NC222017 Paris AFP in English 1639 GMT 22 Feb 82

[Text] Madrid, 22 Feb (AFP) -- Anarchist trade unionists had an official meeting with the government here today -- the first of its kind since the end of the Spanish Civil War. The 90-minute meeting, between Labor Minister Santiago Rodriguez-Miranda and the anarchist CNT (National Labor Confederation), was called at the CNT's request.

Afterward, CNT General Secretary Jose Bondia told reporters, "For the first time in 42 years, the state and the anti-state sat down to talk." He described the meeting as signalling a "change of mood" on the government's part. Although the CNT has strongly criticised the government's trade union policy, it has also expressed the wish for normalisation of CNT-government relations.

The meeting however centered on the complicated issue of returning to the trade unions the property confiscated from them under the Franco dictatorship.

The question was the subject of an agreement last June between the government on one side and the two major unions, the pro-communist CCOO (Workers Unions) and the socialist UGT (General Workers Union), on the other.

The agreement is in two parts. First, between 1982 and 1984 the state will pay 2,400 million pesetas (about 24 million dollars) to the unions in damages. Mr Bondia however said the CNT considers the clause to be both anti-union and unconstitutional to the extent that such a subsidy might create union dependence on the state.

But he asked Mr Rodriguez-Miranda for speedy application of the second part of the agreement, covering the return to the unions of property that they owned before the civil war. The buildings and offices in question are either occupied by civil servants or vacant and dilapidated.

Mr Bondia said the CNT delegates handed Mr Rodriguez-Miranda a file with property deeds to 152 buildings throughout the country. Mr Rodriguez-Miranda, on his side, suggested to the delegates that the CNT's archives, now in Amsterdam, should be transferred to Spain to be made accessible to the public.

TALKS CONTINUE BETWEEN JUAN CARLOS, HASSAN II

LD252034 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Angel Gomes report on talks held between King Juan Carlos and King Hassan II of Morocco on 25 February in Palma de Mallorca]

[Text] The Moroccan monarch said that within the framework of the meetings he has recently been holding with Arab and Western leaders, the meeting with King Juan Carlos will be especially important since Spain is a neighboring country with which he is interested in maintaining good relations. Hassan II announced that the Moroccan Government has awarded the building of an industrial complex for the production of superphosphates worth $200 million to a Spanish-Japanese consortium which will be the biggest of its kind in the world. This was one of the bilateral subjects of greatest importance arising during the talks.

Present at the meeting were Spanish Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca and Moroccan Foreign Minister Boucetta. At no point did the talks touch on the Spanish-Moroccan conflict over Ceuta and Melilla. As for international politics, many subjects were discussed, including the situation in Egypt, the Middle East and a brief mention of the Western Sahara.

Hassan II hosted a luncheon for King Juan Carlos in the hotel where he is staying and tonight the Spanish king will host a banquet in the Marivent Palace.

GOVERNMENT WON'T OBSERVE SALVADORAN ELECTIONS

LD182326 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 18 Feb 82

[Text] The Spanish minister of foreign affairs, Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca, has concluded his official visit to Mexico. During a press conference given by the minister, Perez-Llorca said that Spain proposes as the only solution to the problem of El Salvador negotiation between the moderate sectors, excluding the radicals of both sides. Perez-Llorca said that Spain will not send observers to the elections in El Salvador and he condemned the violation of human rights by the country's junta and also the intervention of other countries in the conflict.

The Spanish minister discounted the possibility of the elections being a solution to the internal problems of El Salvador. Perez-Llorca did not condemn the sending of arms by the United States to this Central American country, but he said that Spain is setting an example by sending to the countries in the area food, medication, transportation equipment and peaceful material in general. The Spanish foreign minister also criticized the position of France as expressed in the French-Mexican declaration which recognizes the armed and political opposition in El Salvador.

FINLAND

PRIME MINISTER SEEKS EXTENSION OF USSR TREATY

[Text] In an interview published by UUSI SUOMI Sunday [21 February] Prime Minister Kalevi Sorsa said that the Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Aid Treaty between Finland and the Soviet Union should be extended as soon as possible. Sorsa pointed out that now is the right time to extend the treaty. The precise time will be decided by President Mauno Koivisto, who in his election campaign said that there is good reason to prepare to extend the treaty as such, the prime minister said.

The Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Aid Treaty was first signed in 1948 and has twice been extended -- in 1955 and 1970. Sorsa also said in the interview that he was considering whether he could remain chairman of the Socialist International's Disarmament Group now that he is Finnish prime minister.

NORWAY

WILLOCH OPPOSES WEAKENING OF TIES WITH U.S.

PM250947 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 22 Feb 82 p 3

[Excerpt] "Disagreement with U.S. policies in other parts of the world does not lessen the need for cooperation between the United States and Europe in the political and military defense of our continent. A weakening of this cooperation would mean the increased risk of attacks from the other side, or, in other words, an increased risk of catastrophe," Prime Minister Kaare Willoch said at a Young Conservative jubilee meeting this weekend.

The prime minister pointed out that at present El Salvador is the center of much Norwegian attention. "We are witnessing cruelties which we must react to very strongly. But we have no evidence for assuming the guerrillas are undisputed champions of democracy and all the guerrillas' opponents the opposite." "We have no reason," Willoch went on, "to claim that the will of the people would be victorious if only the United States ceased supporting one side in the civil war. However, we can safely assert that lasting peace and freedom in Central America can only be achieved through fundamental social and economic reforms and constructive aid. When we have to choose some line of reaction, we must never forget that the most important aim of our security policy is to ensure peace and security.

"We have a right and a duty to speak our mind when we disagree with our allies' policies," the prime minister said, "But our involvement in problems in other parts of the world must not take such a form as to unnecessarily weaken Atlantic cooperation, on which peace in our part of the world, and consequently the rest of the world, is dependent. It is this framework which gives the best foundation for our continued endeavors for freedom and human rights, both inside and outside the alliance's geographical area," Willoch stressed.

TURKISH CYPRIOTS CRITICIZE PAPANDREOU VISIT

TA251718 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] The Council of Ministers met under the chairmanship of President Rauf Denktas this morning and discussed the Cyprus issue, Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's forthcoming visit to Cyprus and its possible consequences. In a statement at the end of the meeting, Government Spokesman and Foreign Minister Kenan Atakol said Papandreou's visit is aimed at provoking the Greek Cyrpiots, stopping the ongoing intercommunal talks and internationalizing the Cyprus issue. Pointing out that this situation will make the solution of the Cyprus problem more difficult and lead to an impasse, Atakol said this adventurist attitude by the Papandreou and Greek Cypriot administration twosome shows they are not in favor of a peaceful solution to the Cyprus problem.

Atakol explained that the intercommunal talks were started following the acceptance by both sides of the document comprising Waldheim's views, adding: The Turkish Cypriot side believes the problem can be solved through the intercommunal talks and is therefore refraining from actions that would adversely affect the issue. We hope the Greek Cypriot people will not be taken in by Papandreou's wishes, abandon the intercommunal talks and become a tool of Papandreou's adventurism.

ROLANDHIS HITS TURKISH MISSING PERSONS STAND

NC251945 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis issued a statement this evening denouncing the Turkish side for filibuster tactics in the missing persons issue with the aim of foiling a substantive investigation into the fate of the missing persons. Rolandhis said the Greek Cypriot side went into the new phase of the work of the investigating committee on 10 February with good will and in a constructive spirit, hoping that the procedural problems would be resolved, mainly in view of the proposals that had been submitted by the UN secretary general's representative on the committee. Unfortunatley, the statement adds, once again the entire attempt clashed with the filibustering by the Turkish side, which not only insists on its well-known intransigent positions but also has proceeded with new refusals on the participation by observers in the meetings of the committee as was agreed upon at a meeting between the chairman of the pan-Cypriot committee of relatives of missing persons and Mr Denktas in March 1981.

Mr Rolandhis said that in a final concession for solution of the procedural issues, the Greek Cypriot side at the committee meeting of 12 February accepted in their entirety the proposals the UN secretary general's representative, Pilloud, submitted on 26 November 1981 and called on the Turkish side to do the same so that the committee's investigation task may begin. However, he went on, the Turkish side persistently refuses to accept these proposals, thus leading the committee to a deadlock.

Under these circumstances, the statement adds, the government, with the agreement of the committee of missing persons' relatives, has no choice but to denounce this negative stand by the Turkish side, which, as has been proven, seeks endless discussions on procedural matters with the objective of foiling the start of the substantive investigation into the fate of missing persons. Mr Rolandhis concluded: The government, with the cooperation of the committee of missing persons' relatives, is making an assessment of the situation and will take the necessary measures toward the appropriate promotion of the issue.

PAPANDREOU WARNS MILITARY AGAINST INTERFERENCE

NC251412 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Prime Minister and Minister of National Defense Papandreou defined the goals of Greece's national strategy in a very important speech delivered at the Pentagon today to senior officers of the three branches of the general staff. Mr Papandreou among other things said the country's defense policy is linked fully with its domestic policy. He stressed that strategy must be formulated on the basis of national interests within the framework of the correlation of forces locally and worldwide.

The prime minister reiterated the Greek stance on participation in NATO by stressing that guaranteed eastern borders and receipt of military aid are necessary to preserve the balance of peace in the Aegean. The Aegean, Cyprus and Hellenism, Mr Papandreou added, are linked issues. The basic axis of foreign policy is close cooperation with the Arab world and the Greek desire for detente, peace and arms limitation.

To the armed forces in particular, Prime Minister Papandreou stressed the need to preserve discipline and allegiance among the cadres. He stressed that any undermining of his work that may arise through armed forces' interference in politics will not be tolerated.

NC251542 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Statement by Prime Minister Papandreou released by Greek Embassy in Nicosia]

[Text] The excerpt of my interview in yesterday's FINANCIAL TIMES concerning the Cyprus issue is not contrary to our acceptance of the bicommunal dialogue under UN auspices. It aimed only at pointing out:

A. The fact that, even though many years have lapsed since the beginning of the dialogue, not even an approximately acceptable just solution of the Cyprus issue has resulted.

B. Although the dialogue is being conducted formally between the two communities, in essence it is a Nicosia-Ankara dialogue.

As also follows from our joint statement of last Monday, both President Kiprianou and I agree that all possibilities of the present dialogue should be exhausted, even if for the above reasons we are not possessed by optimism, while at the same time we have undertaken initiatives at international levels.

Finally, it should be stressed that even under ideal conditions the dialogue between the two communities concerns only the internal aspect of the Cyprus issue. There is always -- and it is predominant -- the international aspect, which is that 36.3 percent of Cyprus territory is occupied by Turkish armed forces.

JOURNALISTS CRITICIZE GREEK MOVES AGAINST PRESS

TA251723 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] The Ankara Journalists Association president, Beyhan Cenkci, has told the International Journalists Union that the Greek Government is obstructing the functioning of Turkish journalists. In an application following the Greek request to expel a Turkish journalist in Athens, Cem Basar, Cenkci said the Greek Government is creating a closed society by destroying the press bridges that link the nations of the free world. Pointing out that the attitude adopted toward Turkish journalists in Greece could spread and threaten the representatives of the entire free world press, Cenkci noted: A warning by the free world press organizations to Greek Prime Minister Papandreou could avert a dangerous move aimed at creating abysses between communities.

PROSECUTOR CHARGES DISK AFFILIATED WITH TCP

TA251618 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1545 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] Istanbul, 25 Feb (AA) -- Martial law court of Istanbul was told Wednesday that DISK [Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions] leaders were affiliated with the illegal Turkish Communist Party [TCP]. The military prosecutor reading out the 817 page indictment said the cassettes found at DISK headquarters included [word indistinct] "Voice of TCP" radio, he said, adding that TCP publications had been distributed to workers through DISK.

COURT RATIFIES DEATH SENTENCE ON KILLER OF 7

TA251725 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Text] The Military Court of Appeals has ratified the death penalty passed by the 1st Military Court of the Ankara Martial Law Command on Ali Bulent Orkan, one of the suspects in the Piyangotepe massacre. Orkan and his two friends on 16 May 1979 entered a coffee house in Ankara's Etlik Piyangotepe district, forced the occupants to lie down and fired shots at random. Seven persons were killed and another two were wounded in the incident.

BRIEFS

OECD LOAN AGREEMENT -- An agreement on a $19 million loan from Austria within the framework of the OECD special aid program has been signed in Vienna. The loan will be used to import raw materials, durable goods and equipment for hydroelectric power stations. [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 18 Feb 82 TA]

EXPORT, IMPORT FIGURES -- According to the State Statistics Institute, export of industrial goods during 1981 grew by 118 percent in comparison with 1980. Agricultural exports, on the other hand, increased by 33 percent and mined exports by 1 percent. Of $4.70 billion in exports in 1981, industrial exports contributed $2.29 billion. Tobacco was the largest agricultural export, increasing by 69 percent over exports the year before. Imports during 1981 reached $8.91 billion. This represents an increase of 16 percent in comparison to 1980. [Text] [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 17 Feb 82 TA]

EXPORT OF SEA PRODUCTS -- An Agriculture and Forestry Ministry official has said that out of a total of 460,241 tons of sea products caught, 12,145 tons worth 3.441 billion liras were exported in 1981. [Andara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1500 GMT 22 Feb 82 TA]

WORKER REMITTANCES -- Remittances to Turkey by Turkish workers abroad totaled $2.5 billion in 1981. This amount had decreased to an average of $982 million a year between 1976 and 1978. [Ankara ANATOLIA in French 1525 GMT 22 Feb 82 TA]

STATE INVESTMENTS -- Investment in state-owned companies reached 677 billion liras in 1981, government sources said. The total is expected to reach 921 billion in 1982. The largest investment will be made in the field of energy, to be followed by investments in manufacturing, transportation and agriculture. [Ankara ANATOLIA in French 1605 GMT 22 Feb 82 TA]

TOURISM REVENUES -- Turkey's net revenues from tourism in 1981 totaled $282 million. Some 1.45 million tourists visited Turkey last year. This is an increase of 170,000 over the year before. [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 23 Feb 82 TA]

CHILEAN COMMUNIST PARTY CHAIRMAN VISITS VIENNA

AU010936 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 27 Feb 82 p 2

[Text] Vienna -- On 26 February a meeting was held in Vienna between Comrade Luis Corvalan, chairman of the Communist Party of Chile, and the representatives of the Austrian Communist Party [KPOE]. On the KPOE's side, the talks were attended by: Comrade Franz Muhri, party chairman; Comrade Michael Graber, politburo member; Comrade Hans Steiner, Central Committee member and head of its Foreign Relations Department; and Comrade Wolfgang Rainer, Central Committee member and chairman of the Austrian Community Youth [KJOE]. The meeting provided an opportunity for an intensive exchange of information about the political development in Chile and in Austria, about the Austrian communists; initiatives to defend the interests of the working people against the state-monopolist exploitation system, and about the Chilean communists' and antifascists' struggle against the rascist Pinochet regime. In this context, the KPOE representatives expressed their close solidarity with the fraternal Chilean Party. Both sides firmly rejected the policy of imperialist interference pursued by the United States in favor of keeping in power fascist military regimes in Latin America. It is particularly the U.S. military aid for the military dictatorship in El Salvador which constitutes a brutal violation of international law and human rights.

Both sides expressed the gravest concern regarding the Reagan administration's armament policy and confrontation course. On the other hand, they welcomed the repeated endeavors of the Soviet Union to achieve an arms freeze on the basis of security for all sides, and to ensure a continuation of the process of detente. In this context the importance of the peace movement was also underscored. Both parties agreed that it was necessary to firmly support the PZPR and the Warsaw Government in their endeavors to overcome the economic and social crisis, to defend socialism, to complete the process of renewal and to avoid internationalization of the problems that have developed there. Likewise, they stressed the need for increasing the endeavors to strengthen the cohesion of the communist world movement and to find new forms of collaboration of all anti-imperialist forces. The talks were held in a climate of fraternal affinity.

MBFR SESSION CONSIDERS NEW EASTERN PLAN

[Text] At the East-West troop reduction conference in Vienna, the NATO countries yesterday promised to carefully study the new Eastern two-phase plan submitted last week, but in a first reaction pointed out that essential demands of the West were not given consideration in this plan. NATO adheres to its basic view that a settlement of the controversial data question is an inalienable prerequisite for controlled troop reductions. FRG chief delegate Ambassador Walter Boss, who was the only speaker at the 297th session, outlined the Western viewpoint and assured that the NATO countries would conscientiously examine to what extent the new Eastern initiative could bring progress at the Vienna conference. He said it was to be welcomed that the East was not proceeding from a collective basis as regards freezing the numerical strength of armed forces between phases one and two, as had been demanded from the very beginning by the West.

The West German chief delegate demanded that within the framework of the collective ceilings to be fixed for both sides, each should be able to freely determine the extent of each participating country's contribution to the reduction in line with requirements, and that these quotas should not be stipulated in advance. On 18 February, the Warsaw Pact countries had submitted a modified two-phase plan which, in their opinion, goes a very long way toward meeting Western views and opens good chances for leading the Vienna conference out of the cul de sac. According to this proposal, the United States is to reduce its troops in Central Europe by 13,000 men in phase one, while the Soviet Union would reduce its troops by 20,000 soldiers. In phase two all other direct participants in the Vienna negotiations are to reduce their troop strength. For each side, a collective ceiling of 900,000 men is to be agreed on.

SCHMIDT VIEWS DOMESTIC, FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

PM241525 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Feb 82 pp 1, 4

[Jacques Amalric and Bernard Brigouleix interview with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn: "Any West German Leader Always Bears in Mind Our 16 Million Compatriots Living On the Other Side of the Dividing Line" -- date not given]

[Text] [Question] The growth of pacifism in West Germany and the caution with which you reacted to the Warsaw coup aroused some strong feelings in France. We would first like to ask you whether there is a risk of seeing the FRG sink into some kind of isolationism, of national neutralism? Of course you do not agree with that analysis, but can you explain your position to us?

[Answer] I certainly do not agree. I do not agree either with the terminology or with the idea that such dangers might exist. Of course any German political leader always bears in mind the 16 million Germans living on the other side of the dividing line. Any Frenchman should understand that because, if France were divided, every Frenchman would think of his compatriots on the other side too. Anybody who did not behave in that way would be immoral. But that does not lead to any kind of neutralism.

It is because the 60 million Germans living in the FRG do not want to come under the communist system that they joined the Atlantic alliance and remain faithful to it. Recent opinions polls showed that almost 80 percent of West Germans are in favor of a close alliance with the West. That is an enormous majority. It would be interesting to know whether there was such a big majority in favor of the alliance in France. This is due to the fact that Germans absorb news from the other half of Germany almost every day, and most of it is not very pleasant; quite the reverse, most of it is terrible. They are aware of what is at stake for them.

Regarding pacifism, it is possible that among young intellectuals we have a higher percentage of conscientious objectors than other countries. That is probable. I do not know the exact figures for the United States has abolished conscription. That is an easier solution than placing that burden on young people.

[Question] It is a very difficult distinction to draw.

[Answer] I realize that. But the same situation exists in East Germany; there are demonstrations by a peace movement in the communist part of the country too. And that is natural. The people in the two halves of the country know that they are living on the central theater of a potential war. The people in the two parts of the country know that the preservation of peace does not depend on them.

Some 25 years ago I was already dealing with defense policy in parliament. When I met French people or other European neighbors, I was sometimes asked suspiciously whether a new militarism was not emerging in Germany. So, I beg you, take care in your criticism: You used to fear a new German militarism, and history has shown that you were wrong. Do not be overcritical of alleged pacifism, because history will prove you wrong. Do not criticize the Germans from two extreme viewpoints, which cancel each other out and neither of which reflects the facts.

I do not believe that we have too many pacifists. You should not confuse what is called the peace movement with pacifism. It is something different.

[Question] Do you think that the specific nature of the German situation resulting from the partition could be more important than the Iron Curtain and the FRG's place in the West?

[Answer] There is a specific nature, but it is not more important than the Iron Curtain. Our special situation is the result of the Iron Curtain's existence, of the country's division. There is no other divided country in Europe. Of course, underlying the suspicions which can be detected in your questions is the fact that, if united, the two parts of Germany would have 75 million inhabitants, which is a large number compared with the other European nations. That is why some people who claim to recognize German national aspirations would be extremely worried if reunification really became a practical possibility.

[Question] From an economic viewpoint, that would be an enormous power.

[Answer] Yes, economically speaking, but also in terms of manpower and in military terms. But I wash my hands of that. The German constitution states that Germans should be unified again. Nobody knows when that will happen, but anybody in office like me who has taken an oath on the constitution is obliged to respect the constitution's preamble.

[Question] For a long time relations between Bonn and East Berlin developed parallel with East-West relations. We now have the impression that the former are much better than the latter.

[Answer] No they are not good, they are not even normal. When I saw Honecker (East German Communist Party first secretary) I openly told journalists on East German soil that we were still a long way from good-neighborly relations, that we had not yet reached reasonable relations. We are a long way from them.

"No Question of Punishing My Compatriots"

[Question] What were your feelings on the morning of 13 December when you learned of the events in Poland while visiting East Germany? Did you think of leaving immediately?

[Answer] No, I did not think of that. It was entirely out of the question. Why should I have punished my German compatriots for something which had just happened in another country? Something about which I really had no reliable information that Sunday morning. No, there was no question of that. When I speak of punishing my compatriots, it is because they had been hoping for that visit for a long time. I personally was motivated by the desire to give hope and confidence in their future to the 16 million Germans living on the other side.

That was the reason for my visit. And I think I succeeded. Why should I have destroyed that because of the Polish tragedy? The GDR had clearly not sent troops into Poland, and it obviously had no influence over what was happening in Warsaw. I had the impression that Honecker was as surprised as I. In retrospect, the secret services invent many things and tell the flabbergasted world that they knew everything in advance. But I saw no secret service telling any government chief before 13 December that something of that kind was being planned for that date.

[Question] What is your position on the problem of the Polish debt?

[Answer] I am sorry, but I cannot answer that.

[Question] And what is your position on the sanctions requested by the United States?

[Answer] There is not the slightest difference between our position and the French position. And I think that they, like us, will not change it.

[Question] Do you think that sanctions could be used effectively as a means of exerting pressure on the Soviet and Polish authorities?

[Answer] It is difficult to extrapolate on the basis of the Polish tragedy. It was a tragedy long before 13 December. It was an economic and psychological tragedy. The events of 13 December, the shootings -- all that came in addition to the existing factors.

I do not think that the West can do anything, but it should morally condemn the proclamation of martial law, the arrest of 6,000 people and the break in dialogue between the state, the church and Solidarity. We should call for those three measures to be reversed. In addition, the West should continue its economic aid when the Polish military government has met those demands. The Poles will then need economic aid to remedy their very difficult economic situation.

At present I feel very very deep compassion for the Polish nation -- very deep compassion. I think that feeling is shared by very many Germans. They are sending several tens of thousands of food parcels to Poland, worth DM100 million. Those are personal, individual initiatives. That is a great deal; there is great compassion in this country and also a feeling of impotence. What practical steps can we take to improve the situation in Poland? Nobody really knows.

[Question] What do you think about Mr Wehner's (chairman of the SPD Bundestag Group) trip to Warsaw?

[Answer] I am anxious to hear what he has to say on his return.

[Question] Did he go there with your blessing?

[Answer] I was not informed of that visit in advance. He is not a government member.

The Threat of a World Depression

[Question] East-West relations are not everything. In the past few years we have witnessed the start of North-South dialogue. Do you think it could be extended?

[Answer] Yes, it would be a great mistake to transfer East-West tension into North-South relations. The world economic recession which could turn into a depression is affecting the Third World's economic capacities and well-being in a much more acute way than it is affecting our own economic achievements, be it in France, Germany, The Netherlands, Italy or Britain.

There are East-West tensions, especially between the two superpowers. There are tensions stemming from the Polish tragedy, which affect your people, my people and others too. But we should not ignore the fact that the world economic situation is equally dangerous. We are experiencing the highest unemployment level since 1936. We have the highest interest rates ever seen in all the European countries. So far nobody has put forward a remedy. There are partial and national remedies, but so far nobody has made a great general effort to end the recession which threatens to take on proportions comparable to that of the thirties. This problem is discussed much too little and other questions much too much. Unemployment in the Northern Hemisphere and famine in the Southern Hemisphere are leading to a social and political destabilization which increases the chances of communist influence and other destabilizing influences.

[Question] France has just signed what we call a political agreement on gas with Algeria. Would you be prepared to sign a similar agreement?

[Answer] I am not sufficiently well acquainted with the terms of that agreement to answer your question. But I can tell you that I am in favor of stabilizing the export prices of raw materials from developing countries. I do not know whether the French-Algerian agreement goes in that direction, but I think it does.

[Question] Are you optimistic about the outcome of the Soviet-American negotiations in Geneva, or do you regard them as a show?

[Answer] If it was just a show it would be a major disaster. My impression is that the Russians and Americans are having serious negotiations. They intend to reach an agreement. I presume that they both know that there is still a great deal to be done before a compromise can be reached.

We Germans made great efforts in 1977, 1978 and early 1979 to persuade the Americans not to ignore the deployment of the Soviet SS-20 missiles. We also made great efforts, once the NATO decision to restore the balance of forces had been taken, to convince the Soviet Union that it was in its interest to negotiate reciprocal limitations rather than launch into an arms race. Of course, from the German viewpoint, the mutual zero option would be the most desirable one because we do not particularly want to have new nuclear arms on our territory. But it is absolutely vital for a balance to be attained in this sphere. It is difficult to make predictions, but we do not have much time: At the end of 1983, if no agreement is reached, the American Pershing II and Cruise missiles will be deployed in Europe, and some of them will be deployed on German territory. Nobody can doubt that I will stand by that decision.

The Russians have deployed some 300 mobile SS-20 missiles, each armed with three independent nuclear warheads, and there is nothing of that kind on the West European or American side. That imbalance must be corrected. In this connection, while the two superpowers are seated at the negotiating table in Geneva they should refrain from any propaganda aimed at countries which are not involved and from any public statements which in no way serve those negotiations.

Before the SPD Congress

[Question] Do you think that your personal position on this subject will be strengthened at the end of your party's congress next April?

[Answer] My personal position cannot be changed. I have just obtained a vote of confidence in parliament after explaining that I was demanding confidence for two main reasons: The policy of security in Europe on the one hand and the economic policy on the other. Everybody understood what I was talking about. There are some people in my party who are criticizing those two policies, but they realize that they do not have very much room to maneuver if the facts are taken into account.

[Question] Do you expect a very tough debate, with major divisions?

[Answer] I do expect a debate, but not too tough a one. You should not attach too much importance to a congress. Neither the French nor the German constitution states that governments are directed by party congresses. The opposition parties regard their congresses as very important. Government parties ultimately realize that what really counts is having a majority in parliament, and I think I have that; everybody can see it.

[Question] And how do you view the situation between the Social Democrats and the liberals?

[Answer] They are different parties with different histories, different programs and different electorates. They are certainly not twins nor even brothers, but allies. And you sometimes have small debates among allies. What happens in foreign policy also happens in domestic policy. That does not mean that the alliance is going to collapse, that the coalition is going to collapse. Democracy involves giving interviews and making speeches, and sometimes some of them can produce misunderstandings. Some misunderstandings are very serious. For instance, if you think that Germany will one day abandon its positions in the defense and security sphere or in the sphere of disarmament negotiations, you are mistaken.

[Question] As a Social Democrat, do you think it is possible to have an outside influence on Soviet-type societies without arguing in terms of armaments?

[Answer] My answer is affirmative, although it could only be a limited influence which could make itself felt gradually over a long period.

[Question] Can you give us an example?

[Answer] Contemporary French literature is translated into Russian and published in the Soviet Union. The same applies to contemporary German literature.

Obviously that has an influence. It will not change the structure of Soviet society overnight. It will not change the structure of communist governments or parties, but it has an influence.

That is what I mean by a long period. The same is true of scientific, economic and technological exchanges. I was born and raised in an old commercial city where there is a proverb saying that commerce and economic trade facilitate the establishment of peace by forcing people to talk, to understand each other and depend on each other. Nonetheless, although there are influences, they are, of course, modest compared with the Soviet Union's needs. What we are witnessing in Poland is a crisis in the Soviet-style communist system due to its inability to adapt to the needs of human nature, the trends and needs of a modern society and economy. That system is too rigid to change, adapt and reform. I think that the strongest influences from the West would be beneficial for the peoples living there, but those influences will not be strengthened very quickly.

French-German Cooperation: A Fundamental Need

[Question] How have relations developed between the FRG and the new government majority in France? What kind of relations do you have with Mr Mitterrand? Is it still possible to talk of preferential relations between Paris and Bonn?

[Answer] I have never had the slightest difficulty in adapting to changes of majority when they take place in friendly countries. It is a normal phenomenon which occurs in all countries from time to time, even though it has not occurred in Germany for 12 years.

I do not have the slightest difficulty in listening to Francois Mitterrand or in talking to him. We are about to have our eighth meeting. Since he took office we have had many hours of high-level political exchanges and discussions, on East-West relations, the Near East, intra-European relations, Poland, and the Soviet Union.

I think that the president and his government on the French side and my government and I on the German side will cooperate as harmoniously and with as much mutual understanding as in the 1970's. It is a fundamental necessity for Europe and, consequently also for France for close friendship and alliance to exist between the French and the Germans. It is also a necessity for us Germans. That is understood by the political elite on both sides of the border, be they conservatives, liberals, Social Democrats or socialists; that is why I am really confident about cooperation between our two countries. And I know that my views are shared by your president.

[Question] Are you optimistic about French-German cooperation in intra-European affairs? On the common agricultural policy, the British contribution to the European budget, relations with the United States?

[Answer] Difficulties have arisen several times in the EEC over the past 25 years. They arise, are solved and forgotten. From time to time, as is now the case, the problems are a little more acute, especially since all the EEC members have economic and financial difficulties. But I think that we will overcome those problems, and there is certainly no gulf between the attitudes and opinions which France and Germany have on those questions.

Regarding relations with the United States -- trade negotiations or monetary relations -- France and Germany do not have divergent views either. We view the situation in the same way. No, I think it would be rather difficult to find spheres in which a fundamental difference of views could be detected. Of course, you will sometimes find a specific subject on which we place different emphases. There are also structural differences between France and Germany. For instance, France has nuclear weapons. Germany has none and does not want to join that category of countries. That gives France a different influence from Germany in international affairs.

On the other hand, the French need not only Germany but also German soldiers in planning France's defense. Thus they are, in a way, dependent on the Germans' military contribution, just as we are dependent on the contribution made by the French and the other allies.

We are also agreed on the peaceful use of nuclear energy -- a sphere in which France has made great progress and is leading the way -- and on the need to promote high-technology industries in Europe. For instance, the airbus is busy imposing itself on the international markets.

The Fate of the Franco-German Tank

[Question] With regard to joint projects, what is the position on the Franco-German tank project?

[Answer] That is one of the examples I was seeking to show that there can also be exceptions. But not everything is yet clear, and a final decision has not been made. I am trying to influence the parliamentary defense commission to reverse its conclusions in the interest of even closer cooperation between Paris and Bonn. I am thinking of a process by which cooperation would be possible. But some obstacles are not the result of different policies; they are due to the fact that the Germans do not need a new tank at present. The Leopard tank will serve throughout the 1980's and for the early 1990's. The French, however, clearly need a new tank much earlier -- a decade before the Germans. In addition, you want to export that tank and hence you do not want an excessively heavy tank. Now we have designed our Leopard II for the geography and topography of Central Europe, to defend our own territory. It is a rather heavy tank, while you are in favor of a lighter vehicle. I hope that the two countries' experts will meet again to see whether it is possible to design a whole family of tanks, rather like families of aircraft -- one being developed on the basis of the other. I am not a tank expert and I must therefore not allow my imagination to run away with me, but you can see that I have not yet given up hope completely. I will certainly be criticized in parliament for what I have just told you, but I think that French-German cooperation is sometimes certainly worth risking some criticism.

[Question] Have you stayed in contact with Mr Giscard d'Estaing as he has just stated in an interview to PARIS MATCH and STERN?

[Answer] I am not accustomed to dropping my friends when they leave the stage. Of course it is now a strictly personal relationship; that is the case with former leaders of other countries such as former President Ford, whom I like to meet from time to time, whom I regard as my friend and with whom I worked very closely when he was in office. Personal friendship is something which we should cultivate in today's difficult circumstances.

[Question] Some French leaders once again seem interested in the idea of a European defense system and in reviving the Western European Union (WEU).

[Answer] The Germans were prepared to do that back in the early 1950's when the WEU became a new tool in Western Europe's defense and security. Germany was then prepared to expand the WEU within the framework of the Atlantic alliance. Today I see no objection in principle from the German side but, on the other hand, I see objections from the French side owing to France's status as a nuclear power. That is why I wonder whether those ideas you mention could be turned into official French policy. If that were the case, we would be interested.

The Europeans Should Make Their Voice Heard

[Question] Do you think that the Atlantic alliance needs to be changed? Do you think it would be useful to have a stronger European voice in face of the United States?

[Answer] I am not in favor of an institutional change in the alliance.

In reply to the criticisms which can now be heard I will repeat what I told you concerning the EEC problems: Problems arise, are solved and disappear. I have been hearing about a NATO crisis since the 1950's. In 1956 I met Senator Mike Mansfield in the American Congress for the first time when he was already recommending the withdrawal of American troops from Europe. That shows how old the problems are. The European's voice is strong enough if they take care to make it heard. There are 15 members of the alliance, 13 of which are Europeans. Why do they not speak if they want to be heard? That does not require an institutional change. Nor should it be confused with some kind of free-for-all [foire]. We must listen to what the others say. Sometimes the ability and will to listen is stronger, sometimes weaker. It would now be useful to cultivate the will to listen.

[Question] Most French people have the impression that the EEC is experiencing a major crisis, a structural crisis, and that we are not dealing with just regional or technical problems.

[Answer] I understand that feeling. The same is true in the United States with regard to the Atlantic alliance, but I will not exaggerate it. Neither of the two problems could be solved if Germany and France were opposed. If they are not opposed, the problems will be solved. Only one problem has arisen in the alliance: that was in the 1960's when General de Gaulle withdrew France from the NATO military organization. That was a really major crisis. Nobody talks about it today and everybody has realized that France, whether it is a member of the alliance only or of the integrated military organization, is a partner as worthy of confidence as in the past. That is the most significant example which can be found of a structural crisis in NATO. It was NATO's only real institutional crisis and it has virtually been forgotten. It did not undermine the alliance's capacity to jointly deter the Soviet superpower.

[Question] Will you be discussing U.S. policy in Central America in your talks with Francois Mitterrand?

[Answer] If I were, I would not say so publicly in advance.

[Question] Do you think that it is a regional crisis or a new chapter in the cold war?

[Answer] It is a regional crisis with factors connected with the cold war. Soviet influence in Cuba and Cuban influence in Central American should not be underestimated. But I really do not want to become involved in that question; I have too many problems to become involved in other people's.

[Question] Would you sell arms to Nicaragua?

[Answer] No. I would not. Germany has a different arms sales policy from France. We concentrate solely on Atlantic pact members. There are a few exceptions to that rule but not many, and we would certainly not sell arms to regions of tension where there is an imminent danger of fighting.

[Question] The German press has expressed anxiety over your health....

[Answer] I am in good health.

GOVERNMENT TO GO AHEAD WITH USSR GAS DEAL

NC281332 Paris AFP in English 1323 GMT 23 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 28 Feb (AFP) -- West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has reaffirmed the determination of his government to go ahead with a contract to buy gas from the Soviet Union. He told the Dutch HAAGSCHE COURANT paper today that "the American Government has so far not explained either to the French of West German Governments that it was opposed to the contract". But he added that he wanted to make it clear "that in any case it would not have influenced our determination to go ahead with this contract, as is the case for the French".

SCHMIDT 'CRITICAL' OF U.S. INTEREST RATES

LD261932 Hamburg DPA in German 1801 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 26 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has strongly underlined the SPD's role as a party of wage and salary earners, while at the same time warning against losing its ability to govern. Speaking in Bonn today at the Conference of the Social Democratic Working Group for Questions of Wage and Salary Earners, the chancellor said that although the SPD must continue its dialogue with other social groups, its proper and crucial function is to represent the interests of wage and salary earners.

The chancellor was distinctly critical of U.S. economic policy, and with reference to his agreement on this point achieved during the latest German-French summit with President Mitterrand, called for a lowering of the high U.S. interest rates. "Nothing would be more important" for restoring the health of the world economy. Schmidt likewise strongly rejected U.S. reservations about the European-Soviet natural gas pipeline deals. "We will not let ourselves be pushed into economic warfare." The Federal Republic depends on the import of raw materials and energy from all parts of the world and on selling the finished products abroad. "This is how we Germans make our living." Alluding to U.S. budget policy, the chancellor added: "Large arms expenditure is no compensation for the depression of all investment goods industries."

POLITICIANS INVESTIGATED IN 'DONATIONS SCANDAL'

LD261236 Hamburg DPA in German 1150 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Text] Bonn, 26 Feb (DPA) -- In the party donations scandal the Bonn Public Prosecutor's Office has now started investigation proceedings against nine politicans and business managers following the conclusion of preliminary investigations. According to a statement by the Public Prosecutor's Office on Friday, the investigation proceedings are against Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff, Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, Secretary in the Chancellor's Office Manfred Lahnstein, Former Federal Economics Minister Hans Friedrichs, Baden-Wuerttemburg Economics Minister Horst Ludwig Riemer. In addition, investigations have been instituted against the shareholders and managing directors of the Flick concern, Friedrich Karl Flick, Eberhard von Brauchitsch and Manfred Nemitz.

The Bonn Public Prosecutor's Office spokesman said that following the conclusion of the investigation the Public Prosecutor's Office will decide "whether there are grounds for a public prosecution or whether the case should be dropped for lack of evidence." Further details cannot be given in order not to prejudice the investigation.

Schmidt Confident in Ministers

LD261844 Hamburg DPA in German 1736 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 26 Feb (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Schmidt has clearly expressed his confidence in the politicians affected by the investigations into the party donations affair. Speaking in Bonn today at the Social Democratic Working Group for Questions Concerning Wage and Salary Earners, he said that everything must be done to help establish the facts. "Let me say quite clearly," he said, "that my confidence in these men is not in the least affected by this."

The Bonn Public Prosecutor's Office had "got Federal Economics Minister Lambsdorff, Federal Finance Minister Matthoefer and the head of the chancellor's office, Lahnstein, talked about." Although he did not wish to criticize the investigations it was known that "Public Prosecutor's Office could on occasion miscalculate mightily."

MARCHAIS CITES IMPERIALISM IN POLISH SPEECH

PM251403 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 22 Feb 82 p 6

[Extract from 21 February Nice speech by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais: "Imperialism Is Using the Events in Poland To Sow Discord"]

[Text] Not a day goes by anymore without imperialism -- and above all American imperialism -- causing more clouds to gather over the peace of a mankind. This is not a sign of strength on its part. Quite the reverse, it is evidence of its crisis. Its aggressiveness is the expression of the difficulties it is encountering faced by a world over which it is gradually losing its hold under pressure from the peoples.

That is why, at the price of an enormous propaganda campaign, imperialism is trying to sow discord, to transform its victims into executioners. If its spokesmen are to be believed, the socialist countries are the modern form of hell, the peoples' liberation gains are a manifestation of a subversion that is imperiling civilization and Reagan is the knight in shining armor of human rights and the last bastion of peace!

Imperialism is naturally currently seizing on the events in Poland to get this campaign going again. It is stirring up hate and resentment, making more and more provocative statements and preaching violence and agitation.

Needless to say, we shall not follow this path. The tragedy that Poland is experiencing cannot have caused more distress nor indeed could be more distressing to anyone than to us communists. How, moreover, could it be otherwise? How, could we, who hold Poland very dear, who are fighting for socialism -- which is another way of saying: for the happiness of the men and women of today -- how could we see events, which include the suspension of fundamental freedoms, arrests, internments and deaths, calmly take place in that country?

It is precisely this sensitivity of ours with regard to the Polish situation that has determined and determines our attitude. We do not want the blood of Polish workers to flow. We have said that nothing likely to lead a civil war or cause the internationalization of the conflict should be done. This position is a responsible and humane one. Nothing will make us change it.

Naturally, our concern to do everything within our power to facilitate a peaceful and democratic solution of the Polish crisis in no way means that we are pushing into the background the need for the economic, social and democratic reforms that are indispensible if the problems that have arisen are to be overcome.

It would be inconceivable and unacceptable for Poland to head for a situation similar to that which existed before August 1980. At the moment Poland has to be able to forge ahead along the path of radical change which would also facilitate social justice in obtaining the well-being of workers; and finally, to deepen socialist democracy, which involves the participation of everyone, including truly independent trade unions acting in the interests of the workers and socialism.

We are sure that this wish is widely shared in our country today.

COMMUNIST PARTY DELEGATION GOING TO PRC IN MARCH

NC262327 Paris AFP in English 2321 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 26 Feb (AFP) -- A delegation of the French Communist Party will go to China on a seven-day visit March 3 at the invitation of the Chinese Communist Party, it was announced today.

"The two parties have agreed to hold in-depth talks in the course of this visit on all questions of common interest," the French Communist Party secretariat said.

The French delegation, led by Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz, will include committee member Henri Malberg and Alain Roux of the committee's External Politics Section, the announcement said.

MITTERRAND RETURNS FROM 2-DAY VISIT TO ITALY

NC272039 Paris AFP in English 1943 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Paris, 27 Feb (AFP) -- President Francois Mitterrand returned tonight from a 48-hour official visit in Rome where he enlisted Italian support for Franco-German attempts at arresting the flow of European capital to the United States. Mr. Mitterrand, who saw Italian President Sandro Pertini and Premier Giovanni Spadolini, also discussed ways to end a dispute over exports to France of cheap Italian wines resented by French vintners.

The French president, who was welcomed back here by Premier Pierre Mauroy, also conferred with Italian communist leader Enrico Berlinguer and Pope John Paul III.

BAKHTIAR ATTACK TRIAL SESSION SUSPENDED

NC251843 Paris AFP in English 1830 GMT 25 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Paris, 25 Feb (AFP) -- Four of five men accused of trying to murder former Iranian Prime Minister Shapur Bakhtiar refused to take part in their trial today and were expelled following a rowdy opening of the proceedings. One of the accused, saying he feared an attempt on his life, remained in the dock at the trail, whose opening was delayed because one defendant refused to get dressed to go to court.

The defendants eventually arrived shouting in Arabic, French and English, then tried to leave the dock when three women were chosen to serve on the jury. "Islam doesn't allow a woman to be judge. We reject all the women," the alleged commando leader Anis Naqqash, a 30-year-old Lebanese, shouted as the defendants struggled with police. Mr. Naqqash was then led off by police as the judge suspended the session. After the initial disturbances the hearing was suspended for an hour. Mr Naqqash, who had earlier demanded unsuccessfully to make a political statement, then announced he would not listen to the indictment. He, Mr. Tabriz, Mr Kaara, and Mr Jenab stood up and said they were leaving the courtroom to start an indefinite hunger strike. Mr Satari, however, announced that was dissociating himself from his co-accused.

"I am afraid of being murdered here or in prison," Mr. Satari said. "My lawyers also can kill me. Anyone can kill me with the blessing of the French secret service." After the departure of the four accused, their lawyers, Antoine Comte and Hubert Jabot, announced they were resigning from the case. The court thereupon appointed another defense counsel, Jelul Ikhlef.

Afterward the hearing was adjourned, Mr. Comte and Mr Jabot told reporters the basics of the statement that Mr Naqqash had wanted to read out. He said he had come to Paris to "carry out the death sentence pronounced by an Islamic court" and he had not hesitated to do it in France "for God's service knows no frontiers." He accused France of duplicity by sheltering "a criminal and renegade" like Mr Bakhtiar. "If you protect him," the statement said, "suffer the consequences."

INITIAL ESTIMATES SHOW 1981 ARMS EXPORTS DOWN

PM251255 Paris LE MONDE in French 25 Feb 82 p 12

[Text] According to initial indications obtained from the General Office for Armaments, exports of French arms were markedly lower in 1981 than in 1980. Foreign orders recorded were markedly down in 1981 compared with 1980. Foreign orders recorded totaled around Fr32 billion in 1981 compared with Fr37.3 billion the previous year, in other words a drop of more than 14 percent at the present value of the franc.

The initial estimate of the 1981 total still has to be turned into an accurate figure by the official departments, which do not rule out the possibility that the figure might reach around Fr35 billion when all the contracts signed have been assembled.

Nonetheless, the General Office for Armaments admits that 1981 marked time compared with 1980 and did so more during the second half than the first, when foreign orders totaled Fr20 billion. Thus trade tended to slow down during the last months of 1981 compared with 1980, which was a rather exceptional year.

Slump for Aircraft

The results recorded in 1981 seem to be partly explained by a slump observed in the aeronautical and naval spheres. Indeed, the fall is very marked in aircraft sales, which were reduced to 16 Mirage III and 30 Alpha-Jets for Egypt, 3 Mirage III for Peru and 6 Alpa-Jets for Cameroon. Although the Dassault-Breguet Company received foreign orders totalling more than Fr12.7 billion in 1981 compared with Fr9 billion in 1980, that increase in aeronautical sales is due mainly to export orders for civil aircraft like the Falcon-20 series and above all the Falcon-50 trijet transport.

In the naval sphere, of course, the 1981 drop comes after a boost in foreign orders in 1980 connected with the "Sawari" contract with Saudi Arabia relating to four frigates and two tanker-supply ships which, at the time, was worth Fr14.4 billion.

The size of orders for all models of tactical missiles in 1981 did not make it possible to counterbalance the drop in the aeronautical and naval spheres, still less that of ground equipment. The General Office for Armaments thinks that 1982 could see foreign orders picking up in the aeronautical sphere, particularly with the sale of Mirage-2000 aircraft to Egypt and India.

In principle the final statistics for these foreign orders for French military equipment will be handed to parliament's specialized defense commissions in April. Indeed Defense Minister Charles Hernu has stated several times that the chairmen and report writers of the national assembly and senate commissions would henceforth be kept regularly informed of the signing of France's main sales contracts.

MITTERRAND ARRIVES FOR FRENCH-ITALIAN SUMMIT

NC261050 Paris AFP in English 1027 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 26 Feb (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand arrived here today on a 48-hour official visit accompanied by a large ministerial delegation. He was welcomed at the airport by premier Giovanni Spadolini, Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and the French ambassador.

Mr Mitterrand was to lunch privately with President Sandro Pertini at the Quirinal Palace. The French president and Mr Spadolini will meet a second time in mid-afternoon at a joint ministerial working session.

With Mr Mitterrand were the ministers for external relations, finance, agriculture, industry, culture, European affairs and professional training. Topics on the agenda of the Franco-Italian talks include agriculture; particularly Italian wine exports to France, East-West relations and mutual cooperation.

President Mitterrand's trip was to inaugurate a planned series of regular summits between the two countries. The second day of President Mitterrand's stay in Rome will include a private audience with the pope.

Meeting 'Cordial'

LD261936 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1630 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Text] This morning's meeting between Prime Minister Spadolini and French President Mitterrand was marked by the utmost cordiality. The two statesmen stressed the importance of the role played by Italy and France in strengthening the EEC and expressed their wish to meet again as soon as possible.

Meets Press With Spadolini

NC262003 Paris AFP in English 1946 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 26 Feb (AFP) -- Italy will join France and West Germany in concerted action to force down interest rates, French President Francois Mitterrand and Italian premier Giovanni Spadolini announced here today.

The two men told a press conference after their meeting here that the three countries would take joint action to minimise the effects of high U.S. interest rates and to prevent a flight of Western European capital to the United States. But the French president, who agreed yesterday with West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on joint initiatives to curb interest rates, today pointed to a difference between Bonn's and Paris' approach to the problem.

The West German Bundesbank, he said, was free to take its own actions, whereas the French Government could dictate the approach of the Bank of France. Mr Mitterrand added that "a quicker and more effective management of (European Economic) Community borrowing" was one of the joint actions that could be taken.

The two leaders reached broad understanding on a three-point agenda, despite a continuing dispute over Italian wine exports. The three main items on the agenda were major world problems in the East-West, North-South context, the policies of the European Economic Community (EEC), and bilateral relations.

Mr Mitterrand arrived today with seven cabinet ministers on a 48-hour official visit. The atmosphere of the talks was described as "realistic". Spokesmen said a principal purpose of the trip was to inagurate a series of regular summits between France and Italy. The aim was to bring cooperation to the level that marks France's relations with West Germany and Britain.

But the talks also covered a broad range of international problems, including European security and cooperation, the high American interest rates, Poland and El Salvador, spokesmen said.

Mr Spadolini reportedly expressed a "positive judgement" on the Franco-German summit concluded in Paris yesterday, which produced an initiative against the effects of U.S. monetary policy.

The two men discussed "frankly" the wine war between Italy and France, sparked by efforts by French winegrowers to bar the imports of cheap Italian wine. They said they had opened the way to ending the dispute.

Mr Mitterrand was to meet tomorrow with Italian political leaders Enrico Berlinguer of the Communist Party, Flaminio Piccoli of the Christian Democrats and Bettino Craxi of the Socialist Party.

Asked about his visit to Israel next month and whether France could act as mediator in the region, Mr Mitterrand replied: "France does not put itself forward as either arbitrator or mediator in the Middle East." But he added that he hoped France's friendly ties with most Arab states and with Israel could help bring about the "indispensable negotiations" towards peace in the area.

Mr Mitterrand said he would be raising points of agreement and disagreement with the Israelis, one of which was his insistence on Israel's "right to exist" with guarantees of peace.

The president said the French and Italian delegations also discussed industrial problems, monetary policies, farm spending and aeronautics, nuclear and mini-computer technology.

Political Leaders Comment

LD271336 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Excerpt] Francois Mitterrand is this very moment being received in a private audience in Rome by Pope John Paul II. He was met in the Vatican courtyard by the French Archbishop Jacques Martin. The audience is taking place in the holy father's private library.

Earlier this morning, Mitterrand met with leaders of various Italian political parties, ranging from the Communist to the Liberal Parties. Here is a report by one of our special correspondents in Rome, Michel Lemerle:

The friendly but very brief talks which Francois Mitterrand had this morning with representatives of the Italian parties, surrounded by the sumptuous tapestries of the Farnese Palace, has brought at least one confirmation: The experiment of the French left is of great interest to the Italian parties, starting with general secretary of the Italian Communist Party, Enrico Berlinguer:

[Begin recording] [Berlinguer] This has given and will continue to give strong encouragement to work and build an alternative in Italy.

[Lemerle] Do you think the French model can be exported?

[Belinguer] No model can be exported but there are experiments which are very encouraging, among which there is the French one. We want to have good relations with the French Communists or Socialists.

[Lemerle] A more qualified assessment, but in the same direction was that supplied by leader of the Italian Socialist Party, Bettino Craxi:

[Craxi] I was pleased to meet the French president again. We had a very brief exchange of views and we have agreed to meet soon in Paris.

[Lemerle] What do you think of the French Socialist experiment? Can it set any example at all for the Italian Socialists?

[Craxi] The French people have given an answer; they have given the Socialists an absolute majority; (?this is a proof) of trust. The experiment is being carried out and we must wait a while to see good solid results on which to pass judgement. [end recording]

[Lemerle] Those were the views of the two leaders of the Italian left. Both will visit Paris in the coming months.

Has Audience With Pope

LD271918 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] The worldly and the spiritual both received the attention of President Mitterrand in Italy. The French head of state is now on his way home to Paris after 2 days of an official visit to Rome. Yesterday he had talks with President Pertini and the head of the government Spadolini. These talks have been very favorably commented on by Italian public opinion and newspapers which talk about a few entente cordiale.

This morning Francois Mitterrand met the leaders of the four main political parties -- Communist, Socialist, Christian Democrat and Liberal -- and at about noon there came the private audience with John Paul II, the seventh visit of a French head of state to the Vatican since the Fourth French Republic. One of our correspondents Bertrand Vannier was at the gates of the papal palace.

[Begin recording] The first meeting between John Paul II and a French Socialist president was not a mere formality. Mitterrand spent 75 minutes with the pope, that is, twice as long as foreseen. The first impression of the president of the republic was: The pope is a man ready to make a good start. Basically, four main subjects were dealt with at the meeting: first of all Poland; Europe; disarmament; and finally, Central America.

As required by custom, Mitterrand refused to make any detailed comment with the exception, however, of the question of independent Catholic schools in France. The question was tackled, Mitterrand told us, and he gave us the impression that agreement on this subject was less complete perhaps than on the other subjects.

[Mitterrand] It was quite natural that this discussion should take place, along with the various international problems which we wanted to discuss. It was understood, of course, that each of us would remain faithful to his role. French policy is decided in Paris and John Paul II is responsible for the future of (?Catholicism). He perfectly preserved with delicacy and finesse the character of a conversation in which we both had to preserve our freedom of action. [end recording]

This was a very diplomatic way of saying that both have stuck to their position concerning the independent Catholic schools. At any rate, after his long conversation the pope and the French president, both relaxed and smiling, posed for photographs and exchanged presents. On taking leave, Mitterrand said that he would indeed welcome John Paul II if he goes on pilgrimage to Lourdes.

NUCLEAR SUB DETECTED OFF TARANTO NAVAL BASE

AU271523 Rome ANSA in English 1518 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 27 Feb (ANSA) -- A submarine, apparently nuclear powered and of unknown nationality, was intercepted on February 24 by an Italian submarine on patrol at the entrance to the Gulf of Taranto, in southern Italy, the Italian Defense Ministry confirmed today. The announcement added that the Italian submarine "maintained surveillance of the unidentified submarine, which was on a deep-water course, until it left national territorial waters".

The ministry statement came in the wake of reports given wide play in the nation's dailies today according to which a Soviet attack class submarine lying in the shallows off the Taranto Naval Base was surprised Wednesday evening by an Italian submarine and pursued for fourteen hours by amphibious aircraft, helicopters and torpedo planes before slipping away.

These accounts, which have not been confirmed by Italian naval authorities, said that the incident began when the Italian submarine, Leonardo da Vinci, made radar contact with an unidentified submarine while on patrol in the waters off the strategically located Mediterranean base. When the submarine failed to respond to recognition signals, the Leonardo sounded the alarm and called in naval aircraft to begin the hunt.

According to these unconfirmed accounts, low-explosive depth charges were launched in an attempt to force the Soviet sub to the surface, but it was thought to have set a southerly course in the Ionian Sea and then turned off its engines and rested on the bottom to elude sonar detection.

The Soviet attack submarine was reportedly of the hunter-killer type, an antisubmarine submarine specifically designed to detect and destroy enemy submarines below the surface and for operations against surface vessels.

Sub Confirmed as Soviet

LD272300 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Excerpt] The submarine detected in the Gulf of Taranto was a Soviet spy ship engaged in some sort of demonstrative intrusion. This was stated by the under secretary of defense, Martino Scovacricchi. Scovacricchi stressed the increasingly preoccupying problem of security in Italy.

BERLINGUER COMMENTS ON DIFFERENCES WITH CPSU

LD271736 Hamburg DPA in German 1639 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Hamburg, 27 Feb (DPA) -- The head of the PCI, Enrico Berlinguer, has accused Moscow of trying to split his party. In an interview with DER SPIEGEL, Berlinguer said in reply to a question addressing this point: "That is probable." The interview is contained in the latest edition of the magazine, which will appear on Monday [29 February]. Berlinguer described the CPSU's campaign against him and his party as "fundamentally wrong and unjust." The CPSU has accused the Italian Communists, who have greatly criticized the imposition of martial law in Poland and the role of the Soviet Union for, among others, giving "direct aid to imperialism." In Poland, Berlinguer says in the SPIEGEL interview, it has become clear "that political power cannot justify itself in opposition to the working class, even if those in power claim to represent that class. One can hardly call such a power socialism."

Berlinguer demanded that reforms in the Warsaw Pact countries "must be tackled without delay." At the same time, he criticized "firmly every kind of boycott, sanction or retaliatory measure" with regard to Poland, since such a policy would only harm the Polish people and aggravate tensions in Europe and the world.

BALSEMAO RETURNS FROM ITALY, NETHERLANDS VISIT

LD271016 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1016 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Statement by Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao on 27 February on his return to Lisbon from visits to Rome, The Hague and the Vatican -- recorded]

[Text] My trip had two purposes: First, to establish contact with the governments of Italy and The Netherlands, mainly in connection with Portugal's application for EEC membership; and second, an audience with his holiness the pope and contacts with Vatican Secretary of State Casarolli.

With regard to the first purpose, there are three basic aspects to highlight from my meetings in Italy and Holland. The first is that I met with clear understanding on the part of the Italian and Netherlands Governments of the correctness of our stand concerning the timetable we have been negotiating -- and fulfilling -- in our EEC talks. The second is that I also met with understanding with regard to the possibility of the negotiations with Portugal advancing simultaneously with discussion and settlement of certain internal EEC problems. And the third is that there is also understanding of our stand on Spain's candidacy. As you know, this stand is that it would be advantageous if the two countries were to join the EEC at the same time, but that we would not wish to be penalized over any delays with Spain's candidacy, because our own candidacy is separate and independent and must be judged on its own merits.

Another aspect that I would like to emphasize is that both the Italians and the Dutch have demonstrated their desire to bring Portugal into the sphere of political cooperation in Europe, even before we join the EEC. This intention has already been announced. Its implementation started, on the Portuguese side, with the recent visit to Brussels by the director general for political affairs at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and this implementation will continue with the Portuguese foreign minister's participation in meetings to come.

With regard to the second purpose of my trip, I would like to stress that in the course of the audience granted to me by his holiness the pope, I was authorized by his holiness and by Secretary of State Cardinal Casarolli to announce that the pope has accepted the invitation extended to him by his excellency the president of the republic and by the Conference of the Episcopate to pay a visit to Portugal.

PRIME MINISTER VIEWS 'FAILED COUP' OF LAST YEAR

LD280106 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Excerpts] On the occasion of the first anniversary of his investiture as prime minister, Sr Calvo-Sotelo gave an extensive interview to Spanish television in which he said that we Spaniards should recall 23 February 1981 as the date of a failure and not as the date of a coup because 23 February 1981 was a failed coup. Asked whether the events of 23 February 1981 could be repeated, the prime minister replied:

[Begin recording] I do not think anything similar could happen again. I think there is no danger of a repetition. I also think that we have lived through the last 12 months -- and your question makes me think that we are continuing to do so -- with an exaggerated concern, perhaps even obsessive concern, with the events of 23 February 1981. We recall 23 February as the date of a coup; we should recall it as the date of a failure because 23 February 1981 was a failed coup. I think that the Spanish people on that night and the following day learned to love the system that (?we gave ourselves), to accept democracy more, and to accustom themselves more to democracy. I think seeing how much was at risk accented what the stakes were in the regime which we freely gave ourselves. The fact that we Spaniards now live in peace and can express our differences freely within Spain, without anyone having to live either in jail or abroad because of their political ideas is a new fact of life in our history. All Spaniards know, or the immense majority of Spaniards know, that a coup would be a step backward, a loss of all these values, a familiar loss which no one is prepared for. I am very sure and very calm on this point and I always have been. I think that we should get rid of the obsessive shadow of 23 February and remember that it was a failed coup. [end recording]

PSOE LEADER SAYS REAGAN SPEECH 'THREATENING'

PA272100 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1233 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Madrid, 27 Feb (EFE) -- Spanish Socialist leader Felipe Gonzalez announced today that the economic aspects of U.S. President Ronald Reagan's plan for Central America "can be discussed" but the same is not true regarding its political content, which has been "negative" and "threatening" for three countries of the area. Felipe Gonzalez, who returned today to Madrid after a 4-day visit to Panama and Venezuela as vice president of the Socialist International, termed "threatening" the tone used by Reagan in his speech referring to three countries in Central America which, according to the U.S. President, "must be doomed to darkness."

The secretary general of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party (PSOE) told EFE that he took advantage of his stay in America to meet with leaders of the Socialist International of Panama and with members of the Venezuelan Democratic Action Party. "In Caracas," he said, "I also met with Venezeulan President Herrera Campins." Gonzalez explained that during his visit to the Central American region he again learned of the delicate problems of the area, received information and compiled enough material to bring it before the Socialist International meeting to be held in Bonn (FRG) in 3 weeks.

LABOR LEADER DEEMS REAGAN 'WEAK' PRESIDENT

PM251237 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 20 Feb 82 p 7

[Text] "Since 13 December Western reactions to Poland have been dominated by the Reagan administration's tough language. This can seem superficial and unworthy to many people. Especially when it is taken together with support for regimes in Turkey and El Salvador which also violate human rights principles," Thorvald Stoltenberg told a meeting of Rogaland Labor Party representatives yesterday evening.

The former defense minister did not have much positive to say about the Reagan administration's policies. In his view they could perhaps give short-term advantages, but in the long term they would break down the credibility of a policy for democracy and human rights. "We see an example of such a short-term security policy in Greece today where there is widespread skepticism toward Washington, toward NATO." He said that a problem is caused because Reagan is surrounding himself with inexperienced people. However, he considered that problem even more serious because Reagan has turned out to be a weak president. "Certain signs indicate this," Stoltenberg said.

PRESS PLEASED WITH PRIME MINISTER'S FRG TALKS

PM251051 [Editorial report] Norwegian newspapers of 18 February carry editorials on the Bonn meeting between FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Norwegian Prime Minister Kaare Willoch. The papers welcome the high degree of agreement between the two leaders and stress the importance of this for NATO and for European cooperation in general. Oslo's AFTENPOSTEN in its page 2 editorial values "the very high degree of political harmony which exists today between Oslo and Bonn -- completely independently of the governments' party colors.

"This is not something which happens automatically; it is due to the fact that the Norwegian Government adopts a foreign policy profile where pragmatism is more important than ideological zeal. Thus in the practical political perspective the government is quite close to the line followed by Helmut Schmidt's Social Democratic-Liberal coalition in its foreign and security policy. From time to time -- as in the case of Poland, for example, -- the language used has differed, but it has been difficult to catch sight of any essential differences." The paper also welcomes the close and regular consultations agreed between Norway, the only NATO nation not a member of the EEC, and West Germany.

Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in its page 4 editorial also stresses the agreement between the two countries: "Willoch's talks in Bonn with top political leaders clearly show that there is a convergence of views between our own conservative government and the Liberal-Social Democratic coalition in West Germany. This can hardly come as a surprise to anyone. Even though we here in Norway have had one or two signs of differences of opinion between the Labor Party and the government on our foreign and security policy course, there has never been any doubt about the broad agreement on basic issues."

ARBEIDERBLADET ends on a slight note of criticism, chiding the Norwegian prime minister for failing to promote energy and industrial cooperation. "Much of the passivity is due to the fact that the Conservative Government is unwilling to intervene in this process. In accordance with its ideology, it wants to allow industrial and commercial life to find its own channels, to solve the problems. But this point of departure does not really contribute to any progress in trading relations between the two countries. That is a pity. It was, after all, West Europe's most important industiral nation the prime minister was visiting."

'GREATER UNDERSTANDING' RESULTS FROM U.S. VISIT

PM250943 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 22 Feb 82 p 5

[Lars Hellberg dispatch: "Cooperation Strengthened"]

[Text] Washington, 21 Feb -- The Storting Foreign Affairs Committee's visit to the United States has been unusually successful. The talks with U.S. foreign affairs leaders, chiefly with Under Secretary Walter Stoessel, have undoubtedly further strengthened bilateral cooperation between the two countries within the framework of the Western alliance. In this respect the committee's members drew the same conclusions as their U.S. hosts when their visit came to an end at the weekend.

In addition, the committee members flew home to Norway with a greater understanding of the thinking behind and the exercise of U.S. foreign and security policy in a broader sense. At the same time, Washington has a better insight into Norwegian views on issues where the Reagan administration and its Western ally are far from agreed.

The timing of the visit -- Characterized by European uncertainty about what is happening in the Middle East and in relation to the Eastern bloc and by agonizing disagreement about U.S. involvement in Latin America -- excluded in advance the possibility that this would be only a courtesy visit. There is no reason to hide the fact that both in the Pentagon and the Department of State the committee was told in fairly clear terms that it is easy enough to sit at a distance and have moral views about what is happening in Cuba, Nicaragua and El Salvador.

It was said that, whether the Euorepans like it or not, what happens in the U.S. backyard is of the utmost importance for U.S. security policy. Individual members of the committee told AFTENPOSTEN that they understand the U.S. problems here but would like to see "new answers to the old problems." Others, including Conservative Party Chairman Jo Benkow, stressed that Norway must naturally protest in cases of blatant violations of human rights, but this does not give Norway the right or the opportunity to adopt the role of an objective judge in a more than difficult and complex situation, such as the one in El Salvador.

It is clear that, in general, the Foreign Affairs Committee's members had considerably fewer problems in talking to foreign policy makers than with representatives of the defense forces' leadership. Thus Labor Party Chairman Gro Harlem Brundtland, for example, before she left for a meeting of the International Disarmament Commission led by Olof Palme, stressed that the foreign policy staff had made a convincing impression of sound knowledge, thoroughness and a professional approach to the problems. However, she added that this does not mean that she agrees with all the conclusions drawn by the United States.

Somewhat humorously, a U.S. source said that one of the reasons for the committee's conflicting impressions from two of the power centers in U.S. foreign and security policy could be that "they heard what they wanted to hear from the State Department, whereas they met with unpleasant truths about the military situation and the conclusions the Reagan administration draws from these in the Pentagon. The rivalry between the Pentagon and the Department of State is one of the Reagan administration's fundamental problems compared with its Western allies, but both these two elements are part of the same policy."

The Norwegian visit to Washington has not solved any problems. There were no bilateral problems to solve, and the problems within the NATO alliance belong in a broader forum. But what is crucial for relations between Norway and the United States is that the committee takes home with it a clear impression that the U.S. Department of State is better oriented on the situation in Europe and more open to objections that many of the committee's members had previously thought.

The Nordland Labor Party's resolution to exclude U.S. troops from NATO exercises is an interesting example, not because the U.S. hosts made a special point of mentioning it. For the for U.S. State Department the resolution is as meaningless as it is embarrassing for a country whose defenses are based on the ability of troops to come and defend it in a war situation.

SWEDEN

FOREIGN MINISTER SCORES TURKEY, U.S. IN RIKSDAG

PM251023 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 18 Feb 82 p 9

[Text] The government is prepared to discuss freezing export credits to Turkey as a protest against the military junta there. Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten made this announcement to the Riksdag during question time on Wednesday [17 February].

"The situation with regard to human rights in Turkey is highly unsatisfactory," he said. "Today Turkey is not a democracy."

He also said that Sweden was taking part in a working group meeting on 17 February with Denmark, Norway and The Netherlands to discuss possible lines of action against the Turkish military regime. "The United States is carrying out its role of defender of democracy very badly. Intentionally or unintentioanlly, the United States misunderstands the situation in El Salvador and supports antidemocratic forces," Ullsten said in reply to a question about his attitude to the political situation in Central America.

"It is short-sighted and unworthy of a democarcy like the United States to support a regime which finds itself increasingly isolated from its own population and which carries a heavy responsibility for a frightful reign of terror. "The Americans claim that the crisis in Central America is due to communist subversion coming from outside. I do not share this view. The chief threat to peace and stability in these countries originates from the major social injustices, the poverty and the ruling oligarchy."

DEFENSE CHIEF SEES FURTHER REDUCTION IN FORCES

PM261101 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 22 Feb 82 p 5

[Text] It is no longer enough to cancel a refresher training course here and there to make the defense forces' budget balance. In order to be able to buy artillery, ships, aircraft and helicopters, which units will need in the future, the number of peacetime regiments must be reduced and rationalization continue within the armed forces.

This was the core of an interview with Swedish Armed Forces Commander-in-Chief Lennart Ljung published in the light engineering industry's newspaper VERKSTAEDERNA. According to Ljung, the armed forces' purchasing power is determined by the economic framework decided by the state, the new system for price compensation which the Defense Committee has agreed upon and the plans for the actual size of peacetime organization.

"There is a direct link between the defense forces' size in peacetime and the scale of materiel acquisitions," Ljung said. "Materiel acquisitions will to a large extent depend on whether we are able to save almost 8 billion kronor through cuts in peacetime organization in the years leading up to 1992."

Ljung pointed out that since 1972 defense forces' personnel has been cut by about 6,000. "If our proposals are accepted there will be a further reduction of 6,000 in the next 10 years. By the middle of the 1980's the number of employees in the defense forces will be down to around 40,000, half of which will be military posts and half civilian.

"However, refresher course training programs can no longer be used as a 'budget regulator'," Commander-in-Chief Ljung said.

GREECE'S PAPANDREOU BEGINS OFFICIAL VISIT

Kiprianou Welcoming Speech

NC271136 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1000 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Speech by President Spiros Kiprianou welcoming Greek Prime Minister Andreas Panandreou at Larnaca Airport -- live]

[Text] With particular joy and deep emotion, I welcome today in martyr Cyprus the prime minister of Greece, Mr Andreas Papandreou. [applause; chants of "Change, Andreas, change"] In him, the Cypriot people greet all the Greek people. [chants of "Greece out of NATO"] They greet democratic Greece. In him, they greet the fighter for the Cypriot people's rights and the defender of Greece's rights. [applause]

The struggles of the Greek prime minister -- even well before becoming prime minister -- for the rights of the Cypriot people are well known. [chants of "EDEK, struggle, change"] Let me be allowed to say that our acquaintance is not recent; we have cooperated for many years under difficult conditions. But since taking over as prime minister, we have established an admirable cooperation, an unprecedented coordination, that I believe sooner or later will bring about the desired result and will promote the Cyprus problem in the direction of a fair solution, which is absolute freedom, restoration of justice, implementation of the UN resolutions, demilitarization of Cyprus and safeguarding of the rights of all citizens.

As is well known, we have accepted federation, but we mean a real federation, with the rights of all citizens consolidated. An end should be put to foreign interventions. Cyprus must become -- instead of a cause of friction and conflagration -- a place of peace, quiet, permanent democracy, justice; a place of joy and happiness for all its people; a really independent, sovereign, territorially integral and nonaligned state; a bridge of understanding in this sensitive region of the Mediterranean. The prime minister has been struggling for a long time for this -- for all these goals -- and he always bears in mind that a bad solution of the Cyprus problem or the perpetuation of the current unbearable state of affairs would have repercussions not only for Cyprus but also for all Hellenism and the region. Cyprus is not asking anything more than what all other independent states of the world are entitled to. Cyprus is not asking to be entitled to, or its people to be entitled to, anything more than what all the other free people of the world are entitled to and are enjoying.

At this official moment, I declare again that the Cypriot people and their leadership will never accept the faits accomplis of occupation and invasion. [applause] We have identified ourselves with the course, and the goals and the method. Today's visit to Cyprus by the Greek prime minister constitutes a historical event, because for the first a prime minister of Greece is visiting this martyr island, particularly under such tragic conditions. [applause] I wish to express to him on behalf of all the people, regardless of political affiliation, our love, our respect and our admiration for his struggles, for his resoluteness, for his dynamic support during the current difficult and historical moments for our country. [chants of "Bravo to him"] Dear Mr Prime Minister, dear friend; welcome to Cyprus. The Cypriot people welcome you. They greet you and they are grateful to you. [applause]

Papandreou Arrival Statement

NC271237 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1005 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Statement by Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou on arrival at Larnaca Airport -- live]

[Text] Mr President, I want to express my profound national emotion at this warm reception, at this reception which has a profound national meaning.

I want to thank the president of the Cyprus Republic for the kind words he has said about me and to confirm that Cyprus' struggle has also been mine from the first day I entered the country's political life. It is indeed correct and critical for the difficult period that Hellenism is passing through to have close cooperation between the Greek Government and the presdient of the Republic of Cyprus.

Today I bring you first of all the love of all the Greek people. You know that it used to be said that the Cyprus problem was an issue that had been forgotten by the majority of Greeks. You know that since the time my decision was announced to come to this suffering island, to this bastion of the Greek nation, since that time all the Greek people have been trembling with emotion -- with a national, sacred emotion. [applause] However, in addition to love, I have come to assure you that both the Greek Government and the Greek people will continue to give undivided support to the Cyprus people's struggle for independence and freedom, for an independent and nonaligned Cyprus, free of foreign powers, free of occupation troops, a Cyprus that will belong only to the Cypriots. This is the meaning of our struggle. I should admit to you that seldom in my life -- truly I do not know whether there has been another time -- have I felt so moved, to be standing on Cyprus' sacred soil. I feel moved because this time I am in a position to say things I could not say when I was not a member of the government -- to assure the Cyprus people that Cyprus has top priority among our national priorities. [applause]

Any compromise violating the basic rights of the Cypriot people will have, not only for Cyprus but also for the Greek area, terrible consequences. Hellenism's metropolis, Greece, promises to support the struggle to its final victory, to the time the Cyprus problem is justly solved.

I would like to add a few words because it is easy to misinterpret positions that are merely published. The intercommunal negotiations continue, and clearly both the Cyprus political leadership and the Greek political leadership agree that these negotiations should proceed within the framework of the Waldheim ideas, as they are called. However, at the same time we are not optimistic concerning the course, the end, of these negotiations. This is so for the very simple reason that, as in the past, the current negotiations are also being held between the two communities under the presence -- the dynamic military presence -- of the occupation forces. Under these circumstances it is difficult for the negotiations to produce satisfactory results for the internal aspect of the Cyprus problem. However, it is our obligation to the international community to prove that we do not reject proposals that in some way could lead to a solution. Of course if these negotiations degenerate completely, it is clear that the Cypriot people's struggle and the struggle of the Greek people, who support our common struggle, our common cause, should turn elsewhere.

What is terribly misunderstood, especially abroad, is the confusion, the simplification of the Cyprus problem -- that allegedly the Cyprus problem is a problem between two communities, a majority of 82 percent and a minority of 18 percent. But in this way we forget the basic, the vital problem that cannot be overcome by the procedure of the inter-Cypriot talks, and this is the occupation of the 36.3 percent of heroic, martyr Cyprus. All our friends, all our partners, all our allies must understand that they have shouldered an enormous responsibility by having consented to -- condoned -- this violation of the independence and integrity of the Megalonisos. This task is a task that is being shouldered today, in cooperation with the Cypriot leadership, by the Greek Government. We have embarked -- we are embarking -- on a crusade with worldwide dimensions, mobilization of Greeks everywhere to make our great partners conscious of the great crime committed against the Cypriot people -- against both the Greek Cypriots and the Turkish Cypriots.

Being overcome, indeed, by holy national emotion, I wish to assure you that by closely cooperating with President Kiprianou and the government [applause], with all the political forces of Cyprus, we will proceed with the struggle for the internationalization of the Cyprus problem. This is not something that has to await the termination of the negotiations. Internationalization of the Cyprus problem today is the effort to put before mankind strongly a hard reality that the great (?powers) want to disregard. And I believe, brothers of Cyprus, I believe that with this new phase of the struggle which we have undertaken new prospects will open and that far along the tunnel it is beginning to show light; the sun is rising. [applause]

I again give you my love and thank you for this moment, which I will never forget all my life, for this historic moment at which, as prime minister of Greece, I come to assure our brothers of our faith in, of our identification with the common struggle for freedom and independence.

Nicosia Ceremony

NC271307 [Editorial Report] Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek at 1200 GMT on 27 February reports the arrival of Greek Prime Minister Papandrou at the municipal boundaries of Nicosia. At 1204 GMT the mayor of Nicosia welcomes Papandreou and thanks him for having made the Cyprus problem Greece's top national priority. The mayor then awards Papandreou the key to the city. At 1210 GMT, Papandreou, thanking the mayor for the honor, reiterates his intention not let the world forget the Cyprus tragedy and stresses: "The friends, the partners, the allies should understand their enormous guilt which accrues from the events of Cyprus. We do not intend to let them forget the huge responsibilities they are shouldering toward these heroic, militant people, because the words democracy, freedom and independence lose their meaning when pronounced by lips that have shown no consistency toward the Cyprus people." Papandreou reiterates the goals of the common struggle he has undertaken with the Cyprus leadership. He concludes at 1216 GMT.

Begin Talks

NC271517 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Immediately after their arrival at the Presidential Palace, Greek Prime Minister Papandreou and President Kiprianou had a private meeting. The two leaders will continue their talks Monday. After their private meeting they attended a working luncheon. The luncheon was attended on the Cypriot side by Foreign Minister Rolandhis, Finance Minister Avxendiou, Defense Minister Veniamin, interlocutor Ioannidhis and Cyprus Ambassador to Greece Khatzimiltis. The luncheon was attended on the Greek side by Deputy Coordination Minister Pottakis; Deputy Minister to the Prime Minister Maroudhas; Deputy Foreign Minister Varfis; Ambassador Serpos, director of the Second Directorate of Political Affairs of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs; the prime minister's diplomatic adviser, Makharitsas; the prime minister's special adviser Stratis; and Greek Ambassador in Nicosia Zakharakis.

Answering a question by newsmen after his arrival at the Presidential Palace in connection with his first impressions of his visit to Cyprus, Mr Papandreou said that rarely in his life has he been so touched. He added: The people's joy and enthusiasm was on their faces, and so was the pain from their drama as well as the hope that with the active support of the metropolis of Hellenism we will be able to be led to freedom and independence, the refugees to return to their homes and the drama of missing persons to be resolved.

Visit to Graves

NC271658 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Mr Papandreou, accompanied by Foreign Minister Rolandhis and other officials, visited the Central Prison and laid a wreath at the Imprisoned Graves this afternoon. Later he laid a wreath at the Makedhonitissa tomb.

At the Central Prison Mr Papandreou was welcomed by Justice Minister Dhimitriadhis, Minister to the President Katsellis, the chief of police and the director of prisons. After he laid the wreath Mr Papandreou visited the execution cell, where, with obvious emotion, he faced the gallows on which the EOKA fighters were executed. In front of the grave of hero Grigoris Avxendiou, Mr Papandreou remarked: This constitutes a symbol of struggle.

On his arrival at the Makedhonitissa tomb, Mr Papandreou was welcomed by Interior Minister Veniamin and the commander of the National Guard. At both the Central Prison and the Makedhonitissa tomb detachments of the National Guard presented arms and the band played. During his drive to the prison and the tomb, masses of people strongly applauded Mr Papandreou.

Archbishopric Ceremony

NC272105 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Excerpts] At a ceremony at the Archbishopric this evening, Mr Papandreou was awarded the Gold Medal of St Barnabas, the highest distinction of the Church of Cyprus. Speaking at the ceremony, Archbishop Khrisostomos said:

[Begin recording] Your Excellency, prime minister of the motherland: The Church of Cyprus and its congregation -- that is, all of Cyprus Hellenism -- are possessed today by feelings of unique national emotion and pride. For the first time in our people's long history the responsible leader of the motherland, represented and expressed by Your Excellency, its honored prime minister, is with us. [applause] Your visit here not only proves your practical interest and warm love for struggling Cyprus Hellenism, but at the same time it also confirms the unity of Greeks wherever they may be. It proves that in the exercise of your duties as prime minister of the free Greek state you don't think and move only within the narrow limits of the Greek sphere, but you think and move within the entire Hellenic sphere, in the broader national sphere of Hellenism. For this reason you didn't come here to pay a mere routine visit; you came here to carry out a national task of tremendous national and historic significance. At these difficult times for our people, the most tragic and crucial in their history, you have come here to stress with your presence that the Hellenism here has not ceased nor will it cease to constitute part of the Greek nation [applause] and that Greece does not renounce, nor has it the right to renounce, the duties and responsibilities dictated to it in the capacity as the motherland. [applause]

For 3,000 years now we have been holding on to this land of our forefathers by our teeth. Many conquerors have passed through here. We have sustained many massacres and much ruin. Many have tried from both East and West to mislead us, change our religion and disorient us nationally. They have not succeeded. We have remained Greeks in mind, spirit, conscience and heart. [long applause] We have not renounced our national origin, whatever the suffering. We have not betrayed our creed, even in the most horrible tragedies. We have not surrendered or subjugated ourselves to the massacres by the barbarians or the tempting offers of our rich conquerors. We have lived and died with one vision, the vision of Greece, which is inside us as glory, legion and grandeur and has given content, honor and dignity to our existence and continuation of our national course.

You have come and have stated in a Greek voice that the problem of Cyprus Hellenism is a national issue of top priority for Greece. [applause] You have elevated the finding of a solution to a primary aim of the Greek national policy for your government. With your statements and activities you have lit a hopeful light amid the darkness of pessimism in which our people were drowned. You have revived our hopes and forged our people's militancy which began to rust under the fearful feeling of abandonment. Your voice has come as clear Greek, and your national actions are worthy of the historic dignity of our race.

We know that many wise men of politics may note that politics is to pursue what is feasible at a given time. But we ask them: What is feasible when the struggle is for survival? What is feasible when the invader, who occupies your lands, kicks you out of your ancestral homes, desecrates whatever is sacred and holy to you. And you know how they covet your fatherland and want to entirely uproot you from it. In such cases, the unfeasibility of cold logic becomes feasible in the mind and heart of the one who desires and struggles. In such cases the mind and heart and all spiritual forces become one and succeed in moving the limits of what is feasible and identify them with the rights of the struggle. Throughout the centuries the Church of Cyprus has been the ark of salvation for the nation during times of cataclysm. It has been the shelter and prop of our people during dangers, but also the hearth that warmed and illuminated us not only religiously but also nationally. We assure you, Mr Prime Minister, that the Church of Cyprus offers its entire self to the success of this struggle. [applause]

With these thoughts and with this statement at this official moment, we once again welcome you, Mr Prime Minister, and greet your presence among us. [applause] As an expression of our respect for you and your national task as well as a manifestation of our gratitude for the support by all Greek brothers, please accept this highest distinction of our church -- the medal of its founder, Apostle Barnabas. May God bless and strengthen you in the national mission, the top national mission, you have to accomplish in the crucial period of our nation. Moreover, may God bless our common struggles so we see you again soon in Cyprus, not as a herald of support but as a herald of the resurrection of Cyprus Hellenism. [prolonged applause] [end recording]

In reply, Mr Papandreou said: [Begin recording] Your Beatitude, Mr President, Cypriot brothers: At noon, when the Nicosia mayor handed me the key to the city, I said I could not find the words to express my great national emotion. I should tell you that this evening these words that have been said really create in me a feeling of pride but, above all, a feeling of responsibility, the enormous responsibility the Greek people entrusted to me through their vote and, at the same, Cyrpus Hellenism with the honor accorded me tonight. There is no doubt that for years now -- one could say for decades -- Hellenism has been shrinking. It is difficult not to refer also to the Greeks of Constantinople, who, at one time numbered over 100,000 and today are about 5,000-6,000. After the Cyprus tragedy of 1974, it is clear that Turkey, not being faced with a dynamic, resolute answer to its forceful and barbarious invasion of the Megalonisos, has undoubtedly proceeded with expansionist plans which concern the Aegean -- it claims at least half of it -- and beyond the Aegean, Western Thrace.

In the very wise words said by His Beatitude this evening, there is one I would like particularly to stress: It is that the feasible depends on the way in which a people, a nation, sees reality, and, in depth, what a nation sees is nothing but a reflection of its own will, its own power, its own unity. [applause] I have come to the Megalonisos, the sacred island of Cyprus, first to heal the wounds for which the metropolis of Hellenism is responsible -- to declare, to proclaim that all the Greek people together -- above parties -- and the armed forces of the nation feel with bitterness the crime committed against the Cyprus Republic.

Second, I have come to declare our decision to stand by — but the word, the verb, is not absolutely correct -- to stand by whom? That is, to stand by us; in other words to recognize our most fundamental responsibility toward Hellenism everywhere. For me, for us, who have come form Athens, and for the people of Greece, today was a day that will remain unforgettable. Today, from Larnaca Airport up to Nicosia, I saw elderly and middle-aged people -- youths, children, women, men, men and women farmers. I saw in their faces the pain for the loss -- the temporary loss, we are certain of that -- of their homes. In the pain and tears, I saw hope and confidence.

Your Beatitude, I would also like to stress, I do not know if my shoulders are strong enough to bear the weight of responsibility you have placed on me. However, I know one thing: I myself, my government and the people of Greece will wage the battle on this bastion, will stay on the bastions until this little light at the end of the tunnel becomes a noontime sun [prolonged applause] until Cyprus becomes again united, independent. A UN member without occupation troops, with the refugees in their homes, with the question of missing persons at last resolved. It is inadmissible for mankind and allegedly civilized nations not to have succeeded for 8 years to give an answer to the families of the missing Cypriots. [applause] Without bravado I would like to address a message both to West and East: Hellenism is determined to stop the course of shrinkage. [applause] Hellenism will stand upright in the coming struggles to vindicate its long history. This is a promise I give you, and I will keep this contact of honor. [end recording]

The ceremony was concluded with the playing of the national anthem.

Visit to Makarios' Grave

NC280959 [Editorial report] Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek at 0917 GMT on 28 February reports the arrival of Prime Minister Papandreou, President Kiprianou, Archbishop Khrisostomos and other officials at Throni, where Makarios is buried, to pay tribute to his memory. A short memorial service was held and at 0926 GMT Papandreou laid a wreath on Makarios' tomb.

Meets Party Leaders

NC281933 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 28 Feb 82

[Excerpts] The Greek prime minister this afternoon had meetings at the Presidential palace with the leaders and representatives of the Cyprus parties. Mr Papandreou met successively with Center Union Chairman Papadhopoulos, AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou and Assistant Secretary General Fandis, Democratic Rally Chairman Kliridhis, Democratic Party Secretary General Poskotis and Parliamentary Spokesman Galanos, New Democratic Front Chairman Mikhailidhis, Pan-Cypriot Revitalization Front Chairman Sofianos, and EDEK Chairman Lissaridhis. The meetings were also attended by Greek Ambassador Zakharakis and the Greek prime minister's special advisor, Stratis.

In their statements the party leaders stressed the historic importance of Mr Papandreou's visit and expressed their gratitude and thanks for the support rendered to Cyprus by Mr Papandreou, his government and the entire Greek people.

AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou stated that he emphasized to Mr Papandreou his party's views on the two aspects of the Cyprus issue -- the internal and external -- and expressed his satisfaction with the importance the Greek prime minister attaches to the internationalization of the Cyprus issue and the proposal for an international conference. Democratic Rally Chiarman Kliridhis said that he suggested to Mr Papandreou that an initiative be undertaken -- after the appropriate preparatory work is done -- toward realizing a broad conference or an expanded national council under the chairmanship of the Greek prime minister to study the Cyprus issue and to make decisions so that united we can all proceed with the promotion of a just and viable solution.

Address to House

NC282025 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1805 GMT 28 Feb 82

[Address by Prime Minister Papandreou to special meeting of the House of Representatives 28 February -- live]

[Excerpts] Mr Chairman, members of the House: I may repeat tonight what I said the other day because the deep emotions continue, because never before in my life have I had such deep emotions as those I have now in greeting, in your persons, the heroic Megalonisos, Cyprus/Hellenism, on behalf of Greece. It remains a truth that the responsibility for the tragedy of Cyprus remains a Hellenic responsibility, no matter how things happened. If you like, it is our responsibility because at that time we did not manage to build the democratic institutions on permanent foundations which would always guarantee respect of peoples sovereignty.

We can never forget that today's political leaders in Turkey, whether Ecevit, Demirel or Evren -- has claimed and continues to claim national sovereign Greek territory in the Aegean. I have emphasized repeatedly that Greece -- Hellenism -- fights for peace. It is a fact that one of the main axes of the policy of the party I represent is to promote peace and return to detente. We are a peaceful nation, and we claim nothing. We have stressed this repeatedly. It is not mere words; it is a fact. At the same time, however, we hve also stressed that in no way will we cede a single handful of Greek air, land or sea territory.

Over and above the Aegean, however, there is also Cyprus. If Greece, if the metropolis of Hellenism, accepted a solution to the Cyprus issue under which any portion of Cyprus remained under occupation, if it accepted a solution which would not permit all the refugees to return to their ancestral homes, if it accepted a solution which would not give the people of Cyprus all the rights of an independent, integral, demilitarized, nonaligned republic, then it would bear a vast responsibility to history and to the nation. It would be impossible for Greece to exist if it failed to hear the voice of 500,000 Greek Cypriots, who for many years -- for 8 years already -- have had to live a martyred life.

I would like to emphasize that I make an absolute separation [between Greece and Cyprus] so that there may not be an misunderstandings, particularly in the foreign press: Cyprus is an independent state and a UN member. We respect this independence and it is this independence that we fight for. At the same time, however, we cannot forget either our legal obligations, derived from the fact that we are a guarantor power, or that Cyprus is a bastion of Hellenism.

There is no doubt that there are different views on the dialogue being conducted under UN auspices. All, however, are agreed on one point: This dialogue is taking place under unequal conditions because it is between Nicosia and Ankara to the degree permitted by the Turkish occupation forces in the north of Cyprus; second, that this dialogue only touches on the domestic aspect of the Cyprus issue. It is truly nobody's business how the people of Cyprus solve their domestic affairs. The great issue, however, the great issue at the international level, the great issue for Greece, the great issue for all, is the international aspect, which is summarized in the term occupation -- not only occupation but also a continuing threat. I want to assure you of our unstinting support and, at the same time I want to tell you that what I have lived through yesterday and today I have not lived through before. I return to Greece with a militant message. I came to Cyprus to bring Greece's love and assure you of alignment [simparatasxi], not just support. I return to Greece a proud Greek, knowing that this experience of the last 2 days has given new wings to the morale of the Greek people in Greece.

BAR PRESIDENT, 15 PEACE GROUP HEADS ARRESTED

NC261416 Paris AFP in English 1320 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Text] Ankara, 26 Feb (AFP) -- The president of the Istanbul Bar, Orhan Apaydin, and 15 other executive members of the pacifist Turkish Peace Committee were arrested in the city during the night on a warrant from the martial-law court there, justice sources indicated here today. Mr Apaydin is a defence lawyer in the current trial of 52 members of DISK, the progressive trade union federation.

Among other Turkish Peace Committee officials arrested were former Ambassador Mahmut Dikerdem, journalist Ali Sirmen of the leftist daily CUMHURIYET, Niyazi Dalyancioglu, owner of [the] TURKISH NEWS AGENCY (THA), Huseyin Bas, foreign policy analyst on the banned liberal paper VATAN, one writer, one painter, three former Republican People's Party (social-democrat) deputies, two engineers, one doctor, and one housewife, Reha Isvan, wife of former Istanbul Mayor Ahmet Isvan. Mayor Isvan is himself in prison for aiding DISK during the 1977 May Day demonstrations in Istanbul in which 36 persons died.

Justice sources said that the arrests were continuing of all 42 members of the Peace Committee executive still in the country -- two others being abroad at present. The committee, along with political parties and trade union groups, were forced to suspend all activities when the military seized power in Turkey on September 12, 1980.

Media Blackout on Arrests

NC262011 Paris AFP in English 1919 GMT 26 Feb 82

[Excerpts] Ankara, 26 Feb (AFP) -- Istanbul martial law authorities prohibited the publication of any stories or photographs about the arrest today of Orhan Apaydin, president of the city's bar. A large number of journalists accompanied Mr Apaydin this morning from the Istanbul Bar to the offices of the daily leftist newspaper CUMHURIYET, where he made a statement, and later to the military headquarters. At the military court to finalize the formalities of arrest, Mr Apaydin said to the judges: "My arrest is the result of the enmity the military prosecutor feels for me and his wish to stop me from performing my duty of defense at the DISK trial."

'Our Radio' Reports Arrests

TA270523 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0500 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Some Turkish Peace Committee officials have been arrested. It has been announced that legal action has been taken against the committee's officials. On 25 February Committee Chairman Mahmut Dikerdem and other officials of the committee, including Istanbul Bar President Orhan Apaydin and Reha Isvan were arrested. Several world news agencies as well as Moscow radio, the BBC and the German radio have reported the arrest of members of the Turkish Peace Committee. The news reports note that the committee members are the representatives of the broad strata of the people and of the peace forces in the country. The reports recall that Dikerdem, the leader of the committee, was elected a member of the World Peace Committee's Presidential Council and that Apaydin was the chief defense lawyer at the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions trial. Former Ambassador Dikerdem participated in the meeting of the World Peace Committee in Sofia in September 1980 and was elected to the Presidential Council of the organization.

EVREN RETURNS FROM OFFICIAL VISIT TO BULGARIA

TA271656 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Head of state Kenan Evren has returned to Ankara after concluding his official visit to Bulgaria. At Varna airport Evren was seen off with a ceremony by Bulgarian State Council Chairman Todor Zhivkov.

Evren was received by National Security Council Member and Ground Forces Commander Nurettin Ersin in a ceremony at Esenboga Airport. National Security Council members, Air Force Commander Tahsin Sahinkaya, Gendarme Commander Sedat Celasun, Consultative Assembly Speaker Sadi Irmak, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, cabinet members and other military and civilian officials were also present. Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and the delegation that accompanied Evren to Bulgaria also returned to Ankara.

At a news conference at Esenboga Airport, Evren recalled that this was the first visit to Bulgaria at the level of head of state. Noting that it had been a loss not to have exchanged visits at the highest level with this neighboring country, which had coexisted very closely with Turkey for centuries and whose culture and traditions were very similar to those of Turkey, Evren said: When the Bulgarian people received us they shouted slogans of peace and friendship. As you know, Turkey has always pursued a policy of peace, a policy of friendship and good will with all countries irrespective of their political and economic systems. We are determined to continue this policy in the future as well.

Evren said cooperation in many fields have developed between Turkey and Bulgaria in recent years. He added that, however, during his visit it was determined that there are many more fields in which the two countries can cooperate. He noted that the necessary activities will be continued to further develop cooperation and that thus relations with Bulgaria have entered a better stage. Evren said: We believe that if Turkey acts in accordance with the principle of goodneighborliness more tranquillity can be achieved. Actually if all countries establish tranquil and comfortable relations with their neighbors problems can automatically be solved in the world and especially in Europe. And again we believe that all countries have both domestic problems and problems involving other neighboring or far-away countries. Such problems can only be solved through mutual talks. If dialogues are interrupted then this has a different connotation. Therefore, we have always chosen to solve our problems through bilateral talks in an atmosphere of good will. We are determined to follow this method and we believe it is the best method.

Noting that he held positive talks with Zhivkov, Evren said activities will be held with the aim of reuniting separated families, a situation created after the emigration agreement between the two countries expired in 1978. Evren said the Aziziye Hill problem, a region close to the border within Bulgarian territory, which could not be opened to agriculture until now due to a bilateral agreement, was solved with a protocol that was signed. Recalling that an agreement has not yet been reached between the two countries regarding the continental shelf issue in the Black Sea, Evren added that a decision has been made to begin continental shelf talks with good will. Recalling that there is a Turkish-Bulgarian agreement on the issue of smuggling, Evren said that during his talks with Zhivkov they reached an agreement on principle regarding effective implementation of this agreement and that thus smuggling into Turkey through Bulgaria will be prevented to some extent.

Evren concluded by saying: I can say that this visit was very beneficial and productive. Through similar visits to other neighboring countries we will further strengthen the peaceful policy that Turkey has always pursued. I also brought the greetings of Zhivkov and the Bulgarian people to the Turkish nation. I would like to convey these greetings. At this moment, as I step onto Turkish soil, I extend my best wishes, greetings and love to all my Turkish citizens.

ARMENIAN GETS 16 MONTHS FOR 'RACIST PROPAGANDA'

TA271544 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1510 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Istanbul, 27 Feb (AA) -- A Turkish citizen of Armenian origin, Hrant Kucukguzelyan; was sentenced to a year and 4 months in prison Friday by an Istanbul Martial Law Court for conducting racist and anti-national propaganda. The defendant, charged with reading banned publications to Armenian school children at the Gedikpasa Armenian protestant church, attempting to ban the use of Turkish in church services, and sending pictures of eastern Turkey abroad with the claim that these locations did not belong to Turkey, was convicted under Article 142 of the Penal Code. Four members of the Armenian terrorist organization "ASALA" had demanded the release of the defendant when they raided the Turkish Consulate in Paris last year.

VAN DER STOEL FOR ZERO OPTION, DENIES PACIFISM

DW021133 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1830 GMT 1 Mar 82

["Excerpts" from reporter Trutz Beckert interview with Netherlands Foreign Minister Max van der Stoel in Bonn; date not given -- videotaped]

[Excerpts] [Question] Is there a chance to really implement NATO's counterarmament decision in the Netherlands in the foreseeable future?

[Answer] You know our standpoint. We will not make a decision now. We hope it will be possible to achieve the so-called zero option. We cannot now say definitely yes or no.

[Question] The broad peace movement in The Netherlands which extends into the parliament, which is different than in Germany at the moment -- does this movement have a basically militant character, or what is its motivating force?

[Answer] It has an antinuclear character, that is, the great dislike of nuclear weapons, and not just of Western nuclear weapons. This has nothing to do with neutralism, for example, or pacifism.

[Question] Don't you have to face the accusation that you are just moralizing and having others look after your security while your people do nothing but criticize?

[Answer] The government naturally believes that it must do everything to make the disarmament discussions successful. This does not mean, however, that the government of the Netherlands believes that we should follow unilateral nuclear disarmament. I think that we can take unilateral steps in a certain regard, but there must be intensive mutual disarmament.

'LARGE MAJORITY' OF PARLIAMENT FAVORS SINAI ROLE

[Excerpt] The Hague, 24 Feb -- A large majority of the Second Chamber (the parliamentary groups of the governing parties [Christian Democratic Appeal, Labor Party and Democrats '66] as well as those of the People's Party for Freedom and Democracy, the Political Reformed Party, the Reformed Political Union and the Reformational Political Federation) have given their support to Netherlands participation in the international peacekeeping force which will supervise the Israeli withdrawal from Sinai beginning 25 April.

The Political Party of Radicals and the Pacifist Socialist Party parliamentary groups are opposed to Netherlands participation and made this clear this morning in two motions of rejection.

PROTESTERS ATTACK U.S. CONSULATE IN AMSTERDAM

NC272001 Paris AFP in English 1945 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Amsterdam, 27 Feb (AFP) -- Violent clashes occurred here today between police and demonstrators protesting against U.S. intervention in Central America. While several thousand demonstrators listened to anti-U.S. intervention speeches, mounted police fired teargas at several hundred protesters trying to charge through the U.S. consulate gates while shouting "Yankees go home" and "Reagan assassin". Netherlands anti-riot police also had to be called in after the demonstrators stoned the consulate building during some 20 minutes.

WESTERN BANKS ACCUSE POLAND OF 'BREACH OF TRUST'

LD021220 Hamburg DPA in German 1140 GMT 2 Mar 82

[Text] Hamburg, 2 Mar (DPA) -- The working group of a total of 500 Western creditor banks has accused Poland of a "serious breach of trust." In a telex sent to the minister of finance and the Handlowy Bank in Warsaw, the working group says that the Polish authorities have still not "honored their firm commitments" and by 22 February had still not paid the interest due for 1981 which amounts to "at least $75 million."

In the telex, a copy of which is in DPA's possession, the banks point out to Finance Minister Marian Krzak and Handlowy Bank President M. Minkiewicz that the signing of the rescheduling agreement was a precondition for the restoration of the "credit worthiness" of the Polish side. A condition of this was, however, the repayment of the interest still due for 1981. The working group met the previous Friday in London to make all the preparations for the agreement to be signed on 4 March. In view of the outstanding interest, however, this date has had to be dropped. Poland's debt to foreign creditors is estimated at $27 billion.

ROMANIAN BANK PROPOSES REPAYMENT SCHEDULE CHANGES

LD021920 Hamburg DPA in German 1844 GMT 2 Mar 82

[Excerpt] Frankfurt, 2 Mar (DPA) -- The Romanian Foreign Trade Bank has presented its Western creditor banks with proposals for the rescheduling of the repayments overdue since 1981 and due from 1982.

According to reliable information from bank sources in Frankfurt, this involves total liabilities of approximately $3 billion, primarily to banks, but also to governments and private firms. According to the Romanian proposals, 20 percent of the debts which are due will be paid on time, and the other 80 percent will be rescheduled over 6.5 years with a 3-year pause. This will be at an interest rate of 1 and 3/4 percent above the London Interbank rate; that is, the interest rate for 6-monthly dollar deposits, plus a 1-percent rescheduling fee.

GOVERNMENT DOUBTS ZAMYATIN'S STATEMENTS ON SS-20

LD021646 Hamburg DPA in German 1552 GMT 2 Mar 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 2 Mar (DPA) -- The Federal Government has cast doubt on Zamyatin's statement about a halt to the stationing of SS-20 missiles since November 1981. Informed circles said on Tuesday that in the European part of the Soviet Union a site with nine SS-20 missiles became operational in January 1982, following a construction period of nearly 1 year. According to latest information, more sites are being constructed in the European part [of the Soviet Union], although they are not yet equipped. According to this information, Moscow has a total of 32 such sites with more than 280 SS-20 missiles ready for action at the beginning of February -- 22 of these with approximately 200 missiles west of the Urals.

BRIEFS

TRADE WITH GDR -- Bonn, 26 Feb (DPA) -- The FRG received agricultural and food products from the GDR worth DM679 million. This was approximately 9 percent more than in the previous year. According to the Federal Food Ministry, the corresponding West German deliveries to the GDR dropped by 3 percent, however, to DM560 million. [Text] [Hamburg DPA in German 1141 GMT 26 Feb 82 LD]

MITTERRAND DEPARTS ON 2-DAY VISIT TO ISRAEL

NC030819 Paris AFP in English 0807 GMT 3 Mar 82

[Text] Paris, 3 Mar (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand left here today for a two-day official visit to Israel, the first by a French head of state since Israel was founded 33 years ago.

He was accompanied by his wife, External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson and Culture Minister Jack Lang.

Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy saw them off at Roissy Airport, near Paris.

DEFENSE OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON ARMS COOPERATION

PM261011 Paris LE MONDE in French 21-22 Feb 82 p 9

["J.I." report: "France Is Prepared To Make Industrial and Operational Compromises To Produce Armaments With Its European Partners"]

[Text] The French Government has decided to urge its armaments manufacturers more strongly even than in the past to participate in international, principally European consortiums for cooperation has become an "absolute necessity," according to Secretary of State for Defense Georges Lemoine, who believes that "The alternatives in this field are: cooperate or collapse." France is even prepared to accept industrial and operational comprimises with its allies in order to revive collaboration in Europe, given a common battlefield which requires related material.

Mr Lemoine gave details of France's new policy at a recent symposium in London organized by the Scientific, Technical and Aerospace Commission of the Western European Union assembly, which comprises seven European countries. According to the Defense Ministry secretary, the high material cost of armaments makes international cooperation in the context of suitable consortiums essential if Europe's technological and industrial potential is to be safeguarded and even developed. Mr Lemoine condemned "Europe's economic dependence and technological breakup to the advantage of the United States." Referring to the Pentagon's decision to reduce very substantially its orders of Roland antiaircraft missiles from Europe, the Defense Ministry secretary expressed France's "anxiety" over "American industrial pressure" and the "obvious failure of the Two-Way Street."

The "Two-Way Street" (to use the time-honored expression) is a formula proposed by Washington to its NATO allies according to which the partners on both sides of the Atlantic each undertake to use -- in accordance with the terms of balanced reciprocity agreements -- military materiel conceived by the others according to the recognized technical and industrial abilities of each member. "In the field of helicopters, for example," Mr Lemoine said, "European capacity taken together is equivalent to the best of American industry, and it would be a serious political error for Europe to take a step backward and import American helicopters by the score."

To facilitate this cooperation in Europe, the French Government is prepared to make industrial and operational compromises. First, the industrial compromises. "France," Mr Lemoine said, "is behind the so-called lesser industrialized European countries which are asking the big Europeans to transfer a minimum of technology to help them with their developing industry." In reply to a Netherlands (Liberal) member of parliament who was complaining that the little countries are hardly consulted at all by French companies too anxious to maintain "their seal of origin," Mr Lemoine said: "It is true that in the past private firms wanted to make their seal of origin respected. But France has now embarked on the path of nationalization which will give the government greater freedom of action than it has had in the past."

Next, operational compromises. Referring to the traditional resistance of senior management, whose needs are always specific compared with the needs of their possible allies, Mr Lemoine was very firm: "The political authority we represent should have little trouble in imposing operational compromises on senior management throughout the country, since it is a matter of a common potential theater of operations where any differences in personal ideas must be reconciled to facilitate the cooperation that has become essential in view of the size of our defense budgets, which are quite rightly limited by indispensable social policies."

This notion -- an important one -- of a "potential common theater of operations" in Europe was explained in greater detail by the Defense Ministry secretary who, in his replies to questions at the London Symposium, gave equal importance to the European countries' double objective of "ceasing not only a European military space, but also a social and economic space."

National Pride

In his speech to the Institute of Higher National Defense Studies (IHEDN) in September 1981, the prime minister himself also spoke of "obstacles in Europe to the creation of both a common social space and military defense space," which means that Europeans need "to consider the prospect of a political grouping possessing an autonomous defense system." In June 1976, also at the IHEDN, Valery Giscard d'Estaing, who was head of state at the time, also spoke of this same contingency.

It is a fact that Europe is today -- after 20 years of cooperation that did, whatever may have happened, actually work -- in a situation of having to prepare a new generation of military materiel in the knowledge that for obvious financial reasons, not one of its members can build its own armory on its own. Indeed, we must already think about building airplanes, helicopters, missiles, land and naval equipment which will be in service until the end of the century and even after the year 2000.

The creation of international consortiums is a solution, provided each partner -- for reasons of independence of its military supplies -- continues to feel that it is still in a position to produce a substantial amount of the material, or whatever is considered essential for its security, on its own should the need arise.

We have no choice but to accept that. When these conditions are not fulfilled, many European manufacturers and a large sector of European senior management, like the majority of their French counterparts, often reason through national pride which makes them fear that the compromises accepted by governments are equivalent to partial renunciations of sovereignty.

HALF-COMPLETED TANK DEAL WITH CHILE HALTED

PM011239 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Feb 82 p 9

[Text] Twenty-nine of the 50 AMX-30 battle tanks which France had agreed to sell to Chile are at present frozen in the state arsenals following France's decision to stop French arms supplies to Santiago. The other 21 tanks were delivered to Chile before Mr Francois Mitterrand's election as president of the republic.

Chile is so far the only country toward which France has implemented such a measure. The Defense Ministry explains that, in Chile's case, the AMX-30 tanks could help in law and order or domestic repression operations. The suspension of deliveries to Santiago also applies to the supply of AMX-30 spare parts.

SPADOLINI EXPRESSES CONCERN AT U.S. INTEREST RATE

AU021632 Rome ANSA in English 1510 GMT 2 Mar 82

[Text] Rome, 2 Mar (ANSA) -- Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini stressed European unity in a speech to businessmen in Milan Monday and said he was in full agreement with the French and the Germans about the need to stimulate investments and protect European currencies from the fluctuations of the U.S. dollar. In a keynote speech at the inauguration of CISMEC (Information and Study Center on the European Community) Spadolini called for joint action among the EEC partners in the fight against inflation and recession so that Europe could play a greater international role in dealing with the growing contradictions and tensions in both the North-South and East-West dialogue.

He especially emphasized the need to strengthen monetary cooperation, and said that the coming Versailles summit of the West's big industrialized nations (U.S., Japan, West Germany, France, Britain, Canada and Italy) would offer an important opportunity to show compactness and unity of intent among the chief industrialized democracies. The summit would also serve as a forum to bring the European economic situation to the attention of "our American allies and friends," especially in terms of the damage being done by excessively high U.S. interest rates.

The premier also outlined the present state of the Italian economy and insisted on Italy's need to "remain in Europe" by lowering its inflation rate which in June was the highest in the community. He recalled progress made in righting Italy's balance of payments picture, in relaunching exports and in giving staying power to the lira within the European Monetary System, but he lamented the long parliamentary delays in approving financial legislation (which includes the 1982 state budget) and which has still not been reviewed some six months since it was submitted to the Parliament.

Spadolini also took the opportunity of the inauguration of the center to praise the brilliant successes recently chalked up by the nation's forces of law and order in the fight against terrorism.

COMMUNIQUE RELEASED ON ECONOMIC TALKS WITH SAUDIS

AU272010 Rome ANSA in English 1935 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 27 Feb (ANSA) -- A mixed Italo-Saudi economic commission wound up its work in Jidda today. A communique was issued noting the rapid development of economic ties between the two countries in recent years despite difficulties raised by the Petromin affair. This latter referred to payments the Italian state fuel company ENI made in 1979 to ensure oil supplies from Petromin, the Saudi oil company. The communique, issued here by the Italian Foreign Ministry, said that once these difficulties had been surmounted, the joint commission was able to cover a wide range of subjects aimed at restoring balance to bilateral trade and strengthening existing political relations.

In Jidda, the Italian side was led by foreign undersecretary Bruno Corti, while the Saudis were led by Deputy Foreign Minister (Abdfalla Alireza). The next session of the mixed commission will be held in Rome at the end of this year.

During his visit to Riyadh, Corti met with numerous government officials and came away with the impression that Saudi Arabians were well disposed to bolstering economic ties with Italy in various sectors, the ministry communique said. Recently Saudi Arabia has decided to take part in the creation of a mixed Italo-Saudi bank to be used as a means by which to recycle petro-dollars in Italy and promote financial aid to Italian exporters and firms working in the Mideast.

ROMANIAN FOREIGN MINISTER VISITS ROME FOR TALKS

AU271518 Rome ANSA in English 1513 GMT 27 Feb 82

[Text] Rome, 27 Feb (ANSA) -- Romanian Foreign Minister Stefan Andrei is slated to begin a round of consultations in Rome Monday by meeting with the head of Italian diplomacy, Emilio Colombo, before going over to the Quirinal presidential palace for talks with head of state Sandro Pertini. On Tuesday, Andrei will confer with Premier Giovanni Spadolini and wind up his official stay in the capital with talks with the foreign trade minister, Nicola Capria.

Upon his arrival at Rome's Leonardo da Vinci Airport Friday evening, the foreign minister was met by the Italian undersecretary at the Foreign Ministry, Raffaele Costa, the Italian ambassador to Bucharest, Benedetto Santarelli, and the Romanian ambassador to Italy, Ion Margineanu. Andrei is spending the weekend in Sardinia before opening the official portion of his visit in Rome Monday.

Meets With Colombo

LD012122 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1600 GMT 1 Mar 82

[Text] Rome -- Foreign Affairs Minister Colombo and his Romanian counterpart, Stefan Andrei, discussed for 2 hours the main topics of international importance -- disarmament, Poland, the Middle East and bilateral relations. In the afternoon Andrei will be received by President Pertini and tomorrow he will meet Spadolini.

Pertini Talks With Andrei

LD012218 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 1 Mar 82

[Excerpts] President Pertini today received Romanian Foreign Minister Andrei, who also had a personal message from President Ceausescu. In his talk with Colombo, the Romanian minister voiced Ceausescu's concern about the present international tension and the resumption of the arms race. In the Polish context, Minister Andrei stated that the Bucharest government is against any outside intervention in Poland and called the economic measures against Poland counterproductive. Regarding the Middle East, he expressed appreciation for the Italian decision to take part in the Sinai force. Tomorrow Andrei will meet Prime Minister Spadolini and the foreign trade minister.

CONFERENCE ON SOUTHERN AFRICA ENDS IN ROME

AU010835 Rome ANSA in English 0805 GMT 1 Mar 82

[Text] Rome, 1 Mar (ANSA) -- The second conference for solidarity with the peoples of southern Africa wound up in Rome Sunday with a pledge to work for an independent Namibia via free elections and for the isolation of South Africa's government.

Representatives of southern Africa's liberation movements asked Italy to adopt economic sanctions against Pretoria and to boycott South African Airlines and ships.

SWAPO leader Sam Nujoma urged armed struggle for the people of Namibia as the only means by which to wipe out the Pretoria regime.

Oliver Tambo, the president of another South African opposition movement, the "ANC", said that the year 1982 would be a year of united action to isolate the Pretoria regime, and he asked Italians to help in this.

The conference came to the end with a public rally which was attended by Italian representatives such as Rome's Mayor Ugo Vetere, Christian Democrat Giovanni Galloni and Socialist Riccardo Lombardi.

Lombardi warned against the dangers of a frontal clash between the two superpowers for control of southern Africa which is rich in raw materials and of great strategic importance.

Italy has pledged to back free elections for an independent Namibia in international forums and condemned the Government of South Africa for its internal policy of racial discrimination and its foreign policy of aggression against the neighbors.

The committee which organized the conference is made up of members of all the Italian parties and the CGIL-CISL-UIL Union. Its aims are to work for the release of all political prisoners in Namibia and South Africa, the sending of a second Italian solidarity ship for African refugees fleeing oppression and the creation of a friendship association between Italy and the people of southern Africa to begin its life on May 25 "Africa Day."
